Order X, rules 1-A to 1-C do not specifically refer to the manner in which the powers of the court under section 89 to refer any of the four methods of ADR is to be exercised. But it cannot detract against the power of the court to invoke the jurisdiction under section 89 of the CPC. If the substantive provision in the CPC confers a power in the courts to make a reference, it would be improper and impermissible to argue against such provision in the statute with the help of the rules framed or not framed.[32]

A careful reading of rules 1-A to 1-C of O X must leave one with the unmistakable impression that the rule making authority had not considered the possibility of parties not agreeing for any one of the four methods available under section 89. The rules do not contemplate the procedure that is to be followed by the courts in the event of disagreement between parties. O X, rules 1-A to 1-C do not cover the entire gamut of possibilities, which may arise under section 89. It would, therefore, be myopic to come to any conclusion on the basis of O X, rules 1-A to 1-C about the power of the court to make a reference in the latter eventuality where the parties do not agree for any of the four courses.[33] different quantums belonging to the 13 individual persons and as such it cannot be held that there was one written agreement seeking reference of the dispute for the opinion of the court as contemplated under section 90 of the CPC. Every agreement should have been treated as individual case seeking reference and the learned trial court should have registered individual agreement as a separate reference case, notwithstanding for convenience sake, trial could have been held analogously. Since the agreements appear to be separate with reference to separate land belonging to the individuals, the revision petition filed by present petitioner without having arrayed the other 12 individuals is maintainable. The petitioner is interested and concerned with his own land described in the agreement seeking reference and he has no way been concerned with the other land described in the other agreements relating to other 12 persons.[35]

On perusal of the agreement entered into in writing by the petitioner and the respondent it appears that no estimated value of the property described in the agreement and thus the requirement O XXXVI, rule 2 appears to be lacking. In that view of the legal position, the learned trial court should not have assumed jurisdiction.

The object of putting the estimated value as has been required under rule 2 is very much purposeful as it is manifestly revealed from rule 3, because rule 3 says that estimated value put in the agreement would decide the pecuniary jurisdiction of the court, so judgment and decree of the trial court are without jurisdiction.[36]

38. Substituted by Act 104 of 1976, section 30, for sub-section (1) (w.e.f. 1-2-1977).

The Amendment Act, 1976 has altered the marginal note and sub-section (1) whereas sub-section (2) remains as before. Before the Amendment Act, the marginal note to the section was "public nuisances". Sub-section (1) before its amendment authorised suits in respect of a public nuisance either by the Advocate-General or by two or more persons who had obtained his consent in writing. Before its amendment, sub-section (1) was as follows:

> (1) In the case of a public nuisance the Advocate-General, or two or more persons having obtained the consent in writing of the Advocate-General, may institute a suit though no special damage has been caused, for a declaration and injunction or for such other relief as may be appropriate to the circumstances of the case.

Under the amended sub-section (1), a suit under this section is permissible both in the case of a public nuisance and of other wrongful acts affecting or likely to affect the public. Where a suit is filed not by the Advocate-General but by two or more persons, they have to obtain leave of the court and not the written consent of the Advocate General.

[s 91.2] Application of the Section

The section creates a right of action where there was none before. But it does not take away a pre-existing right.[39] It applies to public nuisances which affect public rights, such as a public highway. To attract the section there must be obstruction to a public highway and that obstruction must amount to a public nuisance.[40] There is a distinction between a highway which is dedicated to the public at large, and one which is intended to be used by particular classes or limited sections of the public.[41] The section does not apply where the right of way is not in respect of a highway but is a right of way claimed by only certain classes of persons.[42] A blind pathway not used by the public generally, but only by the residents of a few houses only, is not a public road. In an action for removing a nuisance therefrom by such residents, the consent of the Advocate-General (now leave of the court) is not necessary.[43] The section, as amended, also applies to other wrongful acts affecting or likely to affect the public. Setting of an oil expeller cannot be stopped by interim order on the ground that it makes noise. But it can certainly be restrained after 9.00 pm and on weekly holidays.[44] Private nuisance, involving special damage is neither alleged nor proved in this case; therefore, the provisions postulated under sub-section (2) of section 91 of the CPC are not attracted.[45]

[s 91.3] Remedies for a Public Nuisance

Nuisances are of two kinds—public and private.

A public nuisance is an act or illegal omission which causes any common injury, danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity, or which must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right [Indian Penal Code, 1860, section 268].

Where a person commits a public nuisance—

(i) he is liable to criminal prosecution under the Indian Penal Code, 1860;

(ii) he may be proceeded against under this section;

(iii) he is liable to damages in a suit at the instance of a private individual who suffers special damage by reason of the nuisance, that is, damage beyond what is suffered by him in common with other persons affected by the nuisance.[46] Where a number of persons have suffered special damage, a representative suit under O X, rule 8 can be brought, and the consent of the Advocate-General is not necessary.[47]

These remedies, it is conceived, are concurrent. The institution of a criminal prosecution does not bar a suit under this section,[48] nor does the institution of a suit under this section bar a criminal prosecution, though cases may occur where the court may, in its discretion, refuse leave where a criminal prosecution is pending in respect of the same act or omission.

ILLUSTRATIONS

A keeps his horses and wagons standing for an unreasonable time in the highway.

(a) This is a public nuisance for which a criminal prosecution may be instituted against A.

(b) Further, a suit may be instituted against A under this section by the Advocate-General or by two or more persons with the leave of the court, though no special damage has been caused, for an order requiring A to abate the nuisance and for an injunction restraining him from continuing the nuisance. If the nuisance is repeated or continued, notwithstanding the injunction, he is liable for contempt where the decree granting the injunction is passed by a High Court,[49] or, he may be proceeded against under O XXXI, rule 32, below, or he may be prosecuted and punished with imprisonment or fine or both, under section 291 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860.

(c) If the horses and wagons are kept standing opposite a man's house, so that the access of customers is obstructed, the house is darkened, and the people in it are annoyed by bad smells, a suit may be brought against A by the occupiers for damages, the damage so caused being sufficiently special to entitle them to maintain the action.[50] The mere fact that a suit has been instituted under this section against A by the Advocate-General at the relation of the occupiers, or by the occupiers themselves as plaintiffs, with the consent of the Advocate-General, will not preclude the occupiers from maintaining a private action against A for the special damage caused to them. Quaere whether they can claim damages for the special damage in a suit brought under this section? It is conceived they cannot. It is submitted that the words "such other relief as may be appropriate" do not include such damages. In England, however, persons who have suffered special damage from a public nuisance, may join the Attorney-General as co-plaintiffs in a suit brought by the Attorney-General at their relation and the Attorney-General may claim an injunction, and the persons specially damnified by the nuisance, may claim damages.[51] It is debatable > whether such a procedure is permissible under the present section. But it is submitted that the mere fact that the section finds its place in Pt v headed "Special Proceedings" under the division "public nuisances and other wrongful acts affecting the public" ought not to be a reason for driving the relators to another suit and thus causing avoidable multiplicity of suits. It is allowed in England, even though the action in the name of the Attorney-General is one which relates to public matters. Even when the relators are allowed to be joined as co-plaintiffs and seek special damages, the action, in substance, remains one relating to public matters. Is there, in such a case, misjoinder of parties or causes of action? It is not so considered by the courts in England.[52]

The Madhya Pradesh High Court has rendered a Full Bench Judgment which goes a long way in clarifying several questions relating to remedies against public nuisance. It has been held that besides the provisions contained in section 91 of the CPC for taking action against public nuisance, there are other remedies which stand independently.[53] Explaining the point of law, AK Patnaik, CJ, (as he then was), speaking for the Full Bench, observed as follows:

> Sub-section (1) of section 91, Civil Procedure Code provides that in case of public nuisance or other wrongful act affecting or likely to affect the public, a suit for declaration and injunction or for such other relief as may be appropriated in the circumstances may be instituted and sub-section (2) of section 91 of Civil Procedure Code states that nothing in the section shall be deemed to limit or otherwise affect any right of suit which may exist independently of its provisions. Thus, it is clear that section 91(1) of the Civil Procedure Code is not exhaustive of the remedies that are available to a party even in case of a public nuisance or other wrongful act affecting or likely to affect the public. The remedy of the Corporation and any other person under sub-section (5) of section 307 of the Act of 1956 is independent of the provisions of section 91 of Civil Procedure Code and not only the Corporation but any other person can apply to the District Court for injunction for removal or alteration of a building on the ground that the provisions of the Act of 1956 or the bye-laws made thereunder have been contravened.[54]

Explaining the locus standi of a person other than Municipal Corporation for taking action under section 307 (5) of the Madhya Pradesh Municipal Corporation Act, 1956 for removal or alteration of any building, the Full Bench further observed that the right under section 307 (5) of the Act is not restricted to a person affected by violation complained of but encompassed all persons resident within the area to which the Act applies.[55]

[s 91.4] Nature of Proceeding Under this Section

Proceedings for a public nuisance in England were formerly commenced by an information filed by the Attorney-General in the High Court of Chancery. They are now instituted by action in the High Court of Justice (see RSC, O I, rule 1). The action may be brought like the Information—

(i) by the Attorney-General acting ex-officio; or

(ii) by the Attorney-General at the relation of a private individual.

Under the present section, a suit for a public nuisance may be instituted—

(i) by the Advocate-General acting ex-officio; or

(ii) by the Advocate-General at the instance of relators; or

(iii) by two or more persons having obtained leave of the court.

(a) Difference Between Suit by Advocate-General Acting Ex-officio and Suit by him as the Relation of a Private Individual.—Except for the purposes of costs, there is no difference between an ex-officio suit and a suit at the relation of private individuals. In both cases the sovereign, as parens patriae, sues by the Advocate-General.[56]

When the Attorney-General proceeds at the relation of a private person or a corporation, he takes the proceeding as representing the Crown, and the Crown, through the Attorney General, is really a party to the litigation. It is quite true that when the proceeding is taken at the relation of a subject, the practice is to insert his name in the proceedings as the relator, and to make him responsible for the costs, but I do not think that this practice, in any sense, makes the relator a party to the proceedings, although he is responsible for the costs, any more than (to take a converse case) an infant who brings an action is responsible for the costs of it. If I am right, it would seem that the practice of making the relator directly responsible for the costs of the action had its origin not in the protection of the defendant but of the Crown.[57]

When once the matter is in the hands of the Attorney-General, it becomes substantially a public proceeding, in which the Attorney-General, if there be no relator, becomes as prosecutor responsible for the costs, while if a relator is introduced, the responsibility for costs is upon the latter.[58]

(b) Relator's Interest in the Suit.—A relator need not have any personal interest in the matter, except as one of the public; he need not, in fact, be himself damaged at all.[59]

(c) Interest of Persons Suing with Leave of the Court.—Persons suing in respect of a public nuisance with leave of the court under this section need not have any personal interest in the matter of the suit, except as members of the public. They are entitled to sue, though no special damage has been caused to them. In other words they need not have a cause of action in themselves. Obstruction to village pathways falls within the definition of public nuisance under section 268 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860 and therefore a suit for removal of such obstruction with the court's leave would be permissible in the absence of any special damage.[60] This principle would equally apply to cases of other wrongful acts affecting or likely to affect the public.

The following are some of the leading principles by which the courts are guided in granting injunctions:

(i) The injury complained of must be either irreparable or continuous.[61] The remedy by way of injunction is therefore not appropriate for damage which is, in its nature, temporary and intermittent,[62] or is accidental and occasional,[63] or for an interference with legal rights which is trifling in amount and effect.[64]

(ii) Apprehension of future mischief from something in itself lawful and capable of being done without creating a nuisance is no ground for an injunction.[65] "There must, if no actual damage is proved, be proof of imminent danger, and there must also he proof that the apprehended damage will, if it comes, be very substantial".[66]

(iii) Though no substantial damage is proved, the court may grant an injunction if the defendants claim the right to continue doing that which the court has held they are not entitled to do.[67]

(iv) Where an illegal act is committed which in its nature tends to the injury of the public, an injunction will be granted to restrain the act without proof of actual injury to the public.[68]

(v) Where the plaintiff has proved his right to an injunction against a nuisance, it is no part of the duty of the court to enquire, in what way, the defendant can best remove it; the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction at once, and it is the duty of the defendant to find his own way out of the difficulty whatever inconvenience or expense it may put him to. But where the difficulty of removing the nuisance is considerable, the court may suspend the operation of the injunction for a time.[69]

(vi) No length of time can legalise a public nuisance. Though twelve-years-user may bind the right of an individual, yet the public have a right to demand the suppression of a nuisance apart from the length of time for which it may have continued.[70]

meaning that if any individual gets affected by such public nuisance being caused, he or she, would have the same right to file a suit for declaration and injunction and for mandatory injunction. Section 91 of the CPC does not create a bar on any individual from resorting to the court for relief in such matters.[73]

The Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 contains provisions for the removal of a public nuisance by summary proceedings before a magistrate.[74] The High Court of Calcutta has held that where special damage is caused to a private individual by a public nuisance, he has a right of suit against the person causing the nuisance for a removal of the nuisance, and a civil court may pass a decree to that effect, notwithstanding that an order for the like purpose might be made by a magistrate.[75] This right is saved by sub-section (2). There is a difference of opinion as to whether a member of the public can maintain a suit for removal of obstruction of a public highway, if his right of passage through it is obstructed, without proof of special damage. The preponderance of authority is in favour of the view that such a suit is maintainable; and that the rule of England Law contra has no application to this country.[76] But there are also decisions which have taken a different view.[77]

[s 91.9] Instances of Public Nuisance

> A nuisance which inflicts damage, injury or inconvenience on the public or a class of the public which comes within its sphere of operation, constitutes an indictable misdemeanour known as common or public nuisance which may also, in many cases, be dealt with summarily; but if a private individual can show that he has suffered some particular direct and substantial damage to person or property over and above that sustained by the community at large, he has a right of action in tort for that nuisance.[78]

Building over any part of a public street or closing a thoroughfare existing from time immemorial[79] or the keeping of a regular, though temporary, heap of rubbish on a thoroughfare at a busy and frequented part of the town,[80] is a public nuisance, for, such act must necessarily cause obstruction to persons who may have occasion to use their public right over the part encroached upon. The public is entitled to the full width of the public street, however wide it may be, and whoever appropriates any part of the street by building over it, infringes the right of the public road and the part built over.[81] An obstruction is not the less a nuisance, because it is on a part of the street not commonly used, or otherwise leaves room enough for the ordinary amount of traffic.[82] On the other hand, the High Court of Calcutta has held that as regards tidal navigable rivers, a slight encroachment does not necessarily constitute a public nuisance. "It seems to us rather", the court said, "that there must be some evidence that such encroachment causes one of the results specified in Section 268" of the Indian Penal Code, 1860.[83]

A finding regarding public nuisance should be based on evidence. An interim order of injunction to stop the working of commercial establishment, would result in its closure. Such an order should not be passed on a mere allegation that it creates noise etc. Full evidence should be required.[84]

Where sale deed was executed by member of a co-operative society and the property purchased was enclosed with a plan to provide amenities to members of the Society, it was held by the Madras High Court that mere conversion of certain areas earmarked for amenities by co-operative society cannot be termed as public nuisance.[85]

Acts which merely offend the sentiments of a class do not amount to a public nuisance. In India, it must often happen that acts are done by the followers of one creed which must be offensive to the sentiments of those who follow other creeds. Upon this principle, it has been held that the placing of a Mahommedan symbol in the neighbourhood of a Hindu temple is not a public nuisance, though likely to cause annoyance to Hindus.[86] Similarly, it is not a public nuisance, to expose on the verandah of a house, meat cut up for a dinner, though it may annoy the feelings of Jains, frequenting a temple close by the house.[87] But wilfully slaughtering cattle in a public street so that the groans and blood of the animals could be heard and seen by the passers-by is a public nuisance, for, it must necessarily cause annoyance to every one of the passers-by-Hindu, European, Mahommedan or other, who was not utterly devoid, not merely of refinement, but also of all proper feelings.[88]

[s 91.10] Representative Suit by Limited Class of Villagers

As a general rule, the consent of the Advocate-General, now, the leave of the court, would be necessary for a suit with regard to a public right. But an action brought by a particular section is an exception to the general rule. Hence, a representative suit brought by a limited class of villagers for rite of passage regarding a rasta is maintainable without such consent or leave and without proof of special damage.[89] Order I, rule 8, is only an enabling provision.

It does not compel one to represent many if his action is maintainable without the joinder of other persons.[90]

If special damage is proved or presumed, then, in spite of the fact that it is a case falling under public nuisance, a suit by one who suffers or is presumed to have suffered such damage, is maintainable and no consent of the Advocate-General (now leave of the court) would be necessary.[91] For instance, a person whose right to pass along a highway is obstructed or interfered with can sue in respect of a public nuisance without having to prove special damage.[92] In such a case, he is deemed to have suffered loss without proof either of the mode or quantum of such loss.[93] Accordingly, where a plaintiff, who, as a member of a class vitally affected by a public nuisance, sues on his own behalf, alleging special damage to himself need not follow the procedure laid down either in this section or O I, rule 8.[94]

[s 92.1] State Amendment

Uttar Pradesh.—The following amendment were made by Uttar Pradesh Act 24 of 1954, section 2 and Schedule, Item 5, entry 5, dated 30-11-1954.

In section 92, in sub-section (1), after clause (b), the following shall be added as a new clause (bb):—

"(bb) for delivery of possession of any trust property against a person, who has ceased to be trustee or has been removed".

The section corresponds with section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1883. It was changed in 1908 in the following particulars:

(i) The words "public purposes of a charitable or religious purposes" were substituted for the words "public, charitable or religious purposes" to remove the misconception that the word "public" was merely to coordinate with "charitable" or "religious".

(ii) The words "whether contentious or not" were added to give effect to a Calcutta decision. See note "whether contentious or not" below.

(iii) The words "in the principal Civil court of original jurisdiction" were substituted for the words "in the High Court or the District court".

(iv) The words "or any other court empowered in that behalf by the Local Government" (now State Government) were added in order to invest courts subordinate to the district courts with power to try cases under this section.

(v) Clause (a) was added to supersede a Madras decision and to give effect to the decisions of Calcutta, Bombay and Allahabad High Courts cited in the note:

"clause (a): removing any trustee" below.

(vi) Clause (d) was added to give legislative recognition to a Bombay decision cited in the note "clause (d): directing accounts and inquiries" below.

(vii) Sub-section (2) was added to give effect to the view taken by the Bombay High Court that the section is mandatory and to supersede the decisions of the other high courts to the contrary. See note "sub-section (2): this section is mandatory' below.

(viii) By section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1951, the words "or by any corresponding law in force in a Pt B State" were inserted after the figures "1863".

(ix) The words "the territories which, immediately before the l November 1956 were comprised in Pt B States" were substituted for the words "a Pt B State" by the Adaptation of Laws (No 2) Order, 1956.

(x) The words "leave of the court" have been substituted for the words "the consent in writing of the Advocate-General" by the Amendment Act, 1976.

(xi) Sub-section (3) is new and has been added by the Amendment Act, 1976.

[s 92.3] Romilly's Act

The present section has been borrowed in part from 52 Geo 3 c 101, called Romilly's Act. As to the applicability of decisions under that statute, to case under the present section, see the undermentioned case.[101]

[s 92.4] Object of the Section

> The real object of the special provisions of Section 539 seems to us to be clear. Persons interested in any trust were, if they could all join, always competent to maintain a suit against any trustee for his removal for breach of trust; but where the joining of all of them was inconvenient or impracticable, it was considered desirable that some of them might sue without joining the others, provided they obtained the consent of the Advocate-General or of the Collector of the District; and this condition was imposed to prevent an indefinite > number of reckless and harassing suits being brought against trustees by different persons interested in the trust.[102]

The main purpose of the section is thus, to give protection to public trusts of a charitable or religious nature from being subjected to harassment by suits being filed against them. That is why it provides that suits can either be filed by the Advocate-General or by two persons having an interest in the trust with the written consent of the Advocate-General (now with leave of the court). Before the Advocate General files the suit or gives his consent, he has to satisfy himself that there is a prima facie case of either a breach of trust or of the necessity of obtaining directions from the court.[103] One of the objects which led to the enactment of section 92 was to enable two or more persons interested in any trust created for a public purpose of a charitable or religious nature should be enabled to file a suit for the release set out in that section without having to join all the beneficiary since it would be highly inconvenient and impracticable for all the beneficiaries to join in the suit; hence any two or more of them were given the right to institute a suit for the relief mentioned in the said section 92 of the CPC. However, it was considered desirable to prevent a public trust from being harassed or put to legal expenses by reckless or frivolous suits being brought against the trustees and hence, a provision was made for leave of the court having to be obtained before the suit is instituted.[104] Where, in proceedings emanating from a suit under section 92, the trial court on consideration of relevant documents concluded that the temple in question was a private temple, the high court was found to be wrong by the Supreme Court in remanding the matter back for de novo consideration when the plaintiffs had not let sufficient evidence to establish their case.[105]

A bare perusal of the said section would show that a suit can be instituted in respect of a public trust by the Advocate-General or two or more persons having an interest in the trust after obtaining leave of the court in the principal civil court of original jurisdiction. An analysis of these provisions will show that the provisions of section 92 of the CPC can be invoked only when the following conditions are satisfied:

(a) It should be with regard to a public trust to obtain a decree for the purposes mentioned in the said provision.

(b) Suit should be on behalf of the Advocate-General or two or more persons having an interest in the trust.

(c) Leave of the court has to be obtained for instituting the suit.

From the above, it is clear that before granting leave to institute the suit, proceedings for granting leave have to be held in court. In these proceedings the court has to be satisfied that the trust is a public trust and the persons who want to institute the suit are interested in the trust. It is only on the satisfaction of the aforesaid conditions that the permission to institute the suit can be granted by the court for the relief mentioned in the said section 92 of the CPC.[106]

Where the memorandum of association of the institution showed the properties in the name of President and Secretary with power to sell them, it was held that it clearly indicated that the institution was not a trust and as such suit under section 92 was not maintained.[107]

[s 92.6] Application of the Section and Legislative Intervention

This section has no application unless three conditions are fulfilled: the suit relates to a public, charitable or religious trust; it is founded on an allegation of breach of trust or the direction of the court is required for administration of the trust and the reliefs claimed are those which are mentioned in the section.[108] Such a suit is one of a special nature and therefore, if the allegation of breach of trust is not substantial, or if the plaintiff fails to make out a case for a direction for proper administration, the very foundation of the suit would fail.[109] Where there is no scheme in existence, the court cannot be approached merely on the ground that the trustees had become old in age. The plaint must show why under the existing arrangement, steps cannot be taken to secure proper management. Such a suit does not disclose any necessity to issue directions regarding scheme.[110] A suit for obtaining an injunction to restrain a person from unauthorised use of the property of the deity by calling himself "Pujari", is not covered by section 92.[111] Where the trustee's power to sell property is at issue, the suit should be under section 34 Indian Trusts Act, 1882 and not under section 92 of the CPC.[112] Where the relief claimed does not fall under section 92, a suit filed without complying with the requirements of the section is not maintainable.[113] It being a special remedy, where resort could be had to it, the general remedy of an ordinary suit is impliedly barred.[114] And whether the suit falls within the section, must be decided on the allegations in the plaint as on the date of its institution.[115] The fact that the defendant does not admit that the trust is a public charitable or religious trust, will not take out the case from the ambit of this section.[116]

Once a competent court has exercised a jurisdiction, the decision cannot be interfered with or nullified by the Legislature. The legal proposition forming the basis of judicial-decision can be modified (even retrospectively). But the rights flowing from the decision cannot be interfered with by legislation.[117] In a Madras case, it was held that the legislature, in deciding that:

(i) the Board of Trustees of Pachiappa's Trust had committed irregularities in the management of the charities and institutions and properties under its control; and

(ii) that the members of the Board of Trustees had also committed irregularities in the management of the charities, had certainly usurped a judicial function, which could properly be exercised only by a court of law. Equally, in modifying a scheme decree passed by the court in the manner provided by the Act, and in directing the government (or committee appointed by the government) to discharge certain functions the legislature had clearly purported to exercise a judicial power of amending the decree of the court, which power is not vested in it. Thus, the Act suffered from want of legislative competence and was therefore ultra vires and void.[118]

Suit under section 92 was filed, alleging mismanagement of the trust property by the members of the trust committee. The trust was situated in the State of Uttar Pradesh. The civil court in State of Madhya Pradesh would have no territorial jurisdiction under section 92 merely on the ground that there was an allegation against the trustees about mismanagement of a property situated in the State of Madhya Pradesh which was purchased by the founder from income derived from trust property situated in the State of Uttar Pradesh. Meaning of "subject matter of the trust" occurring in section 92 is that matter, thing or person, which is the foundation of the trust and was the object of creating a trust, dedication or endowment. The situation or situs of properties or the trust are relevant for the purpose of determining jurisdiction of the court under section 92 of the CPC, only if such property or properties constitute foundation of the trust; but mere properties of the trust are not necessarily its subject matter. The existence of an item of the trust property, subsequently acquired from the trust income, should not be deemed to be the subject matter of the trust, so as to confer jurisdiction on the court in the State of Madhya Pradesh.[119] A suit by the deity for declaration of title to land, against a person claiming an interest adverse to the deity, does not fall within section 92.[120] An objection of non-application of section 92 was not raised in the written statement or in the reply to injunction application. It cannot be permitted to be raised to the first time during the hearing of the appeal.[121]

[s 92.7] Representative Suit and Res Judicata

The suit contemplated by this section is a representative suit, that is, a suit which is prosecuted by individuals not for their own interest, but as representatives of the general public,[122] in order to secure a proper administration of a public trust.[123] A suit under section 92 is for the vindication of public rights. The named plaintiff really represents the public at large. The suit is a representative one and the decree binds all persons interested in the trust, as provided in Explanation VI to section 11.[124] A decree in a suit under this section will, therefore, operate as res judicata under Explanation VI to section 11 of the CPC.[125] In Sunni Central Board of Wakf, UP v Sirajul Haq,[126] the Allahabad High Court held that a decision in a suit under this section that a particular endowment was public with a scheme framed therefor, was a judgment in rem and not a judgment in personam. This observation, though expressed in general terms, was made with reference to the facts of the case and in the light of the contention of the managing committee that the wakf in dispute did not come within the purview of the Muslim Wakfs Act, 1936 although in earlier suits including a suit filed with the consent of the Advocate-General, it was held that the property in dispute was wakf and a scheme was framed. The scope of the rule that such a judgment is a judgment in rem can be properly understood from the Supreme Court judgment in Ahmed Adam Sait v ME Makhri.[127] There a suit had been filed on behalf of the Cutchi Memons of Bangalore for framing a scheme for a mosque on the allegation that it belonged to them and that they had exclusive right to manage it and a scheme was framed on that basis. Subsequently, Sunni Muslims of the locality filed another suit claiming that they were also beneficiaries of the mosque and that a fresh scheme should be framed. The suit was resisted on the ground that the prior decision operated as res judicata. In repelling this contention, the Supreme Court observed that a decree in a suit under section 92 would operate as res judicata on all persons who have the same interest as the plaintiffs but that when the plaintiffs claimed right in a limited class to the exclusion of others, they cannot be held to represent those others and the decision in the suit would not operate as res judicata on the rights of those others.

[s 92.8] Issue Estoppel

In a case,[128] the Supreme Court held that in terms of the requirement of section 16(2), the onus to prove that the institution is a Sikh gurdwara lies on the person who asserts the same. That being the position, the committee which asserted that the Institution was a Sikh gurdwara has to prove the same. The high court has therefore rightly held that the tribunal wrongly placed the burden of proof on the respondents herein. Judgments to the contrary rendered and relied upon by the appellants are no longer good law in view of the last noted decision. Similarly, the Supreme Court in a case[129] came to the conclusion that Nirmalas are Sadhus who cannot be regarded as Sikhs and consequently in the mere capacity of followers of Sikh religion residing in the concerned village cannot be held to have an interest as to entitle them to institute a suit under section 92 of the CPC. In other words, there was a categorical finding that Nirmalas are not Sikhs. It was held that the Dera was maintained for an entirely distinct sect known as Nirmalas Sadhus who cannot be regarded as Sikhs. It was also held that mere fact that at some stage there was a Guru Granth Sahib in the Dera cannot lead to any conclusion that the institution was meant for or belonged to the followers of Sikh religion. These findings were rendered in a suit filed under section 92 of the CPC. Decisions taking the contrary view that Nirmalas are Sikhs per se lose significance. The factual findings relating to the nature and character of the institutions, specifically found on an elaborate review of the

The words "within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the whole or any part of the subject matter of the trust is situated" apply both to the principal civil court of original jurisdiction and to the court empowered in that behalf. The section, therefore, overrides clause 12 of the Letters Patent.[131] But if the trust fund is deposited with a firm at Madras and has a place of business at Calcutta, the Calcutta High Court has jurisdiction as the trustees could require payment at Calcutta.[132] Where the trustees and the trust fund are within the jurisdiction of a court, but the charity is to be founded in a territory outside the jurisdiction, the court has jurisdiction to pass a decree, declaring the trusts upon which the fund is to be held, but it cannot go further in the way of settling a scheme, and it will leave it to the court of the place in which the charity is to be carried out to settle the scheme.[133] Nor can a court apply the cypres doctrine extra territorium.[134] Likewise, where the trust is in a foreign country and is administered there and the trustees are also residing there but properties belonging to the trust are situated within jurisdiction, the court can act under this section for protecting the properties within its jurisdiction, though it may not be competent to grant reliefs which interfere with the administration of the trust in the foreign country, such as framing of a scheme, removing the trustees and appointing new trustees.[135] Empowerment of a judicial officer for the purpose of section 92, can be by entry in the gradation list and notification is not necessary.[136]

In a case from Tamil Nadu, the Supreme Court has held that for suits relating to Public Trust, the jurisdiction of the district court "or" other court notified by the state government under the Tamil Nadu Civil Courts Act, 1873 does not oust the jurisdiction of the district court. It has been observed that the use of the word "or" in section 92 denotes an alternative, giving a choice to the plaintiff. Even if the state government notifies any other court, the jurisdiction of the district court does not stand substituted.[137]

While overruling the judgment of the Madras High Court, Raveendran, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench explained the law in these words:

> 8. Assuming that there was any need for applying the principles of interpretation, let us next consider whether the word 'or' was used in Section 92 of the Code in a substitutive sense. It is clear from Section 92 of the Code that the legislature did not want to go by the general rule contained in Section 15 of the Code that every suit shall be instituted in the court of the lowest grade competent to try it, in regard to suits relating to public Trusts. The intention of the law makers was that such suits should be tried by the District Court. At the same time, the law makers contemplated that if there was heavy work load on the District Court, the State Government should be enabled to empower any other court (within the local limits of whose jurisdiction, the whole or any part of the subject-matter is situate), also to entertain such suits. Therefore, the word "or" is used in the ordinary and > normal sense, that is to denote an alternative, giving a choice. The provisions of Section 92 do not give room for interpreting the word "or" as a substitutive, so as to lead to an interpretation that when the Government notified any other court, such notified court alone will have jurisdiction and not the District Court.[138]

In para 9 of the above judgment the Supreme Court Bench further went on to explain as follows:

> 9. The provisions of Section 12 of the Civil Courts Act specifying the pecuniary limits of District Courts and Sub-ordinate Courts, is subject to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. In view of the express provisions of Section 92 specifying the courts which will have jurisdiction to entertain suits under that section, neither the provisions of Section 15 to 20 of the Code nor the provisions of Section 12 of the Civil Courts Act will apply to such suits. Section 92 is a self contained provision, and conferment of jurisdiction in regard to suits under that section does not depend upon the value of the subject matter of the suit. Therefore, insofar as the suits under Section 92(1) are concerned, the District Courts and Sub-ordinate Courts will have concurrent jurisdiction without reference to any pecuniary limits. We find that the learned District Judge had held that he had jurisdiction because the value of the subject matter was Rs. 10 lakhs, apparently keeping in view, Section 12 of the Civil Courts Act. We make it clear that the pecuniary limits mentioned in Section 12 of the Civil Courts Act, do not apply to suits under Section 92(1) of the Code.[139]

[s 92.10] Who May Sue Under This Section

A suit under this section may be brought—

(i) by the Advocate-General, and outside the presidency-towns by the collector or by such officer as the state government may appoint in that behalf (section 93); or

(ii) by two or more persons having an interest in the trust and having obtained the leave of the court.

All persons to whom leave has been granted must sue. It has been held that a suit by only some of the persons to whom consent of the Advocate-General (now leave of the court) was given would not lie.[140] Such an authority is joint and must be acted upon by all jointly.[141] But where sanction under the section has been obtained by several persons and one of them dies before the institution of the suit, the suit instituted by the rest was held to be valid.[142] This view has been dissented from by the Supreme Court in Narain v Sunderlal Tholia,[143] and therefore, is not correct. A suit relating to administration of a temple can be filed by the idol, represented by the next friend. Further, the registration of a trust under the Societies Registration Act, 1860, does not render section 92 inapplicable.[144]

As for appeal, one of several plaintiffs can appeal on the same terms and conditions as are applicable to suits in general.[145] An heir of the original creator of a trust has an interest in the trust and can sue under section 92. So, can a person who, under the instrument of trust, has the right to reside in the premises of the endowed property.[146]

[s 92.11] Interest in the Trust

When a suit under this section is not instituted by the Advocate-General, it must be brought by at least two persons, and such persons must have "an interest" in the trust. Section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1877 contained the words "a direct interest". Those words seem to have been taken from the judgment of Lord Eldon in Re the Bedford Charity.[147] Those words also occurred in section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882. That section was amended by section 44 of Act 7 of 1888, and the words "an interest" were substituted for the words "a direct interest". It must have appeared to the Legislature that the limitation of a "direct" interest was not expedient in India, and hence the section must have been amended.[148] The effect of the amendment has been to widen the class of persons who are entitled to institute a suit under this section.[149] However, the interest must not be purely hypothetical or in the nature of a bare possibility, but must be subsisting, though it may not be direct or substantial.[150]

Where the plaintiff sues under section 92 for framing a scheme in respect of a choultry, the interest should be real, substantial and existing though it need not be direct. The following types of interest are not enough:

(i) that the plaintiff is residing in the place where the choultry is situated; or

(ii) that the plaintiff might have belonged to the family entitled to hereditary trusteeship.[151]

Thus, a Mahommedan zamindar creating a "wakf" for the upkeep of a Hindu temple and a Dharmashala for the benefit of his tenants has an interest in the trust.[152] Persons entitled to worship in a temple have such an interest in the trust as to enable them to institute a suit under this section against the trustees of the temple.[153] Successors of the executant of a trust and all members of the Hindu public and other relatives of the estate were given right of stay in the temple (the trust property). It was held that persons having any concern with the dedicated property had right to seek remedy in the proper manner, if difficulty arose in its management and if the maintenance thereof was not being done according to the wishes of the executant.[154] Persons who not only made contributions or offerings but devoted their time and energy for the preservation of the trust property are persons interested in such trust.[155] So also persons who are not only interested in the preservation of trust property but are actual users thereof.[156] In an Allahabad case, a suit was filed against a religious trust. Allegation was that the defendant was Sarbarakar of the temple, i.e., person managing the temple, but was posing himself as the owner and was selling away the trust property. It was held that the pujari of the temple and other devotees can file a suit under section 92, for saving the said trust property. Purchasers of the property can also be made defendants for getting relief under section 92 of the CPC.[157] Similarly, persons residing in a village, whose business it was to conduct pilgrims to a shrine and perform the worship of the idol on their behalf, were held to have a sufficient interest to entitle them to sue the shevaks or ministers of the idol under this section.[158] Likewise, worshippers at a mosque have "an interest" within the meaning of this section in the trusts of the mosque.[159] A worshipper of a deity in a temple can sue as next friend without prior approval of court for appointment of next friend.[160] Individual rights cannot be litigated in a suit under section 92. If plaintiff challenges the rights of persons acting as trustees to function in that office but make no allegations of misconduct etc., then the suit does not lie under section 92.[161] A Shia resident of the locality where the wakf properties are situated who takes part in its functions is a person interested within this section.[162]

In a case, where leave was sought to institute a suit against Public Trust, by persons whose activities were not for protection of the interest of the trust, it was held by the Madras High Court that leave cannot be granted.[163]

It is not necessary for sustaining a suit under this section that the plaintiffs should be interested in all the items of properties comprised in the trust.[164] A lessee of trust property who has averted its sale in court auction is a person interested in the trust.[165] If the persons suing have an interest in the trust, it is not necessary that they should have been personally affected by any act done by the person sued.[166] It is, clear that simply because the plaintiffs are respectable persons of the locality and they have taken part in social activities, they are not sufficient to come within the category of "persons interested" in the trust as contemplated under section 92 of the CPC.[167] But the interest must be an existing interest and not a mere contingency; the mere possibility of succession to the managership of trust properties in respect of which the suit is brought is not sufficient to give a right to sue.[168] The "interest" contemplated by the section must be a present and substantial interest and not remote or sentimental. Thus, public Hindu temples are prima facie taken to be dedicated for the use of all Hindus resorting to them. But the bare possibility, however remote, that a Hindu of another place might desire to visit a temple does not give him "an interest" sufficient to entitle him to sue under this section. Hence, where a suit was brought under this section by a Hindu residing in Madras and another residing in Tellicherry in respect of a temple situated in Tellicherry, and it appeared that the former had gone to worship in the temple on one or two occasions in the past and might go there to worship in the future if business took him to Tellicherry, it was held that though he had a right, as a Hindu, to worship in the temple, he had not such an interest in the trust, as to entitle him to sue under this section.[169] Where the only interest which the plaintiffs claimed to have in the trust property was that they were members of the community to which the author of the trust belonged and were residents of the town in which a small part of his property was situated and the property was excluded from the trust, the interest of the plaintiffs (if any at all) was held to be merely sentimental and too remote.[170] The Lahore High Court has held that a right of worship constitutes an interest under the section,[171] but that a bare possibility of resort for worship does not give the plaintiffs a locus standi.[172] It has been held by the judicial committee that descendants of the founder of a public Hindu chattiram, although only in the female line, are "persons having an interest in the trust", and consequently they are entitled to maintain a suit under this section, even though they might never themselves make use of the chattiram.[173] A resident of the locality, who has some nexus or connection with the trust i.e., he has interest in the well-being or prosperity of the trust, or resident, of the locality where a temple is situated and who visits and participates in its rituals and religious functions or an old student of a public school, residing in the locality is presumed to have interest within the meaning of sub-section (1).[174]

A suit against a public trust under section 92 of the CPC is not like an ordinary suit where there is a lis between two parties and objection could be raised by either of the parties to suit with regard to impleadment of third party in the proceedings. Suit under section 92 being representative in character, all those interested in the trust could be considered as parties to the suit and can be impleaded.[175]

In the undermentioned Supreme Court case, the question whether a Muslim could claim to be interested in a particular trust was raised but not decided. However, it was pointed out that the trust in question, besides having religious objects, had also certain charitable objects such as provision of drinking water.[176]

[s 92.12] Leave of the Court

It may be noted that by Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act (104 of 1976) the consent of Advocate General is no longer required. The following text pertaining to the consent of Advocate General is retained to indicate the judicial opinions prevalent prior to said amendments and the same may be useful and relevant to the "leave of the court" which is now required to be taken after the said amendment.

Before the subsequent amendment of the section when sub-section (1), as it then stood, required the consent in writing of the Advocate-General, it was held that such consent had to be a specific permission given to one applicant by name and "another" was not a sufficient compliance with the terms of the sub-section.[177] Accordingly, the Bombay High Court held that a suit brought under this section by only one plaintiff, with the consent of the Advocate-General, was bad at its institution and that such a plaint could not be amended so as to add a second plaintiff, even if the Advocate-General were to consent to such amendment since the section nowhere spoke of the Advocate-General's consent to such an amendment. Such a suit, bad at its inception, could not be bettered by an amendment.[178] The Madras view, on the other hand, was that persons interested in the trust could be added as parties to the suit with the consent of the Advocate-General under O I, rule 10. Therefore, if a suit was brought by A alone[179] or by A and B, of whom B had no interest in the trust,[180] the plaint could be amended by adding C, a person interested, as the party plaintiff in either case with the Advocate-General's consent. The Madras High Court also took the view that if a suit had been brought by A and B, neither of whom had an interest, the plaint could be amended by adding the Advocate-General as a plaintiff on his application.[181] The Calcutta High Court also has held that once the consent of the Advocate-General or the collector had been obtained and the suit filed, any other party interested, may come in and carry on the suit without any further consent.[182] This difference of opinion would no longer be of any relevance since the authority granting the leave and the amendment is the court itself, and the court's power to grant amendment is wide, whenever the interest of justice requires it.

The court interpreted section 92 and observed that the leave of the court is a condition precedent for the institution of a suit against a public trust and if such a suit is instituted without leave of the court, the suit would not be maintainable. Further, the court said that as per the language of section 92 and as a rule of caution; the court should not grant leave till the notice is issued to the other party however, this condition is not a mandate.[183]

Another principle laid down was that the consent required by the section was a condition precedent to the institution of the suit to which such consent relates. No special form for such consent was necessary and such consent need not specify the reliefs for which it was granted.[184] Therefore, if no valid consent was obtained before the institution of the suit, the suit was liable to be dismissed or the plaintiff had to withdraw the suit with liberty to file a fresh suit. But the defect could not be rectified after the institution of the suit.[185] The Supreme Court held that where consent given by the Advocate-General was to several persons, such consent was a joint authority and had to be acted upon by all of them jointly. Therefore, a suit by some of them was not in compliance with the provisions of the section and a fresh consent would be necessary where it was granted to four persons and one of them died before the suit was filed.[186] Even when consent had been obtained, the suit had to be confined to the matters included in such consent and it was not competent to the court to grant reliefs other than those included in the terms of the consent.[187] Further, the suit could not be amended without the Advocate-General's sanction. Accordingly, the court must dismiss the suit where a new party was added as a defendant without the Advocate-General's sanction and possession of trust property is claimed from him.[188] The previous sanction of the Advocate-General was held to be necessary for adding such a new defendant.[189] The reason given was that the suit under this section was of a special nature and while deciding to give his consent, the Advocate-General had to have a host of considerations to take into account including the reliefs for which a decree would be prayed for.[190] But the High Court of Madras has held that where a suit is filed against the secretary of a charitable trust registered under the Societies Registration Act, 1860 and, an amendment is sought to join the society, the application is valid and no sanction of the Advocate-General is necessary, as the society sought to be added is a necessary party.[191] It is submitted that the better reason for so holding is that the society, through its secretary, was already represented and joining the society was merely formal.

In a later case, the Bombay High Court held that where amendments do not substantially change the character of the suit or enlarge the scope of the suit they can be made by the court itself without the sanction of the Advocate-General or the collector. Amendments which enlarge the scope of the suit, for instance, by allowing further reliefs without substantially changing its character may be made with the sanction of the Advocate-General or the collector. But amendments which substantially change the character of the suit would not be permissible even with the sanction of the Advocate-General or the collector.[192] However, where an amendment was formal and did not alter the nature of the suit, it was ordered.[193] Now that the court is the authority which would grant the leave as also the amendment, many of the difficulties which arose while considering applications for amendments would not arise, unless the amendment in question is such as to substantially change the character of the suit or enlarge its scope.

It was well-recognised that while giving his consent, the Advocate-General had to exercise his judgment in the matter and see not only whether the persons suing were persons who had an interest in the trust, but also, whether the trust was a public trust of the character defined in the section and whether there were prima facie grounds for thinking that there had been a breach of trust.[194] However, even if the consent given by the Advocate-General showed ex facie that he had not exercised his judgment, it was held not to be a fatal defect but a mere irregularity falling within the scope of section 99 and the decree passed in such suit was not liable to be interfered within appeal, unless the irregularity was such as affected the decision on merits.[195] These principles would, it is submitted, apply to the court while it is called upon to grant leave.

The Allahabad High Court has held that when an order has been made against the trustee of a charity under section 5(5) of the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act, 1920, and the trustee, without reasonable cause, fails to comply with it, he is deemed to have committed breach of trust affording ground for a suit under this section. Such a suit, so far as it is based on such failure, does not require the previous sanction of the Advocate-General and in such a suit, the court may pass a decree removing such trustee.[196] It is not necessary that such a suit should be filed by the party who secured the order under the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act, 1920, but the reliefs claimed must be such as arise from the failure to produce accounts.[197]

Even though the consent of the Advocate-General has been obtained for filing the suit under this section his consent has been held not to be necessary for compromising the suit.[198] But the court would scrutinise the terms of the compromise and reject them if they are such as to jeopardise the interest of the trust.[199] This would also be the position under the amended section where the court has granted the leave.

Suit after Leave.—A suit for the removal of trustees, seeking accounts and settlement of a scheme etc was filed, and months thereafter, an application for the above was filed and granted. It was held that institution of the suit prior to the grant of leave was without justification and therefore non est. As a suit can be instituted immediately after the grant of leave, there was nothing wrong in treating the suit to have been instituted on the date on which leave was obtained. The real test for the applicability of section 92 is to see whether the suit is fundamentally on behalf of the public for the vindication of a public right.[200] Permission under section 92 can be a tacit one.[201] Under section 92, leave of the court is a pre-condition or a condition precedent for the institution of a suit against a public trust. Having in mind the objective underlining section 92 and the language thereof, as a rule of caution, the court should normally, unless it is impracticable or inconvenient to do so, give a notice to the proposed defendant before granting leave under section 92, to institute a suit. The defendants could bring to the notice of the court, for instances, that the allegations made in the plaint are frivolous or reckless. They could also, in a given case, point out that the persons who were applying for leave under section 92 are doing so merely with a view to harass the trust or have such antecedents that it would be undesirable to grant leave to such persons. The desirability of such notice being given to the defendants however, cannot be regarded as a statutory requirement to be complied with before leave under section 92 can be granted as that would leave to unnecessary delay, and in a given case, cause considerable loss to the public trust. If a suit is instituted on the basis of such leave, granted without notice to the defendants, the suit would not, thereby, be rendered bad in law or not maintainable. The grant of leave cannot be regarded defeating or even seriously prejudicing any right of the proposed defendant, because it is always open to them to file an application for revocation of the leave which can be considered on merits and according to law.[202]

[s 92.13] Nature of the Order Granting Leave by the Court

Under the section, as it stood before its amendment,[203] and when what was required was the consent of the Advocate-General, there was some divergence of opinion on the question whether the proceedings for consent before the Advocate-General were quasi-judicial in character, and if they were open to challenge in writ proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution of India. In Abu Backer v AG[204] the High Court of Travancore-Cochin held that such proceedings were quasi-judicial and that view was shared by the Pepsu High Court.[205] But a contrary view was taken by the High Courts of Rajasthan,[206] Allahabad,[207] Madras[208] and Jammu and Kashmir.[209] A full bench of the Kerala High Court later on reconsidered the position and held reversing Abu Backer's case supra that the proceedings before the Advocate-General were only administrative.[210] Further, it has also been held that the function of the Advocate General not being a judicial one, notice by him to the trust or its trustees was not obligatory and that the absence of such notice did not invalidate the consent given by him. All that was required of him at that stage, was to satisfy himself that it was worthwhile to institute the suit.[211] Notice to the defendants before granting leave is not mandatory. The Supreme Court has now so held. Although as a rule of caution, such notice should be given, leave granted without notice is not bad in law. The proposed defendants can always apply for revocation of leave already granted.[212] The mere fact that the amended section now requires leave of the court in place of consent by the Advocate-General, does not seem to change the nature of the order of leave made by the court. In making such an order, the court, like the Advocate-General earlier, would no doubt have to apply its mind but that is only to satisfy itself whether the persons asking leave have interest in the trust, whether the trust is a public trust specified in the section and whether there are prima facie grounds for thinking that there has been a breach of the trust. At that stage the court would not have, before it, all the parties to the proposed suit nor the evidence from which it would be called upon to adjudicate any issue. All that it would have to see is whether it is in the interest of the trust to file the suit for which leave is sought.

An order passed under section 92 of the CPC either granting or refusing leave to institute a suit in respect of Pubic Trust, is administrative in nature and no notice is required to be issued to the other party. But it is incumbent upon the court to give reasons for its decision either granting or refusing leave. There can be no implied permission and the court has to pass a formal order though without notice to the defendant.[213]

On the question whether revision against an order granting leave to institute a suit against a public trust would be maintainable or not, the Madras High Court has held that granting leave by court under section 92 of the CPC is neither judicial nor quasi-judicial function, rather it is an administrative function. Therefore, neither section 151 of the CPC nor Article 227 of the Constitution could be invoked against such order. However, the aggrieved person may approach the same court to revoke the leave granted. But a revision against the said order is not maintainable.[214]

[s 92.14] Rejection of plaint after grant of leave—validity

Once leave was granted after hearing of the parties the question of rejecting the plaint under O VII, rule 11 did not arise. An application for rejection of the plaint should have been made prior to the leave having been granted or at the time when the appellants opposed grant of leave. Having lost in their opposition to grant of leave it was not open to the appellants to then apply for rejection of the plaint under O VII, rule 11 of the CPC.[215]

[s 92.15] Interlocutory Orders Pending Application for Leave—Validity

Even though leave to sue under section 92 of the CPC can be granted by the court on the prima facie satisfaction regarding the allegations made against the respondents either without giving notice to the respondents or after giving notice to the respondents and hearing them, there will be no properly instituted suit under law before formal leave is granted by the court under section 92 of the CPC and no interlocutory order in the proceedings can be passed by the court before granting permission to institute the suit under section 92(1) of the CPC.

Therefore, it the order passed by the lower court in the interlocutory application filed under Order XI, rule 14 and sections 141 and 151 of the CPC before granting leave to sue and proper institution of the suit is absolutely illegal and unsustainable.[216]

However, it has been held by Allahabad High Court that pending application seeking permission to file suit against public trust, the inherent powers of the high court can be invoked for passing suitable orders appointing receiver to prevent trust property from being wasted or destroyed.[217]

[s 92.16] Public Purposes

This section relates to those charities only in which the public are interested. The endowment must be for a public purpose of a charitable nature and the beneficial interest must be vested in the public in general or considerable sections thereof.[218] Section 92 does not apply to private trusts.[219] As to what are public and private endowments, see the undermentioned case.[220] > are ascertained or capable of being ascertained, in the latter they constitute a body which is incapable of ascertainment.

The distinction between a private and a public trust is, observed the Supreme Court in Deoki Nandan v Murlidhar:[221]

Where there is a deed of endowment, the decision whether the trust is public or private must turn on the construction of the deed, aided by such considerations, as are admissible in law. But where there is no deed[222] or where the origin of the trust cannot be determined, regard must be had to repute, the user of the trust property and the mode of its management and other circumstances.[223]

Existence of a public trust is essential for invoking section 92. The mere use of a Dharmashala by the public does not establish the creation of a public trust, in the absence of evidence of dedication of the property for public or charitable purpose. Hence, a suit in respect of the Dharmashala under section 92 is incompetent, if there is no evidence that the owners divested themselves or dedicated the property to a public or religious trust at any time. Thus, keeping in view the various circumstances, and the treatment of the property by the owners, the owners never dedicated the disputed property for a public or a charitable purpose and no public trust was created.[224] Where a school is established under a local Act (St Thomas School Act, Bengal Act 12 of 1923) which does not make the school a charitable trust, a suit regarding the school cannot be filed under section 92.[225]

The word "trust" is used in this section, not in any technical sense and would include Hindu or Mahommedan religious endowments.[226] A trust for a public Hindu temple is a trust for a public purpose of a religious nature within the meaning of this section.[227] Even where the property is dedicated to an idol and such idol being a juristic person is capable of holding such property, if the major portion of its income is used for doing pooja and services of the idol and towards management of melas wherein Hindus of the locality in general participate, the true beneficiaries of the trust are not the idols but the worshippers.[228] A permanent bequest by a Parsi for the purpose of muktad ceremonies is a trust for public purposes of a religious nature for such ceremonies include prayers for the spiritual welfare of all Zoroastrians and tend to the advancement of the Zoroastrian religion.[229] A Mahommedan wakf is a trust for public purposes of a charitable and religious nature,[230] and the trust may be for the sale of a property in India to provide funds for the establishment of a boarding house for Hajis at Mecca.[231] If the reliefs specified in the section are claimed with reference to a wakf, the section applies.[232] A muth, that is otherwise private, does not become public simply because some persons are fed when gurupuja is performed and a water pandal is maintained in the mutt during the hot season.[233] The real test is whether the user by the public is as of right.[234] An institution for imparting education is a trust and when it is established, with funds subscribed by public, it is a public trust.[235] But where a member of the public had always used a temple to which a dharmashala was attached and the surplus funds not required for the service of the temple were to be applied to feeding travellers and maintaining a sadavart, it was held that the intention of the founder was to devote the property to public purposes of a religious and charitable nature.[236] It was observed by the Supreme Court in Deokinandan v Murlidhar, that in the case of a temple, the beneficiaries are the worshippers and that therefore, whether the temple is public or private, must depend on whether the right to worship therein has been given to individuals or to the public at large. A trust is not the less a trust for a public purpose because the main object of the trust is the support of fakirs of a particular sect and the propagation of the tenets of that sect.[237] A scheme for loans for education to the poor and deserving persons of a specified community is one of a charitable nature though interest may be charged on the loans.[238] When the fund is intended to be used by the villagers for the purpose connected with the village community as a whole, or a substantial part of it, it is a public charity falling within the section whatever the nature of the purpose.[239] Where by the will of a person, considerable property is dedicated to public charitable purposes, a provision made therein for the right of private residence, in the property, of a near relative of the testator and the heirs of the relative, who are his descendants, will not render the dedication illusory.[240] But where a testator's intention is to benefit only the members of his family who are poor, there is no trust for a public purpose of a charitable character. However, where charity for public purposes is the expressed object of the settler, the purposes are not in any way defeated by an expression of the testator's wish that members of his family, as members of the general public, are eligible to benefit with other members of the public.[241]

A trust for political purposes is not one for a charitable purpose.[242] Where there is a public trust, section 92 does not become inapplicable by reason of some of the provisions in the endowment being private in character.[243] If there is a trust created by the public for a public charitable purpose, namely, for establishing and maintaining a school, the fact that a society therefore is registered would not change the character of the properties, which had already been impressed with the trust. Any addition to such properties would also have the same

[s 92.17] Any Alleged Breach of Trust

These words are not equivalent to "any alleged breach of any admitted trust". It is not, therefore, a condition precedent to the applicability of the section that the trust alleged by the plaintiffs is admitted by the defendants.[246] As this section is not confined to the case of admitted trusts, in a suit under this section, the court can determine whether the suit property is a wakf.[247] Public user of a temple for a long period without objection is strong evidence of the temple being a public temple.[248] The fact that income of certain properties of an institution has all along been applied to religious and charitable purposes is strong evidence for holding that those purposes are purposes for which the institution exists.[249]

In suit filed under section 92 claiming relief of removal of trustee and for framing of scheme of administration of the trust, it was held that the relief claimed in the suit is covered under section 92 (1) of the CPC and as such the suit was maintainable.[250]

[s 92.18] Where the Direction of the Court is Deemed Necessary for the Administration of any Such Trust

To bring a suit within this section, there must either be a breach of trust or the directions of the court must be necessary for the administration of the trust. 'The directions, which we referred to in this section, are such as are necessary for the carrying out of the trust and as are given to a trustee, either the existing trustee where there is one, or the new trustee, where one is to be appointed. The nature of the reliefs expressly mentioned shows what is meant by the words 'deemed necessary for administration of any such trust'.[251] The mere appointment of a Mutawalli is not a direction within the meaning of this section.[252]

[s 92.19] Whether Contentious or Not

These words were introduced to give effect to the decisions of the Calcutta[253] and Madras[254] High Courts that the section was not confined to non-contentious proceedings and that it applied to contentious proceedings also.

[s 92.20] Court Should Consider Evidence

The district judge, in exercise of power under section 92 of the CPC must act judiciously. If objections are filed before or after the Order under section 92 of the CPC is passed, granting or refusing the leave to file a suit, he is bound to take into consideration the documentary or oral evidence on record and examine the same critically and thereafter pass the Order.[255]

[s 92.21] Who May Be Sued Under This Section

It is not necessary that the defendant should be either a de jure or de facto trustee, otherwise no suit can be brought under this section in a case in which all trustees are dead or refuse to act.[256] It is not necessary to maintain a suit under this section that there should be a trustee. When there is a public trust, a suit can be filed against a person in possession of trust properties for framing a scheme.[257] A suit may be brought under this section against persons in possession of the trust property who claim adversely to the trust, that is, claim to be the owners of the property,[258] or against persons who deny the validity of the trust.[259] But a suit against one who is merely a servant for misappropriation of the trust property does not fall under this section.[260]

[s 92.22] Order for Security for Costs Against Defendant Trustee

Section 10 of the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act, 1920, provides that in any suit instituted under the present section, the court trying such suit may, if, on the application for the plaintiff and after hearing the defendant and making such inquiry as it thinks fit, is satisfied that such an order is necessary in the public interest, direct the defendant, either to furnish security for any expenditure incurred, or likely to be incurred, by the plaintiff in instituting and maintaining such suit, or to deposit from any money in his hands as trustee of the trust to which the suit relates, such sum as such court considers sufficient to meet such expenditure in whole or in part, and that when any money has been so deposited, the court may make over to the plaintiff, the whole or any part of such sum for the conduct of the suit, but that before making over any sum to the plaintiff, the court shall take security from the plaintiff for the refund of the same in the event of such refund being subsequently ordered by the court.

Though this clause did not occur in the corresponding section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, it was held by the High Courts of Calcutta, Bombay and Allahabad,[261] following an earlier decision of the Madras High Court,[262] that a suit for the removal of a trustee of a public trust and for the appointment of a new trustee, came under that section, though the removal of a trustee was not one of the reliefs specified in that section. Such a relief, it was said, was either covered by the words "such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require", or it was implied in the clause providing for the appointment of new trustees. On the other hand, the Madras High Court held, in a later case, that such a suit did not come under that section.[263] Sub-section (1), clause (a), of the present section gives effect to the Calcutta, Bombay and Allahabad decisions. A suit for the removal of a trustee must, therefore, be instituted in conformity with the provisions of this section. The High Court of Madras has held that a suit by the trustees of a temple for a declaration that the appointment by the devasthanam committee of the defendant as a trustee in place of a deceased trustee is invalid and for an injunction to restrain him from interfering with the management of the temple, is in effect, a suit for the removal of the defendant from the office of trustee, and that it cannot be instituted without the sanction required by this or the next section.[264] A similar view has been taken by the Patna High Court.[265] This view has been dissented from by the High Court of Bombay on the ground that to bring a suit within this section, there must either be an alleged breach of trust or the direction of the court must be deemed necessary for the administration of the trust and that neither of these conditions was present in the Madras case. The Bombay case was similar to the Madras case, and it was held that the case did not fall within this section.[266] The Madras case, though not overruled, was dissented from, in a later Full Bench case[267] and the Madras High Court has since held that a suit by a trustee to establish his right as hereditary trustee and for consequential relief, as the Temple Committee had appointed another person as sole trustee, did not fall within the section.[268] The section applies even when the plaintiff's prayer is for removal of a trustee de son tort or of a person wrongly appointed as trustee but even so, the suit is maintainable only if there is a breach of trust alleged or the direction of the court is sought.[269] Thus, a trustee making a gift in favour of his wife acts in breach of the trust.

Where leave to file a suit for removal of a trustee on ground alleged breach of trust is sought, the court is not required to embark upon a detailed examination of the material before it as if it is examining the evidence. The court has merely to see the existence of a prima facie case. The maintainability of the suit depends upon the allegations in the plaint. Thus, where there is specific allegation that a trustee created mortgage by subjecting the entire trust property into mortgage without taking necessary permission of the court, it was held that prima facie case was made out and as such leave can be granted.[270]

If after the death of such a trustee during the pendency of the suit, for his removal, his legal representatives are found to have been supporting the gift, they cannot be allowed to continue as trustees.[271]

In a suit under this section by two trustees of a temple, against a co-trustee, for his removal, the court has the power to investigate charges of misconduct made by the defendant against the plaintiffs and even to remove them.[272]

In framing a scheme of management under this section [see clause (g)], it is desirable to include a provision for the removal of trustees for breach of trust, for, where such a provision is included, the removal of a defaulting trustee may be obtained by an application in execution of the decree and the costs and trouble of a regular suit which would otherwise be probably necessary, may thus be avoided.[273] The procedure is necessary to avoid multiplicity of suits.[274] But where the scheme contains no such provision, it has been held that the trustees can be removed only in a suit, and not on an application under this section.[275]

As regards the removal of a trustee, the High Court of Bombay held that a mere lax and improvident management on the part of a manager of a shrine, fostered by the belief that he was entitled to manage the trust property free from control and very much as if he was its absolute owner, is not a sufficient ground for his removal.[276] The High Court of Allahabad also held that want of strict compliance with the objects of a wakf coupled with the absence of complaint from the beneficiaries, is not a good ground for removal of a mutawali.[277] The High Court of Bombay, in a later case, also said that there is no hard and fast rule that because the manager of a shrine has abrogated to himself the position of an owner, he should be removed from the office of a trustee and that each case must be decided with reference to its circumstances.[278] The Calcutta High Court has doubted this case and held that it applies only if there has been merely a misunderstanding and not a wilful default.[279] Accordingly, the Lahore High Court held that the Mujawar of a Khankah is an unfit person to continue in office if he denies the wakf character of the property and sets up an adverse claim to it.[280] A dictum of the privy council would suggest that the Bombay decisions are too indulgent. Lord Blanesburgh said that the standard of rectitude and accuracy expected from every trustee of charitable funds is of the highest, and that the standard must, in all circumstances, be maintained by the courts if the safety of property held upon such trust is not to be imperilled throughout British India.[281] In another case, the privy council held that the true rule is that if it be found by the court that the Mahant of a public religious and charitable endowment, in the exercise of his duties, has put himself in a position in which the court thinks that the obligations of his office in connection with the endowment, can no longer be faithfully discharged without danger to the endowment, that is a sufficient ground for his removal, if need be, from both the secular and religious offices held by him.[282]

The Patna High Court removed a Sajjadanashin from the management of a wakf for gross mismanagement, but allowed him to retain the spiritual office of Sajjadanashin.[283]

Where the secular and religious duties of a Mahant were interdependent and inseparably blended and have always been performed by the Mahants, the jurisdiction of the civil court under this section is not limited to the dealing with the Mahant in his capacity as Trustee and Manager of the properties and temporal affairs of the temple and deity but extends also to passing orders affecting his spiritual position as Shebait of the deity or his control over the spiritual affairs of the deity or endowment. The civil court, thus, has the power to remove him from his duties as well as to deprive him of the trusteeship and management of the temporal affairs of the endowment.[284] The Nagpur High Court has gone further and has held that the court can remove him from his secular and spiritual office.[285]

[s 92.24] Trustee

A person appointed trustee by the court, though his appointment may be impeached as being illegal, is a trustee within the meaning of clause (b), and not a trespasser so long as his appointment is not set aside.[286] A de facto trustee is also a trustee for the purpose of this section.[287] So is a trustee de son tort, that is, a person who has not been appointed trustee, but who takes charge of the trust property and purports to manage it as trust property.[288] A mahant or a shebait, who has accepted the office, or acknowledged himself as such, is incapable of asserting any hostile title against a trustee, such disability being implicit in any person who holds a fiduciary position in relation to another.[289] However, a suit against a mere trespasser does not fall within the ambit of this section. A trespasser is different from a trustee de son tort in that a trespasser claims adversely to the trust and so cannot be deemed to be trustee while a trustee de son tort does not claim adversely though his title to act as a trustee is defective.[290] The Acharya of a temple is a "constructive" trustee within the meaning of this section and he may be sued as such.[291] And so is the head of a mutt.[292] When there is a public trust or charity, the jurisdiction of the court to take action with respect to it under section 92 is not ousted by reason of the management being vested in a committee registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1956. It makes no difference in the application of the section whether the trustee is an individual or a company.[293] A mutawalli empowered by the scheme to appoint his own successor, cannot appoint his successor's successor and so on.[294]

[s 92.25] Clause (b): Appointing New Trustee

A suit for the appointment of new trustees of a temple on the ground that the defendants are not lawful trustees and that the office of trustees is therefore vacant, is a suit under clause (b) of this section.[295]

Under this section, the court, in sanctioning a scheme, may provide for the appointment of additional or new trustees though such appointment may not be in conformity with the original constitution of the trust or with the rules in force in respect to it.[296] New trustees, appointed under a scheme, have the right to execute the decree.[297]

A suit for an injunction against the defendants, permanently restraining them from obstructing the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the property attached to a temple according to the turn of the plaintiff, falls under this section.[298] In a suit for the removal of trustees and appointment of new trustees, the court can, in a proper case, appoint an interim receiver.[299]

In a suit for appointment of trustee, there was nothing to show that anybody either from the plaintiffs or from the general public contributed for renovation, reconstruction of the suit property and the conduct of the plaintiff and general public also indicated that the suit property was never dedicated or meant for public charitable purposes, rather it continued to be the exclusive property of the successors of an individual. It was held by the Himachal Pradesh High Court that suit for appointment of trustee was not maintainable, more so when successors at no point of time divested their ownership of the suit property.[300]

[s 92.26] Application for Appointment of New Trustees

Section 92 mandates that where any direction is sought from the court for administration of any trust, two or more persons having an interest in the trust may institute a suit with the leave of the court. Even for appointing a new trustee, the preconditions mentioned in section 92 have to be complied. The application of the petitioner dated was made solely by the petitioner and it was not moved by "two or more persons" and neither was the application made by "leave of the court". The power in the aforesaid application was for appointing a new trustee. The application of the petitioner under section 151 of the CPC was referable to section 92 of the CPC and since the preconditions of section 92 of the CPC had not been complied with the application was not maintainable.[301]

Where certain persons apply for being appointed trustees of a certain wakf without specifically praying for the removal of the existing trustees, the purpose of the application is nothing but the removal of the trustees and the relief sought for, falls within the purview of section 92(1). In such a case, though this section does not expressly bar such an application, it does so by necessary implication and the court has no jurisdiction to entertain such an application.[302]

[s 92.27] Clause (cc): Direction to Deliver Possession

This clause was inserted by the Civil Procedure Code Amendment Act, 1956. Before the enactment of this clause, there was some controversy whether a decree under this section directing the removal of a trustee could also provide for delivery of possession of the trust properties by him, to the persons entitled to it. The object of the clause is not to enlarge the existing powers of the court. It was added as and by way of abundant caution and to dispel any doubt that the court had the power to give such a direction.[303]

[s 92.28] Clause (d): Directing Accounts and Inquiries

Under the corresponding section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, the High Court of Bombay held that a suit to remove the trustees of a public charity, and to compel them to account, and to make good the losses sustained by the charity, by reason of default on the part of the trustees, and for the appointment of new trustees, was a suit within that section, though a relief for accounts was not one of the reliefs specifically mentioned in that section. Such a relief, it was said, was covered by the words "further or other relief".[304] The present clause gives legislative recognition to the above decision.[305] A relief against a defendant trustee for such amount, as may be found due on accounts being taken, cannot be claimed under this section.[306] Likewise, back accounting cannot be ordered in the absence of diversion of funds such as would amount to misappropriation, malversation or breach of trust.[307]

[s 92.29] Clause (e): Apportionment of Income

A suit for a declaration as to what proportion of the trust property (e.g., offerings placed by devotees before an idol) should be allocated to the pujaris (officiating priests) and what to the guravs (temple servants), relates to a relief covered by clause (e) of the section.[308]

[s 92.30] Clause (f): Authorising Trust Property To Be Let

This clause enables a trustee to obtain the sanction of the court for letting, selling, mortgaging or exchanging the whole or any part of the trust property. The clause is an enabling provision and should not be understood as circumscribing the powers of trustees of ordinary administration of trust property, which would include letting, selling, etc for the benefit of the trust. The clause was put in the section inter alia to authorise the court to permit alienation of trust property where, for example, there is a prohibition in this regard in the trust deed.[309] An application for this purpose is not a suit under this section.[310]

[s 92.31] Clause (g): Settling a Scheme

This section vests a very wide discretion in the court, as regards directions to be given for the administration of public trusts. In giving effect to the provisions of the section and in appointing new trustees and settling a scheme, the court is entitled to take into consideration not merely the wishes of the founder, so far as they can be ascertained, but also the past history of the institution and the way in which the management is carried on in conjunction with other existing conditions that may have grown up since its foundation.[311] While framing a scheme, the district court or the high court in appeal may provide that powers with regard to certain matters which may arise in course of administration, may be reserved to the district court. Such a provision does not mean enlargement of jurisdiction. It only means that the district court, which has framed the scheme, is empowered to implement or work out the scheme.[312] The court can also consider the claims, moral if not legal, of the archakas and make provision for protecting them.[313] When a Mahant was appointed as manager of a temple by the appropriate authorities, the fact that after him the office of trustee was held by his heirs in succession would not confer on them a right to hereditary trusteeship.[314] The court may refuse to frame a scheme where no mismanagement is proved.[315] But when trust property had been diverted and the object of the trust had not been carried out and the trustee had not accounted for income received, the court can frame a scheme. The Madras High Court has said that a scheme decree, if general, is, by its very nature, a declaratory decree; but that if particular provisions provide for enforcement of parts of the scheme, such portions of the scheme decree are executable;[316] and in one case the same high court enforced a scheme by the appointment in execution of a receiver of properties which the scheme had placed under the control of a temple trustee.[317] But when there is no trust — public or private — as for example, when co-owners appoint a manager for management of their common properties, there can be no question of the court framing a scheme. The remedy of the co-owner who is aggrieved, is to file a suit for partition.[318]

A scheme framed by the court may be varied, if good cause is shown.[319] Such a variation can be prayed for by an application under section 151.[320] A decision on such an application made under section 57(9) of the Madras Hindu Religious Endowments Act, 1926 amounts to a decree within the meaning of section 2(2) of the CPC.[321] But where a scheme is once settled, it precludes a suit to establish a private right to manage the property (e.g., hereditary trusteeship) which, if established, would interfere with the scheme settled by court.[322]

The court has power under this section to frame a scheme in respect of a public temple, though it is under the control of a Temple Committee constituted under the Religious Endowments Act 20 of 1863.[323] But where a trust is a private trust, e.g., for a family idol, the settlement of a scheme under this section is inappropriate.[324] However, in the case of a debutter, where the deity is the legal owner of the property, the assistance of the court may be invoked for the settlement of a scheme of management where all the parties interested are impleaded and the deity is represented by a disinterested third party.[325] The court has jurisdiction even apart from this section to frame a scheme for a private trust in appropriate cases.[326]

In decrees passed under this section, liberty is generally reserved to the parties to apply to the court as occasion arises; (as to the effect, of such a clause, see the undermentioned case.)[327] The Madras High Court has held that liberty may be reserved to parties to apply to the court to fill any vacancy in the office of a trustee appointed under a scheme;[328] but the same high court has also held that liberty to apply for a modification of the scheme or for a relief coming under section 92 is ultra vires,[329] and that a clause in a scheme settled by court which has the effect of investing the court with wide and general powers and duties of superintendence is ultra vires,[330] and the Rangoon High Court has followed these decisions.[331] But such clauses have appeared in schemes approved by the Privy Council;[332] and the Bombay High Court holds that the original consent of the Advocate-General is sufficient to give the court seizing of the case and the court is competent to entertain applications, for liberty to apply is reserved in order to avoid multiplicity of actions.[333] But if the court in the exercise of powers reserved in a scheme of management of a wakf appoints a mutawalli, a disappointed candidate for the office of Mutawalli has no locus standi to appeal.[334] The Allahabad and the Calcutta High Courts have held that a court settling a scheme has jurisdiction to include a provision in the scheme reserving to itself, the power to modify the scheme in future suo motu or otherwise, and that the power of the court to settle a scheme for the administration of a trust is sufficiently comprehensive to include a provision which makes the scheme alterable by the court, if it is found necessary in future.[335] The question is now concluded by the decision of the Supreme Court in Raje Ananda Rao v Sham Rao[336] in which it has been held overruling the decision in Viraraghavachari v AG of Madras[337] that a suit under this section is analogous to an administrative action and that a provision in the scheme giving opportunity to the parties to move for modification thereof by application in the suit is intra vires but while such a clause is valid, the power reserved should not be used so as to substitute a new scheme[338] and should be exercised only for substantial reasons and for the benefit of the trust.[339] But where the court has settled a scheme reserving the right to the existing trustees to make an application for filling in a vacancy of a trustee, a beneficiary under the trust cannot apply to the court for that purpose. His remedy is by way of a suit.[340]

Where it is quite clear that a public trust has been properly constituted by will, it is not necessary that a suit for the administration of the estate of the testator should precede a suit under this section. But, it is otherwise, where it is doubtful whether there would be funds sufficient for the charitable bequest. In the latter case, an administration suit may become necessary before any scheme can he framed under this section.[341] Where the trust funds are not ascertained and the defendants are accountable for the management of the trust property, the proper course is to take the accounts before a scheme is framed.[342]

In a suit brought under this section in respect of a public religious trust, the court has jurisdiction to frame a scheme regulative of the conduct of the institution as the owner of moneys and property which it possesses, even in cases where the acharya, as the head of its spiritual and temporal affairs, is worshipped by the members of the sect as the representative of the God. In drawing up the scheme, however, the court must not encroach upon the rights and prerogatives of the acharya as a religious preceptor of the community, but while the institutional trust must be respected, the sect and body of worshippers for whose benefit it was set up have the protection of the court against their property being the subject of abuse, speculation and waste.[343]

There has been a divergence of opinion on the question whether a provision in a scheme decree is executable. There is a large body of decisions which hold that it is not executable — whether directory or mandatory.[344] But the contrary view has also been taken in some decisions.[345] If it is purely declaratory, it cannot be executed.[346] A direction made in accordance with the new clause (cc) is clearly executable.

Where provision is made in a scheme for an application being made to the court for the purposes mentioned in it, and an order is made on the application, the order is not one in execution, and no appeal lies from it.[347] The appeal can, however, be treated as an application for revision, if the applicant has challenged the jurisdiction of the court to make an amendment in the scheme.[348]

[s 92.32] Clause (h): Further or Other Relief

"The words "granting such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require", must be read with what has preceded as referring to further relief to which the party may be entitled which arises out of the existence of the trust in respect of which the suit has been brought." Therefore, where the only relief claimed in a suit is for a declaration that certain property is wakf property, the suit does not come within the purview of this section. Such a relief does not come within the words "further or other relief".[349] 'The general clause dealing with "further or other relief..." ought to be read with the five preceding specific clauses, and nature of the reliefs, which may be properly granted under it, is of the same character as the reliefs which may be granted under the preceding clauses. The five specific clauses are not merely illustrative, but furnish an indication of the nature of the relief, which may be granted in a suit under this section'.[350] In section 92 (1)(h), the words "further or other relief" do not authorise change of character of the original trust onto a different one or alteration of its objects. A suit cannot be filed to convert a trust for providing food into a trust for educational purposes.[351]

The question as to the precise scope of clause (h) is of great importance, for, if the words "such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require" mean relief of the same nature as clauses (a)–(g), a relief in a suit against strangers to a trust, for a declaration that property in their possession is trust property, would be outside the scope of this section as it would not be of the same nature as clauses (a)–(g) and the suit could be maintained without the consent of the Advocate-General. This question arose in Abdul Rahim v Abu Mahomed Barkat Ali,[352] where the Privy Council held that a suit for a declaration that property belongs to a wakf can be maintained by Mahommedan interested in the wakf without the consent of the Advocate-General. It was argued in that case on behalf of the defendants that the words "further or other relief" must be taken, not in connection with the previous clauses (a)–(g), but in connection with the nature of the suit namely, any relief other than (a)–(g), that the case of an alleged breach of an express or constructive trust may require in the circumstances of any particular case, and that a breach of trust having been alleged the suit came under this section and it could not be maintained without the consent of the Advocate-General. But this argument was not accepted and it was held that the words "further or other relief" in clause (h) must, on general principles, be taken to mean relief of the same nature as clauses (a)–(g), and that, as the relief for a declaration that the property belonged to the wakf was not of that nature, the suit was outside the scope of the section. Their Lordships said that the construction suggested on behalf of the defendants would cut down substantive rights which existed before the enactment of the Code of 1908, and a Code regulating procedure should not be construed as having that effect in the absence of express words. Before the enactment of that Code, a person interested in a public trust had the right to maintain a suit for such a declaration as the above without the consent of the Advocate-General, and this is the substantive right referred to above. It follows that when a suit is brought for some of the reliefs mentioned in this section with the consent of the Advocate-General, and a prayer for a declaration is afterwards added and strangers to the trust are joined as defendants, the suit ceases to that extent to be one under section 92 or of a representative character.

The Nagpur court has held that possession can be taken by a decree under this section from the manager of the property, if he has taken possession wrongfully and has been mismanaging the property and that such a relief in the decree will fall under this clause.[353]

There is a conflict of opinion as to whether a prayer that a deed of trust may be construed by the court and that the true scope and object of the trust fund may be determined by the court comes within the words 'further or other relief'.[354]

[s 92.33] Suits Outside the Scope of the Section

This section does not apply unless—

(i) there is a trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature;

(ii) there is a breach alleged of such trust, or the direction of the court is deemed necessary for the administration of such trust; and

(iii) the relief claimed is one or other of the reliefs mentioned in the section.[355]

If all the three conditions mentioned above are fulfilled, the suit must be instituted in conformity with the provisions of this section, that is to say, it must be instituted either by the Advocate-General or by two or more persons interested in the trust with the consent of the Advocate-General[356] now with the leave of the court; if it is not so instituted, if must be dismissed. The applicability of the section is to be determined on the allegations made in the plaint and irrespective of the written statement.[357] But if any one of the three conditions is absent, the suit is outside the scope of this section, and it may be instituted in the ordinary manner.[358] The bar enacted by this section would apply even if some of the reliefs claimed fall within the section.[359] The mere fact that a suit relates to a public charitable or religious trust, or that it relates to property held on such trust is not sufficient to bring it within the scope of this section.[360] At the same time a suit which is clearly within the scope of this section cannot be treated as one outside its scope, because in addition to reliefs under this section, it claims reliefs not allowed by the section.[361] The Punjab & Haryana High Court, relying upon Saraswati v Ramji Tripathi,[362] held that every suit claiming the relief specified in section 92 cannot be brought under section 92 because section 92 envisages suits of a special nature which pre-supposes the existence of a public trust of religious or charitable character. Such a suit can proceed only on the allegation that there is a breach of such trust or that the directions of the court is necessary for the administration of the trust. Furthermore, the plaintiff must pray for anyone or more of the relief that are mentioned in the section. If the allegation of breach of trust is not substantiated or if the plaintiff has not made out a case for any direction by the court for proper administration of the trust, the very foundation of the suit under section 92 would fall.[363] The court under section 92 is not competent to appoint a Special Officer for framing schemes for management of Math property.[364] In the absence of any material placed before the court to show that there had been a creation of endowment—either religious or charitable, it cannot be assumed that the property did not cease to be a property of creator, irrespective of the fact that the people at large do come to the temple to offer prayers and to sing bhajans and come to stay in Dharmashala.[365] Section 52(1) of Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950 makes section 92 and section 93 of the CPC inapplicable to public trust registered under the Act.[366]

The suit contemplated by this section is a representative suit.[367] Suits brought, not to vindicate or establish the right of the public in respect of a public trust, but to remedy an infringement of an individual right or to vindicate a private right, do not fall within this section.[368] The mere fact that a suit claims relief specified in the section does not bring the suit under it. It must be brought by individuals as representatives of the public for vindication of public rights. In deciding whether a suit falls within this section, the court must have regard to the capacity in which the plaintiffs are suing and the purpose for which it is brought. Where the right to the office of a trustee is asserted or denied the suit is outside the section.[369] Such suits are instituted in the ordinary manner and not under this section. The following are instances of suits of this character:

(i) A suit by a person claiming to be a co-trustee of a certain tiara and entitled as such to a share with the defendant trustee in the management and profits thereof: Miya Vali Ulla v Sayad Bava.[370] A suit by a person claiming to be a trustee against a rival claimant for management of the institution as such trustee: Jamiat Dawat v Mohamad Sharif.[371]

(v) It has been held by the High Court of Allahabad that the right of a Mahommedan to use a mosque is not a public but a private right. It is like the right to use a private road; anyone who has the right may maintain a suit in respect of it.[376] To such a suit, the provisions of this section do not apply. Thus, it has been held that any Mahommedan entitled to frequent a mosque may, if property belonging to the mosque is sold by the manager of the mosque for his private debts, maintain a suit for a declaration that the property is, wakf property, and to set aside the sale and evict the purchaser; Zafaryag Ali v Baktawar Singh.[377] Similarly, if land attached to a mosque is encroached upon, any Mahommedan entitled to use the mosque may sue to evict the trespasser. And if the mosque be in a dilapidated condition and a Mahommedan frequenting the mosque, or one looking after it, is desirous of repairing it, but is obstructed by a third person, he may maintain a suit to establish his right to repair the mosque (Jawahar v Akbar Hussain).[378] The contrary, however, has been held by the High Court of Calcutta in Jan Ali v Ram Nath.[379] According to these decisions, the right sought to be established in suits, such as the above, is not a private but a public right, and it can only be enforced by a suit brought in conformity with the provisions of this section. But in a later Calcutta case (Mohiuddin v Saviduddin),[380] it was pointed out that the reasoning of the Allahabad cases, showing that the right of worship of each worshipper in a Mahommedan mosque or religious endowment was an independent right wholly irrespective of the rights of the other worshippers, was correct. The view taken in the earlier Calcutta decisions is, it is submitted, not correct,[381] and it cannot be sustained since the decision of the Privy Council in Abdur Rahim v Mahomed Barkat Ali.[382]

This was held in Darshan Lal v Shibji.[386] When an alienation is made by the Shebait acting adversely to the interest of the idol, a worshipper can file a suit, the reason being that the idol is in the position of a minor and when the person managing its property puts it in jeopardy a worshipper of such an idol is clothed with an ad hoc power of representation. In a suit filed against a Public Trust, where it was projected as one for vindicating public rights, the Supreme Court held that the emphasis in the suit was on certain purely private and personal disputes and as such the leave granted to file the suit was not legal.[393]

> To put it differently, it is not every suit claiming reliefs specified in Section 92 that can be brought under the Section; but only the suits which besides claiming any of the reliefs are brought by individuals as representatives of the public for vindication of public rights. As a > decisive factor the Court has to go beyond the relief and have regard to the capacity in which the plaintiff has sued and the purpose for which the suit was brought. The Courts have to be careful to eliminate the possibility of a suit being laid against public trusts under Section 92 by persons whose activities were not for protection of the interests of the public trusts.[394]

The case, Aurobindo Ashram Trust v R Ramanathan[395], emanated from a suit under section 92 praying that the trustees of Sri Aurobindo Ashram Trust be removed and new trustees be appointed since they had failed the philosophy of Sri Aurobindo and the mother. The averments concentrated around a book titled "The Lives of Sri Aurobindo" by one Peter Heehs which allegedly contained deliberate and baseless distortions relating to the life of Sri Aurobindo. Leave to sue was granted by the trial court to the respondents and the summons was then issued in the civil suit to the appellants who preferred an IA to revoke the leave granted. The trial court held that only where leave is granted under section 92 without notice to the defendants, the defendants would have a right to apply for revocation of leave and thereby rejected the contention. The high court in appeal took into consideration the law laid down in Swami Paramatamanand Saraswati v Ramji Tripathi[396] and Vidyodaya Trust v Mohan Prasad R[397] and reversed the trial court's judgment. The Supreme Court, speaking through Justice Lokur held that only the allegations made in the plaint ought to be looked into in the first instance to determine whether the suit filed lies within the ambit of section 92 of the CPC. It was also reiterated that if the allegations in the plaint indicate that the suit has been filed to remedy the infringement of a private right or to vindicate a private right, then the suit would not fall within the ambit of section 92 of the CPC. In deciding whether the suit falls within the ambit of section 92 of the CPC, the court must consider the purpose for which the suit was filed and reversed the high court's judgment.

In a case from Tamil Nadu, where the trustees proposed modification in the original trust, it was held by the high court that consultation with the beneficiaries of the original deed was necessary. Exclusion of the beneficiaries of the original trust by creating new trust deed was not valid. But since the trust was a private one, it was held that section 92 was not applicable.[398]

[s 92.35] Suits for a Declaration and for Possession of Trust Property Against Third Persons, That Is, Strangers to the Trust that the suit ought to have been instituted in conformity with the provisions of this section. This decision would appear to be no longer law.[410]

Suits against strangers to the trust, that is, against trespassers and against transferees from trustees, for a declaration that property in their hands is trust property and for possession, are outside the scope of this section. The reason is that the relief claimed is not one of those mentioned in clauses (a)–(h). Such suit must be instituted in the ordinary manner and not under this section.[399] This has been definitely held by the Privy Council in Abdur Rahim v Mahomed Barkat Ali[400]. The following are instances of suits of this character:

But in a case where the plaintiff not only asked for a declaration as against the defendant that a temple was a public trust of a religious nature, but also alleged that the defendant was under a contractual obligation to hold the profits of a shop in the temple premises for the use of the temple and prayed for an account of the profit – –the suit was one for directing accounts against a constructive trustee Abdur Rahman's case did not apply and the sanction of the Advocate-General was necessary.[415] It has been held that though a stranger to a trust is not a necessary nor a proper party to a suit under section 92, where the stranger receives money or property from the trustee, knowing that it is a part of trust property and has been handed over to him in breach of the trust, he is a constructive trustee of the trust property and a relief against him can be claimed under this section.[416] But it has been held that though no relief against third parties could be granted in a suit under this section, there is no bar to their being impleaded as parties when that is allowed by the general law.[417]

A common type of suits under this section is a suit against the trustee of a charity for his removal on the ground that he has unlawfully alienated the trust property treating it as his private property, and for the appointment of a new trustee in his place. It is clear that such a suit is within this section for the relief claimed is one under clause (a) of this section, and the ground on which the relief is claimed is a breach of trust in alienating the property. It is also clear that the court cannot remove the trustee unless it finds that the property is trust property and that it has been wrongfully alienated by the trustee. The question to be considered is whether the court has power, in the absence of the alienee, to declare that the property is trust property and that the alienation is unlawful. It has been held by the High Court of Madras that an alienee is not a proper party to a suit under this section, and that if he is joined as a party, the suit against him should be dismissed. But this, it has been held, does not preclude the court from determining, in a suit against the trustee alone, whether the property is trust property, and declaring, if it is so found, that it is trust property. But the transferee, not being a party to the suit, is not bound by the declaration, and if a suit is subsequently brought against him for possession of the property, it is open to him to contend that the property is not trust property.[418] A similar view has been taken by the High Court of Calcutta.[419] On the other hand, it has been held by the High Court of Allahabad that the alienee, though not a necessary party to the suit[420] is a proper party,[421] and that if he is joined as a party, and the court declares that the property is trust property, he will be bound by such declaration in a subsequent suit for possession against him.[422] In a later decision, the Madras High Court has held that persons who deny that title of the trust and on that footing claim to be in possession of property which is necessary to the proper discharging of that trust, are proper parties to the suit.[423] The High Court of Bombay has gone further and held that the transferee is not only a proper but a necessary party,[424] and that no such declaration can be such as the above, a decree cannot be passed against the alienee directing him to deliver possession of the property to the plaintiffs, though he is a party to the suit, as such relief is neither specifically mentioned in the section nor implied in clause (h), and that the remedy of the newly appointed trustee is to institute a separate suit for possession against him.[425] The proposition that the court has no power under this section to pass a decree against an alienee directing him to deliver possession to the plaintiffs is in accordance with a ruling of the Privy Council where it was held that a relief or a remedy against third persons, that is, strangers to the trust, was not within the scope of this section.[426] It is submitted that the court also has no power under this section to make a declaration that the property in suit is not trust property so as to bind the alienee, such a relief also being outside the scope of the section. The Rangoon High Court, however, has gone further and holds that if in a suit under section 92, a claim to relief against alienees who are strangers to the trust is added, there is a misjoinder both of parties and causes of action, and that unless the plaint is amended, the suit cannot be entertained. This view was approved by the Calcutta High Court in Abdul Majid v Akthar.[427] In such a suit, praying:

(i) for the removal of a trustee;

(ii) for the vesting of property in new trustees; and

(iii) for a declaration that a mortgage of the property by the trustee was invalid. The first two reliefs were granted but the suit as against the mortgagee was dismissed.[428] Where a property included in the schedule to the plaint, in a suit under this section, had been alienated by the defendant, and he pleaded that it was not trust property, and the alliance was not a party to the suit, it was held that the question — whether that property belonged to the trust — could not be gone into in the suit.[429]

[s 92.37] Suits only for a Declaration of Trust

This section presupposes the existence of a trust for the administration of which it is necessary to make provision. Hence, it does not apply to a suit brought solely for the purpose of having a declaration of the court that certain property is wakf, the fact of endowment being denied on the other side.[430] Nor does this section apply to a suit brought merely for a declaration that the plaintiffs are trustees of an endowment.[431] Even if the trust is proved to be a public trust, if facts are not established in support of the reliefs set out in the section, no declaration can be given, for the very foundation of the cause of action under this action does not arise.[432] Where in consequence of a bequest for education of Hindu boys and girls, a representative suit is instituted on behalf of Hindu boys and girls for a declaration of trust in their favour, the suit does not fall within this section.[433]

[s 92.38] Suits for a Declaration That the Defendant is Not Properly Appointed Trustee and for an Injunction Against Him

See note above: "clause (a): Removing any Trustee".

[s 92.39] Courts Competent to Try Suits Under this Section

A suit under this section must be instituted either in the principal civil court of original jurisdiction or in any other court empowered in that behalf by the state government. But this does not empower the state government to direct the transfer of a particular suit pending in a district court to a particular judge. The authority must be a general one to try suits under this section.[434]

The expression "principal civil court of original jurisdiction" in this section does not include the court of an additional district judge appointed under section 8 of the Civil Courts Act, XII of 1887[435] unless the district judge has under sub-section (2) of that section, assigned to him the functions of a district judge relating to all suits cognisable by the district judge.[436] If the suit falls under this section but is filed in the munsif's court, the plaint must be returned for presentation to the district court.[437]

The issue in the case was: Can the court of an additional district judge grant leave under section 92 of the CPC to institute a suit against Public Charities, when there is no notification under section 7(2) of the Kerala Civil Courts Act, 1957 authorising it to institute such a suit; and whether the district judge make over a petition seeking such leave to the additional district judge?

The court observed that as per section 3(17) of the General Clauses Act, 1897 it defines "District Judge" to mean the judge of a "Principal Civil Court of Original Jurisdiction". Further, court said that the expression "Principal Civil Court of Original Jurisdiction" used in section 92 of the CPC, is intended solely to refer to the "District Judge" and not to an additional district judge; and therefore, a suit under section 92 can only be instituted in such court and no other.

Moreover, court noted that the Civil Courts Act, 1887 refers to only one district judge, called the "District Court", with additional district judges being appointed to that court. Hence, there is no "Additional District Court" as per the Act, but only additional district judges appointed to a district court. Also, the court noted that the expression "instituted" is used in section 96 whereas, an additional district judge as per section 4(2) of the Civil Courts Act, 1887, can only dispose of the matters assigned to him by a district judge. Furthermore, only those matters can be instituted before additional district judge which is notified in the gazette and there is no notification issued by the high court, enabling institution of a suit under section 92 of the CPC in the court of the additional district judge. Thus, making over a petition to the additional district judge by the district judge is misconceived in law.[438]

Where a suit is brought against an executor in the court of a subordinate judge for the administration of the testator's estate, the mere fact, that the will contains directions for applying portions of the estate to charitable purposes, does not bring the suit within this section. The subordinate judge has jurisdiction to entertain such a suit, but if any questions relating to charitable bequests arise before him and a scheme has to be framed under this section, he should hold the amount appropriated for charities in the possession of a receiver until the Advocate-General or the collector obtains the directions of the district court.[439]

Where a suit under this section was instituted in the subordinate court, Alleppey, which was not competent to entertain it, and the district judge, who had jurisdiction to hear it, passed an Order under section 24 of the CPC withdrawing it to his own file, it was held that the order of withdrawal and the subsequent proceedings consequent thereon were all null and void.[440] Likewise it is not competent to a district judge to transfer a suit under this section to a subordinate court.[441]

[s 92.40] Where Some of the Reliefs are Outside the Scope of the Section

When some of the reliefs claimed are outside the scope of the section, the court is not justified in returning the plaint. It should require the plaintiff to amend his plaint by confining himself to reliefs within this section, or it might wait till it came to pronounce judgment and dismiss the suit as to reliefs without the section.[442] So in a suit by worshippers for the appointment of trustees and for the eviction of trespassers, the court may appoint trustees without passing a decree in eviction.[443] Conversely, when a suit is filed for obtaining reliefs to which the plaintiff is entitled under the general law, he does not become disentitled to them by claiming in addition reliefs which fall within this section.[444] But worshippers cannot sue under O I, rule 8, to recover the property unless they are supported by the trustees. They should sue to remove the trustees first and then let the new trustees sue in eviction.[445] When a trustee dies, the party entitled to succeed to the management may sue to establish his right. The section does not apply to such a suit and if objection is raised to his appointment on the ground of misconduct, the objector should be referred to a suit under section 92.[446]

The Legislature has, by enacting this section, constituted a special tribunal for the trial of a class of suits which it has removed from the cognizance of the ordinary courts. Those are suits for any of the reliefs specified in sub-section (1) in cases where there is an "alleged breach of any express or constructive trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature", or "where the direction of the court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust". This class of suits can only be instituted in the special courts mentioned in this section, and they can only be brought either by the Advocate-General or by two or more persons having an interest in the trust and having obtained the leave of the court. This is enacted by sub-section (2) of the present section. Under the corresponding section 539 of the Codes of 1877 and 1882, it was doubtful whether every suit of the character described above was to be instituted in the manner aforesaid. Sub-section (2) makes it clear that every such suit must be so instituted; it enacts that no suit claiming any of the reliefs specified in sub-section (1) shall be instituted without the consent of the Advocate-General,[447] now leave of the court. But sub-section (2) must be read with sub-section (1). Reading sub-section (2) with sub-section (1) it follows that it is not every suit claiming any of the reliefs specified in sub-section (1) that should be brought with the leave of the court, but those suits only which besides claiming any of those reliefs are brought by individuals as representatives of the general public. Accordingly, a Full Bench of the Madras High Court has held that a suit by a trustee of a public religious trust against a co-trustee, for accounts, does not fall within this section. though the relief claimed is the one specified in sub-section (1), clause (d). Such a suit is not a representative suit. The relief is sought not in the larger interest of the public but merely for the purpose of vindicating the private rights of one of the trustees and of enabling him to discharge the duties and liabilities which are imposed upon him by the trust.[448] Another Full Bench of the same court has held, that the nature of the relief claimed in the suit itself would not bring the suit within section 92. The capacity in which the plaintiff was suing and the purpose for which the suit has been brought are material factors. Thus the section does not apply where the general trustees of a public temple sue the trustees of certain offerings given to the deity for accounts,[449] for, in the suit, the right of the public is not sought to be enforced but only the personal rights of the trustees qua trustees. When a trustee sued his two co-trustees for the settlement of the scheme of management by rotation, the court said that if the suit was brought on the basis of an agreement between the trustees or on the terms of the will of the founder of the trust, it would be a suit to assert a private right and section 92 would not apply; but as there was no such agreement or will, the learned judge held that the suit was a representative suit and that section 92 did apply.[450]

The doubt referred to in the preceding paragraph arose in the following way. The Code of 1859 did not contain any special provisions for the institution of suits relating to public charities. Such provisions were introduced for the first time by section 539 of the Code of 1877. They were reproduced in section 539 of the Code of 1882, and they now find a place in sub-section (1) of the present section. But neither the Code of 1877 nor the Code of 1882 contained any provision corresponding to sub-section (2). Before the enactment of the Code of 1877 suits relating to public charitable or religious trusts could be instituted in the ordinary courts by certain persons as plaintiffs. Thus—

(i) persons appointed supervisors over trustees could sue in any ordinary court competent to hear the suit for the removal of the trustees for malversation and to obtain the appointment in their place of other fit and proper persons;[451] similarly

(ii) one or more of the members of a defined class of the general public (such as the Satchasi community of Chatral) could sue on behalf of the whole class, with the leave of the court under section 30 (now O I, rule 81), in any ordinary court competent to hear the suit, to obtain a declaration of their right to take part in the management of the worship of a goddess.[452]

It is obvious that the above suits fall within the purview of the present section. They also came within the terms of section 539 of the earlier Codes. In the absence of any provision in section 539 similar to that contained in sub-section (2), the question arose whether these suits were to be instituted in the special courts mentioned in section 539 and by the Advocate-General as plaintiff, or whether they could be instituted as before in ordinary courts and by persons who could have sued if section 539 had not been enacted. The High Court of Bombay held that section 539 was mandatory, in other words that every suit of the character mentioned in that section must be brought in accordance with its provisions, and not otherwise. Therefore, the suits referred to above could not be brought by the supervisors as plaintiffs in one case and by the members of the community in the other, but they had to be instituted either by the Advocate-General or by two or more persons interested in the trust after obtaining the sanction of the Advocate-General; and further, these suits could only be brought in the special courts indicated in that section, namely the high court or the district court, as the case might be.[453] On the other hand, the other high courts held that section 539 was permissive, and that it did not take away the right of suit which existed prior to and independently of it. According to the latter view, suits of the character mentioned above could, notwithstanding the enactment of section 539, be brought as before by the above-named parties as plaintiffs in any court competent to entertain those suits, and it was not obligatory to institute them in accordance with the provisions of section 539.[454] Sub-section (2) gives effect to the Bombay decisions and supersedes the decisions of the other high courts. It provides, in distinct terms, that no suit claiming any of the reliefs specified in sub-section (1) shall be instituted except in conformity with the provisions of that sub-section. At the same time, it declares that the special provisions of the Religious Endowments Act, 20 of 1863 for the institution of suits governed by that Act are not affected by the provisions of this section. The provisions of that Act and their bearing on the present section are discussed in the next paragraph.

[s 92.42] Trust and Endowment—Distinction

The trust and endowment are different concepts altogether. Trust is an obligation annexed to ownership. The word "trust" is defined in Underhill's Law of Trust and Trustees to mean equitable obligation binding a person to deal with property for which he has control for the benefit of persons for whom he may himself be one. In order to understand the meaning of the expression "private religious" or "charitable endowment" used in the saving clause of section 1 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882, we may examine the categories excluded from the provisions of Indian Trusts Act, 1882 through the saving clause. First category is Mohammedan Law as to wakf. The word "trust" as such is not used when Legislature used the expression Mohammedan law as to wakf. "Wakf" means the permanent dedication by a person professing the Muslim faith of any property for any purpose recognised by the Mohammedan law as religious, pious or charitable. Wakf is a trust for the purpose of section 92 of the CPC. Though the expression "trust" as such is not used, while dealing with Mohammedan law as to wakf the concept of trust is inbuilt therein. Second category of cases excluded by the saving clause is "mutual relations of an undivided family as determined by customary or personal law". The word "trust" is not employed by the Legislature but the element of trust is embedded in the relationship between the members of an undivided family. Joint and undivided family is normal condition of Indian society. Senior member of the joint undivided family is entitled to manage the family properties including even charitable properties and is presumed to be the manager. Manager as the head of the joint family has control over the income and expenditure and the decision is that of a trustee. Though the word "trust" or "trustee" as such is not used in the saving clause when the expression "mutual relations of undivided family as determined by customary or personal law" is used the element of trust is inbuilt in that category of cases. Next category of cases excluded from the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 is public or private religious or charitable endowments. When the Legislature used the expression public or private religious charitable endowment, the word "trust" as such is not used. But the words "religious" or "charitable" are to be noted. The expression "charity" has not been defined in the Indian Trusts Act, 1882. Charity in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions; trusts for relief or poverty; trusts for the advancement of education, trusts for the advancement of religion and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community. The element of trust is embedded in the word "charity" and various enactments like the Charitable Endowment Act, 1890, the Charitable and Religious Trust Act, 1920, the Religious Endowment Act, 1863, Travancore Cochin Literary, Scientific and Charitable Societies Registration Act, 1955 and the like. Besides the above Legislations, section 18 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 says that restrictions in sections 14, 16 and 17 thereof shall not apply in the case of transfer of property for the benefit of public in the advancement of religion. Therefore, the words "private religious endowment" used in the saving clause of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 have the imprint of a trust without which private religious endowment would not fall in the categories of cases excluded through the saving clause.

The word "endowment" defined in the Legal Thesaurus to mean aid, allotment, allowance, protection, assistance, award, benefit, bestowment, contribution, presentation and the like. Endowment is also defined in Aiyar's Judicial Dictionary to mean any property kept or money invested with the intention of any particular service or particular charity connected therewith and includes temples and any offerings made to the idols therein. "Endowment" is defined in Black's Law Dictionary, 7th Edn, to mean "A gift of money or property to an institution (such as a University) for a specific purpose, especially one in which the principal is kept intact indefinitely and only the interest income from that principal is used". It is only a dedication of properties to a public or private religious trust. The reasoning that "endowment" is the genus and "trust" is specie, is unsound. The Supreme Court in a case[455] held that endowment is dedication of property for purpose of religion or charity having both the subject and object certain and capable of assessment. Therefore, the expression "private religious endowment" used in the saving clause has got the imprint of a trust, and hence, a private religious trust and the properties endowed, are dedicated to Private Religious Trust. If it is a private religious trust, then it falls outside the purview of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882.[456]

After the downfall of the Moghul Empire in India, it was discovered that the income of many endowments granted in land "by the presiding governments of this country and by individuals for the support of mosques, temples, colleges and for other pious and beneficial purposes" was misappropriated by persons managing the endowments. It was, therefore, deemed expedient that the British government should take charge of the endowments, and for that purpose and the purpose also of providing for the maintenances of bridges, serais, uttaras and other buildings erected for the use of the public Regulation 19 of 1810 was passed, whereby the general superintendence of all the religious and charitable endowments referred to above was vested in the board of revenue. That regulation applied to endowments in Bengal. A similar regulation, Regulation 7 of 1817, was subsequently passed to provide for endowments in the Madras Presidency.[457] Several years after the passing of these regulations, it was thought that the connection of a Christian government with the religious establishment of Hindus and Mahommedan was inexpedient, and a report was, therefore, called for by the Government of India in the year 1841 from the collectors of all districts with a view to divest themselves of the management of religious endowments, and transfer the management to properly qualified individuals. As a result, Act 20 of 1863 was passed, whereby such of the provisions of the abovementioned regulations as related to religious endowments were repealed, and provision was made for the transfer of all such endowments, in certain cases to trustees, and in others to committees (sections 3–8). But the duty of superintending charitable endowments imposed on the board of revenue by the old regulations is still retained, and, in fact, express care is taken in the Act to declare that this duty as to charitable endowments is not intended to be affected or interfered with (sections 21, 23).

The Religious Endowments Act applies only to public religious endowments, as did the old Regulations. It does not apply to private religious endowments. Section 14 of the Act provides that any person interested in any mosque, temple or religious establishment may sue the trustees or members of a committee for any misfeasance, breach of trust, or neglect of duty committed by them in respect of the trust vested in them, and the court may, in such suit, direct the specific performance of any act by them, and may decree damages and costs against them, and may also direct the removal of any of the trustees or any members of a committee. A suit which does not charge the trustees or members of a committee with misfeasance, breach of trust, or neglect of duty, does not fall under that section.[458] Section 18 provides that no suit under the Act shall be instituted without the leave of the court.

The Act is in force in all states except the State of Bombay where it is in force in certain areas only. But it does not apply to presidency-towns; so that a suit instituted in a high court in the exercise of its ordinary original jurisdiction inherited from the Supreme Court charging neglect of duty on the part of a temple trustee does not require the leave of the court under section 18 of the Act.[459]

After the passing of the regulations above referred to, the board of revenue took over the management of some endowments, but in the large majority of cases, they did not take charge of endowments created by private individuals. The operation of the Act, however, is not confined in such endowments as had actually been taken under the management of the board of revenue under the old regulations. The Act applies to every public religious endowment to which the provisions of the old regulations applied, that is to say, to every public religious endowment created "by the preceding governments of this country and by individuals", whether the management of the endowments was taken over by the Board of Revenue or not.[460]

Reading section 92 of the CPC and the Religious Endowments Act together, we have the following result:

(i) No suit in respect of charitable endowments of a public nature, claiming any of the reliefs specified in sub-section (1) of section 92, can be brought except in conformity with the provisions of that sub-section.

(ii) In the case of religious endowments of a public nature to which the Religious Endowments Act applies, a suit charging the trustee, manager, superintendent, or a member of a committee of a mosque, temple, or religious establishment, with misfeasance, breach of trust or neglect of duty, may be brought under the provisions of that Act with the leave of the principal civil court of original civil jurisdiction in

There has been successive legislation by the Madras Legislature on the topic of administration of religious endowments, whereby the jurisdiction of civil courts under this section has been taken away and vested in authorities constituted under the respective Acts. Firstly, there was the Hindu Religious Endowment Act 1 of 1925. Its validity was questioned on the ground that there was a fundamental defect in the legislative process, which rendered it a nullity. To remove all doubts, a new law, the Madras Hindu Religious Endowment Act 2 of 1927 was enacted. This Act repeated the Religious Endowments Act, 1863, and Madras Regulation 1 of 1817 so far as they applied to the more important Hindu public religious endowments in the State of Madras except the presidency-town. It made provisions for the better administration of such endowments by temple committee and by a board of commissioners. Section 73 of the Act provides that sections 92 and 93 and O I, rule 8 of the CPC shall not apply to any suit claiming relief in respect of the administration or management of such a religious endowment. Such suits can only be brought by the board or temple committee or by an interested person with the consent of the board or committee. If an endowment is partly secular and partly religious the board is empowered to make an allocation and declare what part is secular and what part is religious. After such allocation, the religious portion is subject to the provisions of the Act. But if such allocation has not been made, a suit for removing a trustee of an endowment partly secular and partly religious is within section 92.[462] Proceedings under section 142 of the Sikh Gurdwaras Act are analogous to those under this section.[463] (Reference may be made to Balbir Singh v Sikh Gurdwaras, Judicial Commission).[464]

This Act was repealed by the Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments Act, 19 of 1951, which made substantial changes in the previous enactment. Section 3 extended the operation of the Act to charitable endowments which might be notified. The supervision and administration of religious endowments were vested in a department of the government and a hierarchy of officers was constituted for the purpose, with a commissioner at its head. The validity of this law was questioned, and the Supreme Court held that some of its provisions infringed the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution and were bad.[465] With a view to remove these defects, the Madras Legislature introduced certain amendments in 1954, but the Madras High Court held that the amended sections 30 and 31 suffered from the same defects as the original enactment.[466] In 1959, the Legislature repealed the Act of 1951 and enacted the Madras Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments Act, 22 of 1959, which is the law, in force now. Its scope is similar to that of the repealed Act. It applies to charitable as well as religious endowments. Their supervision and administration are vested in a hierarchy of government officials, consisting of a commissioner, deputy commissioner, assistant commissioners and area committees. Sections 92 and 93 of the CPC have no application to endowments failing within the Act. In Ramanasramam v Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments Commr,[467] the question was whether the Matribhuteswar shrine, which was an adjunct of the Ramanasramam was a temple falling within the purview of Act 19 of 1951. It was held that it was a Samadhi, not a temple, and that further Ramanasramam was a public religious trust of cosmopolitan character and not a Hindu temple as defined in the Act and that consequently, a scheme could be framed for its administration under section 92 of the CPC.

If a corresponding legislative provision is made in a special law in respect of the reliefs prayed for in suit filed under section 92 of the CPC in case of alleged breach of trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature, the civil suit would be barred and the remedy provided in the special law has to be resorted. Therefore, where to secure such relief, viz for removal of trustee and appointment of new trustees, provisions were made in the Hyderabad Endowment Regulations, civil suit under section 92 of the CPC would not be maintainable in view of bar contained in section 92(2) of the CPC.[468] A suit for framing a scheme for a composite endowment, that is, an endowment which is secular as well as religious, can be filed under section 92 of the CPC and is not barred by sections 5 and 180 of Tamil Nadu Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments Act, 1959.[469]

In view of the provisions of section 5 of Tamil Nadu Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments Act, 1959, sections 92 and 93 of the CPC have ceased to apply to Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments in the concerned state.[470] The court having framed a scheme under section 92 of the CPC could not exercise jurisdiction and authority for modification or cancellation of the scheme after the Act, 1951 came into force as section 92 of the CPC ceased to apply to such schemes from the date of commencement of the Act. This order[471] was confirmed by the Hon'ble Supreme Court in T Lakshmikumara Thathachariar v Commr HRCF.[472]

Where, the application for leave to file suit under section 92 of the CPC was filed and the trustees obtained declaration that the trust is a religious denomination, an injunction restraining interference with its management under Tamil Nadu Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments Act, 22 of 1959 was passed. Subsequently leave under section 92 of the CPC was sought by appellants to file suit for modification of scheme of administration. It was held that trustees cannot oppose grant of leave on ground that appellant has remedy under T N Religious and Charitable Endowments Act, 22 of 1959, they are bound by judgment

After reading the object of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950 it can be appropriately said the Act seeks to regulate and make better provision for administration of public religious and charitable trusts. Such trusts cater to things of public interest, i.e., things which concern large sections of public. Unless such trusts are properly administered public interest will suffer. Therefore, matters affecting administration of such trusts are covered under section 50 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950. This situation is somewhat similar to suits under section 92 of the CPC. These suits in representative capacity pertain to matters of public interest. In contrast the suit which has given rise to the present appeal is a suit to establish an individual right. The plaintiffs claim that they are hereditary archaks of the temple since time immemorial and are entitled to exercise this right which cannot be taken away from them. No public interest is involved. Public is not concerned whether A acts as an archak or B acts. Such a suit therefore, cannot be covered by section 50 of the Act. Law is settled on this aspect as per various judgments of Supreme Court.[474]

[s 92.46] This Section and Himachal Pradesh Hindu Religious Institutions and Charitable Endowments Act, 18 of 1984

A premises constructed by an ex-ruler and used for 125 years as dharmashala was claimed to be a public trust. Admittedly no instrument of trust was created. The material adduced by the parties showed that the shops situated in the premises were let out to the other people. People could come and stay in the dharmashala but for stay of more than three days, permission of owner was necessary. Rents received from the shops were being used by the owners for their own purpose. Dharmashala was being managed/maintained from the personal funds of the owner. The management and control of the dharmashala was all along with the owners. A school was opened in the dharmashala. A chowkidar was appointed by the owner to look after the dharmashala and his salary used to be paid by the owner from his own pocket. Dharmashala could be used for marriage purpose but only with the permission of the owners. The first floor rooms could be used only by the officers or by others with the permission of the owner. The dharmashala was ordinarily being used by the pilgrims only during the fair. The public never contributed anything for maintenance of the dharmashala. No member of public had any say as regards management of the dharmashala and had no legal right to use the same. No member of the public ever participated in the management of the dharmashala. No manager had ever been appointed to look after and manage the property. The dharmashala was not registered under the Sarais Act, 1867. There was no evidence to show that the owners acted as shabaits or trustees. In the revenue records the ownership of the property stands in the name of the owner. The right of the general public is not mentioned therein. On these facts it was held, mere long use of a property as dharmashala by itself would not lead to an inference that dedication of the property by the owners in favour of the public was complete and absolute. Had such dedication been made, the same was expected to be recorded in the revenue records. Complete control is retained by the owner, be it by appointment of a chowkidar, appropriation of rents,

Where scheme was framed by court in regard to appointment of Mutawalli in a suit under sections 92, 93 of the CPC, as the founder of mosque had not framed any scheme, the scheme would continue to be operative in respect of the mosque even after coming into force of 1954 Act. In such a case, even if the Explanation added to sub-section (1) of section 15 and section 69 of 1984 is to be ignored, it is evident from the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 15 that exercise of the power by the board was to be in conformity with the directions of the wakf and usage and custom of the concerned wakf. Since the wakf did not provide for any mode of administration or appointment of trustees, the devotees approached the court and got a scheme framed. There is nothing in that section which excluded the application of the scheme. Further, the scheme, which was framed in the year 1915 and which was strictly followed by the devotees can be said to have given rise to usage and established the custom. Further, the power of the board to appoint Mutawalli is only where there is no one to be appointed under the terms of the deed of the wakf or where the right of any person to act as Mutawalli is disputed. When the method is prescribed under a scheme, the same can be equated to the terms of a deed. At any rate, as long as it is in operation, and proceedings are initiated thereunder, the right of any one to act as Mutawalli, till appointed by the court, has to be treated as disputed. Moreover, even after the 1954 Act came to be enacted, sections 92 and 93 of the CPC continued to be available for the aggrieved persons to get schemes framed in relation to religious institutions including wakfs. Similarly, though separate machinery is provided for adjudication of disputes, sections 92 and 93 of the CPC, for the repeal of which an abortive attempt was made in 1954 Act, are not repealed under this Act.[476]

[s 92.48] This Section and the Wakf Act, 29 of 1954

It has been held that section 55(1) of the Wakf Act, 1954, dispenses with the necessity for sanction under this section only when the board constituted under the Act institutes the suit, and that accordingly a person or authority other than the board can apply for sanction of the district court under this section.[477] The provision of sections 55, 57 (1) and (3) and 59 of Muslim Wakfs Act, 1954 make it clear that a suit under section 92 of the CPC instituted prior to the coming into force of the Wakf Act, 1954 does not abate on the coming into force of the Act. On the other hand, the court is required to issue notice of such a suit to the board and in the absence of a notice it would be open to the board to have the decree declared void within one month of board's knowledge of the decree.[478]

The civil suit was not proved to have been filed with the sanction of the Advocate-General. it therefore, follows that by no stretch of imagination the said civil suit can be considered as a scheme suit or a suit providing for any of the reliefs mentioned in section 92 of the CPC.[479]

[s 92.49] Death of a Plaintiff Pending Suit

It has been held by the High Court of Allahabad that where a suit is brought by two persons under this section, and one of them dies pending the suit, the suit abates unless some other person is brought on the record in place of the deceased. Such person must be one who has an interest in the trust, and he must have obtained the consent of the Advocate-General as required by this section.[480] On the other hand, the High Court of Madras has held that a suit brought under this section being a representative suit, no question of abatement can arise, and the court has power under O I, rule 10 (2), to add other persons interested in the trust as parties not because they are the legal representatives of the deceased plaintiff, but because they had become parties to the representatives' suit by the very fact of its having been instituted on behalf of all persons interested in the trust, and that the consent of the Advocate-General to such addition is not necessary.[481] The Madras decisions have been followed in Lahore[482]and Rangoon.[483] That is also the view taken by the High Court of Travancore Cochin.[484] The Allahabad decision is in effect overruled, for the judicial committee has held that when one of two plaintiffs dies the suit does not abate as the suit under this section is a representative suit,[485] and has been in fact held overruled in a later decision.[486] The Bombay High Court has held that if the previous parties are dead or colluding with the defendant, other persons interested may apply to the court to be brought on the record under O I, rule 10, in order to apply for an amendment of the scheme.[487]

[s 92.50] Death of Defendant-Trustee Pending Suit

Where a suit is brought under this section against a trustee not only for his removal but for framing a scheme, and the scheme is one of the main reliefs sought, the suit does not abate on the death of the trustee, and his successor in office may be brought on the record as a party defendant.[488] If a suit is properly instituted by several plaintiffs under section 92, there is no illegality in permitting one of the plaintiffs to withdraw, where the plaintiff is to be transposed as defendant.[489] Consent cannot be granted unless a public trust exists. Plaintiff cannot claim reliefs not mentioned in the Advocate General's consent (now, leave of the court).[490] A consent under section 92 cannot be granted unless a public trust exists. Section 50 of Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950 is not in pari materia with section 92 of the CPC.[491] The suit, of course, would abate, if it was solely for the removal of the trustee.

Section 34 of the Specific Relief Act, 47 of 1963, corresponding to section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, which it repeals, provides in effect that where a suit is brought for a declaratory decree and the plaintiff is able to seek further relief than a mere declaration but omits to do so, the suit should be dismissed. Where a suit falls within section 92, the plaintiffs cannot evade the requirements of the CPC by framing the suit as one under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877,[492] or section 34 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963. At the same time where the suit is one maintainable under section 92, and the plaintiff seeks any of the reliefs specified in the section, neither section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, nor section 34 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, would apply. Thus, if a suit is brought under this section, for a declaration' that the defendants are not the lawful trustees and for the appointment of new trustees, the suit will not be dismissed because consequential relief such as delivery of the trust property to the new trustee is not claimed.[493]

[s 92.52] Dismissal of Suit by Trustees No Bar to Suit by Advocate-General

The fact that de jure managers and trustees of a public charity have been held in a previous suit to have lost their right by limitation to oust de facto trustees, does not confer on the latter immunity from suit on the part of the Advocate-General under this section.[494]

[s 92.53] Arbitration

Where the suit under this section is for the removal of the trustee and for consequential reliefs the court is not relieved of its duty to come to a finding regarding removal of the trustee. Only after coming to a finding on that point can the judge take the help of arbitrators in the matter of the scheme or appointment of trustees.[495] But an application to refer the matters in suit to arbitration or to file an award is not maintainable as the object of the section is to safeguard the rights of the public, who are the beneficiaries and that is entrusted to the decision of the court.[496]

[s 92.54] Limitation: Accounts Against Trustee De Son Tort

A suit for accounts under this section against a trustee de son tort is governed not by section 10 of the Limitation Act, 1963 but by Article 113, which is equivalent to Article 120 of the Limitation Act, 1908.[497]

not competent to file an appeal on their own account against the decree dismissing the suit.[498] The reason is that relators are not parties to the suit.[499]

However, where an application filed by a Trust under section 92(1)(f) of the CPC for selling property of the Math was allowed by the district judge, it was held by the Supreme Court that a person in charge of another Math cannot be said to have no locus standi to file appeal against the said order granting permission to sell.[500]

Sinha, J, speaking for the Bench of the Supreme Court, observed as follows:

> In a case of this nature judiciary exercises the jurisdiction of parens patriae and, thus, when an objection is filed for grant of sanction in terms of section 92(1)(f) of the Code, the same should receive serious consideration. The High Court thus may not be entirely correct in opining that the appellant had no locus standi to maintain an appeal. It is true that the appellant is said to be incharge of a math situated at Varanasi. However, it is contended that he really stays at Mirzapur. According to the respondents, he has nothing to do with the math in question. But, that is to say, no person being a third party to the application, would not be a "person aggrieved", in case of this nature cannot be sustained, if the appellant establishes that he is otherwise interested in the welfare of the Trust.[501]

Sub-section (3) is new and has been inserted by the Amendment Act, 1976. But even before its insertion when the section did not expressly empower the courts to apply the cypres doctrine the courts did have under the law as to public trusts the power to apply it.[502] Section 92(3) of the CPC which underwent an amendment in the year 1976, empowers the court to alter the original purpose of an express or constructive trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature and allow the property or income of such trust or any portion thereof to be applied "cypres" in one or more of the circumstances laid down therein. It cannot be said that any of the original purposes of the trust, either in whole or in part had been fulfilled or remains partly fulfilled or cannot be carried out at all or cannot be carried out according to the directions given in the instruments creating the trust. Section 92(3) of the CPC only empowers the use of the property of the trust for religious object in "cypres" when the property is otherwise not capable of being used for purposes for which the trust has been created. The "Doctrine of cypres" would only apply where a charitable bequest fails or is incapable of being fulfilled in accordance with the spirit or when directions of the founder cannot be carried out for the purpose and the spirit for which the trust was created. The doctrine applies in India only to Wills and not to deeds or settlement or transfers inter vivos. The principle upon which the doctrine is founded, namely, the giving effect to the intention of the testator as far as possible, cannot apply to deeds. Literally, expression "cypres" means approximation. The courts have acted on the principle that where a gift is made to charity and that charity failed for any reason, the object of the donor or testator should not be defeated, but the property endowed should be applied to another object approximating as clearly as possible to the objects which the testator had in view. This was the fundamental basis of the "cypres" rule.[503] This was done where the donor or the testator had expressed a general charitable intention and there was surplus after the fund had been applied for the particular purpose expressed by him. In the absence of such a general intention the doctrine of cypres was, however, held not to apply and such surplus was treated as having been undisposed of. The court, of course, declined to apply the doctrine where the testator had expressed a contrary intention.[504] Certain land, along with a dharmashala thereon, was dedicated for the benefit of the public. The subsequent mutation entry in the revenue record showed that the land belonged to the dharmashala. On compulsory acquisition of land along with the dharmashala, the amount of compensation was to be applied for another purpose of the charity. It could be done by applying the doctrine of cypres and by framing a scheme.[505]

Without waiting for a revision of the law relating to public trusts of a religious or charitable nature, the legislature has provided, by the new sub-section, wide powers to alter the original purposes of such trusts in the circumstances set out in clauses (a)–(c). But using such vague terms as "the spirit of the trust" the legislature has possibly given scope for fresh disputes and consequent litigations. Sub-clauses (i), (ii) and (iv) of clause (e) in particular are likely also to bring about the same result.

The court has no jurisdiction to apply the cypres doctrine extra territorium.[506]

An order refusing to join persons as defendants in a suit under this section has been held to be a judgment within the meaning of clause 15 of the Letters Patent and therefore appealable.[507] But where orders are passed merely for carrying out a scheme, they are orders in execution. Decisions that such orders were appealable under section 47[508] are no longer good law in view of the change made in the definition of "decree" in section 2(2). The Bombay High Court even earlier had held that such orders are not open to appeal.[509] Although clause (ffa) of section 104(1) of the CPC provides that an appeal shall lie against the refusal of grant of leave, that cannot lead to the conclusion that it is obligatory on the part of court to give notice to the proposed defendants before granting leave because an appeal lies only against the refusal of leave and not against the grant of leave.[510] An order of the court granting permission to file suit against trust under section 92 is an administrative order and not a judicial one. Such an order is not revisable under section 115 of the CPC.[511]

[s 93.1] Previous Sanction of the State Government

The Privy Council have held, under the section as it then stood, that the previous sanction of the local government would be necessary whether the suit is instituted by the collector, or by an officer appointed by the local government or whether the suit is instituted by two or more persons with the consent in writing of such collector or officer.[514] The effect of this decision is that the collector or other officer appointed must, in every case, obtain the sanction of the local government (now State Government) before instituting a suit or giving his consent to the institution of a suit.[515] The previous practice of local governments had been to give previous sanction generally and not in respect of each particular case and, therefore, the Public Suits Validation Act, 1932 (11 of 1932) was passed to validate pending suits filed under the previous practice. The Act also provides for the restoration of suits and appeals dismissed after 30 November 1931 (the date of the Privy Council decision) for want of sanction of the local government, on application made within six months of the commencement of the Act, i.e., 8 April 1932. In the case of suits already filed under the previous practice, it is not necessary to obtain the sanction of the local government.[516] A judgment in a suit, decided previous to the aforesaid decision of the Privy Council, in which the permission of the collector had been obtained according to the previous practices, will be res judicata in any subsequent suit between the parties to the judgment on the same cause of action.[517] This section does not require that the State Government should appoint when there is an Advocate-General, another person to perform the functions assigned to him under section 92.[518] government may not appoint the collector or any other officer to prosecute it.[519] Before the Privy Council decision requiring sanction of the local government in each case, it was held that an assistant collector had no power to give his consent to the institution of a suit and that if a suit was filed with his consent but not that of the collector, the plaint must be rejected.[520]

[s 93.4] Visitatorial Power of Collector

Formerly the collector had a visitatorial power enabling him to enforce an honest and proper administration of religious endowments. The connection of the government in its executive capacity with Hindu and Mahommedan foundations was brought to an end for Bombay by Bombay Act, 7 of 1863 and for Bengal and Madras by Act, 20 of 1863.[521]

The Advocate-General, it seems, may give his consent to a suit to be instituted outside the presidency-towns though the collector has refused to give his consent under this section.[522]

[s 93.6] Exception

Section 52(1) of Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950 makes section 92 and section 93 of the CPC inapplicable to public trust registered under the Act.[523] In view of the provisions of section 5 of Tamil Nadu Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments Act, 1959, sections 92 and 93 of the CPC have ceased to apply to Hindu Religious and Charitable Endowments in the concerned state.[524]

[s 94.1] High Court Amendment

Calcutta.—Add Proviso

Provided that the Court of Small Causes of Calcutta shall have no power to order attachment of immovable property or to appoint a receiver of such property.—Calcutta Gazette, Pt I, dated 20 April 1967.

[s 94.2] Scope

This section summarises the general powers of the court in regard to interlocutory proceedings. The details of procedure have been relegated to Sch I.

[s 94.3] Power of Court

The source of power of the court to grant interim relief is under section 94. However, exercise of that power can only be done if the circumstances of the case fall under the rules. Therefore, when a matter comes before the court, the court has to examine the facts of each case and ascertain whether the ingredients of section 94, read with the rules in an order, are satisfied and accordingly grant an appropriate relief. It is only in cases where circumstances do not fall under any of the rules prescribed that the court can invoke its inherent power under section 151, Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC). Accordingly, the courts have to grant relief of attachment before judgment, if the circumstances fall under O XXXVIII, CPC. Similarly, courts will grant temporary injunction if the case satisfies O XXXIX. So, depending on the circumstances falling in the prescribed rules, the power of the court to grant specified reliefs would vary. Therefore, each set of rules prescribed are distinct and different from the other, and therefore, one cannot equate rules of temporary injunction with rules of attachment before judgment although all are broadly termed as interlocutory orders.[1]

[s 94.4] Clauses (a) and (b): Arrest and Attachment Before Judgment

See O XXXVIII.

[s 94.5] Clauses (c) and (e): Temporary Injunctions and Interlocutory Orders

(See O XXXIX). The combined effect of this section and O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 is that the penalty provided by rule 2(3) applies to an injunction issued under this section and O XXXIX.[2] Section 94(c) shows that a court may grant a temporary injunction thereunder, only "if it is so prescribed". The expression "prescribed" in section 94(c) would, as defined in section 2(16), mean prescribed by the rules. The rules relating to the grant of temporary injunctions are rules 1 and 2 of O XXXIX. Therefore, a temporary injunction may be granted under section 94(c), only if a case satisfying the requirements of O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 is made out. It is not correct to say that the court has two sources of power to grant temporary injunction—one under section 94(c) and the other under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2—or that the court may resort to one or the other. A temporary injunction may be granted, only under one set of provisions, namely, section 94(c) read with O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2. The court can grant a temporary injunction in the exercise of its inherent powers under section 151 also. But, there, it does not grant it under any power conferred by the CPC, but under inherent powers.[3] An application was made for temporary injunction. Prayer was for ad interim injunction, which was refused. It was held that ad interim injunction may be granted subsequently if further developments and altered circumstances warrant it.[4] Clauses 3 and 4 of rule 2 have been deleted by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976).[5]

In a case of disobedience of its interim order, the Supreme Court held that wilful and deliberate disobedience of interim orders passed by the Supreme Court can never be said to be bona fide, honest and in good faith and held the contemner guilty under section 12 of the Contempt of Courts Act, 1971, read with section 94(c) and O XXXIX, rule 2A of the CPC and Article 129 of the Constitution.[6] Rejecting the apology tendered by the contemner, CK Thakker J, speaking for the Bench observed as follows:

> We are also satisfied that the so called apology is not an act of penitence, contrition or regret. It has been tendered as a "tactful move" when the contemners are in the tight corner and with a view to ward off the Court. Acceptance of such apology in the case on hand would be allowing the contemners to go away with impunity after committing gross contempt of Court. In our considered opinion, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, imposition of fine in lieu of imprisonment will not meet the ends of justice.[7]

[s 94.6] Clause (d): Appointment of Receiver

(See O XL. See also notes to section 51, "Receiver in Execution Proceedings"). In suitable cases, the court is not powerless to pass appropriate orders for appointment of receiver without any application by any of the parties while rejecting the application of temporary injunction. Such power, of course, has to be exercised sparingly and in exceptional cases where dismissal of an application for grant of temporary injunction may lead the party to take the law in to their own hands and use their own devices either for protection of unlawful possession of recent origin or for gaining possession on such like circumstances. There is no impediment put by the CPC in passing such order to prevent the ends of justice being defeated. Such order may be immediately required to be passed also, so that possession may be made over to that party who is prima facie entitled to possession, but is deprived by unlawful conduct or illegal act of the other party. An appointment of receiver can be made on the application of either parties to the litigation as well as suo motu and therefore, absence of application shall not preclude the court from passing such order if it is just and convenient.[8]

An interim order is as much an order as a final order and is capable of being enforced.[9]

[s 94.7] Clause (e): Other Interlocutory Orders

An application under O VI, rule 17 for amendment of written statement can be made in an application under O VI, rule 17 read with section 94 and 151 of the CPC.[10]

[s 95.1] Changes Introduced in the Section

This section corresponds with sections 491 and 497 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 except that the words "by its order" were substituted for the words "in its decree". The words "by its order" signified that the award should not form part of the decree, but should be a separate order. Such an order is appealable under section 104. Section 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976), has inserted, after the words "expense or injury" in sub-section (1) the words into brackets, viz (including injury to reputation).

Words "not exceeding fifty thousand rupees" in place of "not exceeding one thousand rupees" have been substituted by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) vide section 8, with effect from 1 July 2002. Section 95 prior to amendment, provided for award of compensation not exceeding Rs 1000 where in any suit in which an arrest or attachment has been effected or a temporary injunction granted under section 94 of the CPC on insufficient grounds or where the suit of the plaintiff fails and it appears to the court that there was no reasonable or probable grounds for instituting the same. The right of the plaintiff under this section was independent of the right of the plaintiff to institute separate suit for compensation. Law Commission of India, 240th Report has recommended amendment of section 95 in order to raise the ceiling limit of rupees fifty thousand to rupees one lakh.

Where the plaintiff desired to insist on damages exceeding Rs 1000, the remedy of suit for damage was the only available remedy. This amendment raises the amount of compensation that could be awarded without instituting separate suit for damages. The limit prescribed under section 95 is increased to Rs 50,000. This amendment shall desist the litigants to institute frivolous litigation. Only serious and deserving litigants, it is expected shall approach the court to press for arrest, attachment or injunction. The amendment is a good step to reduce the burden of the courts as a clear signal is sent to non-serious litigants to avoid approaching the court, unless a prima facie case is made out.

This section provides for compensation to the defendant in the two following cases:

(i) (a) Where an arrest or attachment before judgment has been effected or a temporary injunction has been granted (see Orders XXXVIII and XXXIX); and

(b) such arrest, attachment or injunction was applied for on insufficient grounds.

(ii) (a) Where an arrest or attachment before judgment has been effected or a temporary injunction has been granted;

(b) the plaintiff fails in the suit; and

(c) there was no reasonable or probable ground for instituting the suit.

In case (i), a conditional attachment under O XXXVIII, rule 5(3), even if withdrawn on security being furnished, is still within the section.[13] The right to apply for compensation when an injunction is obtained wrongfully, arises not when the order is made but when it is vacated or dissolved either by the court granting it or by a court on appeal or revision.[14] A claim for compensation does not arise unless the writ is set aside on the defendant's application on the ground that it was issued on insufficient grounds. If the order of attachment before judgment terminates automatically on the defendant depositing the requisite amount in court, an application for compensation would not be entertained.[15] But in order to maintain such an application, it is not necessary that the order of arrest or attachment need be set aside. Where the order is made after hearing the parties, it must mean that there were sufficient grounds therefore. A subsequent application for compensation in such a case would be barred by res judicata.[16] Application styled as under section 94 may really be under O XXI, rule 29. Where the plaintiff is not making out a case for relief under O XXI, rule 29 on the merits, he cannot get relief under section 151. Suit was for declaration that the decree passed in earlier title suit filed by plaintiff's father was not binding on the plaintiff, on the ground that the father had wantonly omitted to implead the plaintiff. The plaintiff's application for stay of execution of the decree in the title suit, though styled as made under section 94 was, in fact, one covered by O XXI, rule 29 of the CPC.[17]

In case (ii), it is not necessary to show that the arrest, attachment or injunction was applied for, on insufficient grounds. It is enough if the plaintiff fails in the suit, and there was no reasonable or probable ground for instituting the suit. The principle is that a plaintiff who has obtained an arrest, attachment or injunction by instituting a suit without any probable ground, should be punished as much as a plaintiff who has obtained the process on insufficient grounds.

[s 95.3] Section No Bar to a Regular Suit

This section provides a summary remedy for an injured defendant and enables him to seek compensation for the injury done to him by the plaintiff by an application to the court instead of by a suit. But the remedy under this section is optional, and an injured defendant may, if he so chooses, institute a regular suit against the plaintiff for compensation for wrongful arrest, attachment or injunction.[18] Thus, this section is an alternative remedy in cases of wrongful obtainment of an injunction and it does not in any way interfere with the principle regulating suits for damages for tort or malicious legal process.[19] This clearly appears from sub-section (2), which impliedly recognises the right of a defendant to institute a regular suit for compensation.[20] In a suit for compensation, however, the plaintiff must prove malice in fact, in addition to the facts required to be proved by this section.[21] But whether the proceeding is by way of suit or by an application under this section, the defendant is not entitled to any compensation unless the attachment "has been affected". Merely procuring an order for attachment before judgment, however, maliciously is not sufficient to entitle the defendant to compensation.[22] (As to the period of limitation for a suit, see Limitation Act, 1963, Sch 1, Articles 73, 80 and 90 and the undermentioned cases).[23] (As to suits for damages for temporary injunction, see the undermentioned cases).[24] On determination of lease by efflux of time, plaintiff was granted decree for possession. Defendant had obtained ad interim injunction under O XXI, rule 101 restraining the decree-holder from dealing with the goods stored in the premises (oil seeds). It appeared that the defendants had wrongfully stored oil seeds in the plaintiff's godown. It was held that the plaintiff could claim damages from the defendant. Apart from section 95(1), an aggrieved party can sue for damages for wrongful occupation. The scope of such a suit was much wider than section 95. Malice also need not be proved.

> Where malice is the gist of the action, neither section 95 nor the ingredients of an action for malicious prosecution stand in the way. Damage, with all the legal implications pleaded and proved, should govern the fate of such a suit.[25]

[s 95.4] On Insufficient Grounds

These words are equivalent to "without reasonable and probably cause".[26] The question to be decided under section 95 is whether there are no sufficient grounds for applying for attachment and not whether there are no reasonable grounds stated in the creditor's application.[27] If the only ground put forward is that unless the attachment is made, the plaintiff in the event of success will have difficulty in realising the decretal amount, the application is made on altogether insufficient grounds.[28]

[s 95.5] May Apply

An order for compensation under this section cannot be made as part of the suit, and incorporated in the decree, but on an independent application. Such an order is one, passed in a collateral proceeding and is open to appeal as an order under section 104.[29]

[s 95.6] Compensation for Injury

There was a conflict of opinion amongst the high courts on the question of whether in the absence of injury to person or property compensation could be awarded[30] for loss of reputation which must result from an order of arrest or attachment. This conflict is resolved by the insertion in sub-section (1) of the words "(including injury to reputation)" which clarifies that compensation can be awarded for loss of, or injury to reputation.

[s 95.7] An Award Under This Section Is a Bar to a Regular Suit

Once an application is made by a defendant under this section for compensation for wrongful arrest, attachment or injunction and an order is made under this section, the defendant cannot institute a regular suit for compensation for the same wrong whether any compensation is awarded to him or not. In other words, the disposal of an application under this section has the effect of res judicata so as to bar any subsequent suit in respect of the same cause of action. It is the disposal of the application and not its mere presentation which is a bar to a regular suit.

Where the suit for damages caused for having obtained interim injunction wrongfully was filed, application for compensation filed under section 95 was dismissed, no appeal or revision was preferred against the said order. Separate regular suit for damages is debarred by virtue of section 95(b), CPC.[31]

[s 95.8] Amount of Compensation

The amount of compensation that may be awarded under this section cannot exceed Rs 50,000. Where a defendant claims a larger amount of compensation, he must institute a regular suit.

[s 95.9] Realistic Cost

Judicial notice can be taken of the fact that many unscrupulous parties take advantage of the fact that either the costs are not awarded or nominal costs are awarded on the unsuccessful party. Unfortunately, it has become a practice to direct parties to bear their own costs. In large number of cases, such an order is passed despite section 35(2) of the CPC. Such a practice also encourages filing of frivolous suits. It also leads to taking up of frivolous defences. Further, wherever costs are awarded, ordinarily the same are not realistic and are nominal. When section 35(2) provides for cost to follow the event, it is implicit that the costs have to be those which are reasonably incurred by a successful party except in those cases where the court in its discretion may direct otherwise by recording reasons thereof. The costs have to be actual reasonable costs including the cost of the time spent by the successful party, the transportation and lodging, if any, or any other incidental cost besides the payment of the court-fee, lawyer's fee, typing and other cost in relation to the litigation. It is for the high courts to examine these aspects and wherever necessary, make requisite rules, regulations or practice direction so as to provide appropriate guidelines for the subordinate courts to follow.[32]

[s 95.10] Right of Defendant Not Served with Summons to Apply for Compensation Under This Section

If a defendant is arrested before judgment, he is entitled to apply for compensation under this section, though he has not been served with the writ of summons in the suit.[33]

[s 95.11] Counter-claim for Compensation in a Summary Suit

If a defendant, who is arrested before judgment in a summary suit brought against him on a negotiable instrument under O XXXVII, claims compensation for arrest under this section, he is entitled on that ground to apply for leave to defend the suit under O XXXVII, rule 3, and if a prima facie case is made out, leave to defend should be given.[34]

[s 95.12] Provincial Small Cause Courts

A provincial small cause court has no jurisdiction to make an order for the attachment before judgment of immovable property. But it may order an attachment before judgment of movable property, and if the attachment was obtained on insufficient grounds, it may award compensation to the defendant under this section.[35]

[s 95.13] Minor Plaintiff

This section applies to cases in which the plaintiff is a minor,[36] but the next friend cannot be made liable under the section.[37]

An appeal lies from an order under this section: see section 104, sub-section (1), clause (g). Section 491 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 provided for compensation for wrongful arrest and attachment. Section 497 provided for compensation for wrongful injunction. An order under section 497 was appealable under the Code,[38] but orders under section 491 were held to be not appealable.[39] The present section combines the provisions of sections 491 and 497, and section 104 gives a right of appeal from all orders under this section, whether they are orders made on an application for compensation for wrongful injunction, or for wrongful arrest or attachment.

[s 95.15] Undertaking

Where a temporary injunction has been granted on an undertaking by the plaintiff to compensate the defendant for any loss that may arise by reason of the injunction, the undertaking is enforced by an application under this section to the court which granted the injunction. A attaches a house in execution of a decree against B. C sues for a declaration that the house belongs to him, and obtains a temporary injunction staying the sale on his undertaking to pay interest to A at 6 percent on the value of the house if his suit be dismissed. C's suit is dismissed. In such a case, the procedure to be adopted by A to recover the interest from C is to apply not to the court executing the decree, but to the court which granted the injunction.[40]

[s 95.16] Injunctions and Compensation

The High Court of Rajasthan, in a judgment, has held that if a person obtains a temporary injunction and the circumstances are such that the court finds it just to make the injunction conditional on the petitioner giving an undertaking to pay compensation, if the injunction is later found to be unjustified, the court has got the power to give such a direction and to impose such a condition. In the Rajasthan case mentioned above, the trial court had granted a temporary injunction in favour of the petitioner, staying the eviction of the petitioner from the disputed premises. The temporary injunction was vacated (on appeal) by the District Judge of Tonk. Aggrieved with the appellate order against him, the petitioner approached the high court in revision. The high court noted that the other party had a decree in its favour to evict the petitioner. A dispute arose as to the exact premises in respect of which such party was in possession. The high court passed a limited order to the effect that the status quo, as it existed, shall be maintained by both the parties and no one will try to evict the other by use of force. The trial court shall determine the actual possession as existing on the date of the high court's judgment, by sending a commissioner to the spot. But more important is the condition imposed by the high court, which gave a direction that the petitioner will pay Rs 500 per month as damages to the opposite party, in case the petitioner fails finally in the suit. For this purpose, within six weeks, the petitioner shall give an undertaking to the trial court, failing which the opposite party would have a right to execute the decree and the conditional stay order granted by the high court shall come to an end. It may be mentioned that in this case the court itself has imposed a condition. Of course, under section 95, the court may award against the plaintiff, by its order, an amount not exceeding one thousand rupees as reasonable compensation to the defendant for the expense or injury (including injury to reputation) caused to the defendant. But this is after the proceedings are over.

[s 95.17] High Court

Where a temporary injunction was granted by the High Court of Bombay in its original jurisdiction on an undertaking by the plaintiff under rule 347 (present rule 351) of that court, to pay such sum by way of damages as the court may award as compensation in the event of a party affected, sustaining prejudice by such order, it was held that the court has power under that rule to award compensation to the defendant, exceeding Rs 1,000 on an application by the defendant in that behalf.[41]

(3) No appeal shall lie from a decree passed by the Court with the consent of parties.

Except for sub-section (3) which was inserted in 1908, the section corresponds with section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882.[3]

Sub-section (4) has been added by the Amendment Act, 1976.

Compare the Judicature Act, 1873, section 49, which provides that "no order made by the High Court of Justice or any judge thereof, by the consent of parties, shall be subject to any appeal except by leave of the court or judge making such order".

By Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999, vide its section 9, effective from 1-7-2002, the words "three thousand rupees" were replaced by "ten thousand rupees". The provision of section 96 shall not apply to or affect any appeal from original decree which had been admitted before the commencement of amended section 96; and every admitted appeal shall be dealt with as if the amended section had not come into force.

[s 96.2] Letters Patent Appeals

The right of appeal from a decree of a single judge of a high court to the high court is governed not by this section, but clause 15 of the Letters Patent. "The Code makes no provision for an appeal within the High Court, that is to say, from a single judge of the High Court. This right of appeal depends on clause 15 of the Charter".[4] As regards procedure, the code and the rules therein contained, especially those in O XLI, apply to proceedings in such a high court under the Letters Patent, save so far as the code expressly provides to the contrary.[5] A "judgment", however, for the purposes of clause 15 of the Letters Patent has no limitation of the order being a decree.[6]

Although it is desirable that an appellate court should not appraise oral evidence for itself, this section enjoins it to hear the appeal and arrive at its own conclusion about the controversy in the suit. It is not bound by the findings recorded by the trial court in the sense that the second appellate court is bound by the findings of fact arrived at by the first appellate court. It is, therefore, not correct to say that the appellate court commits any error of law if it reappraises the oral evidence and comes to its own conclusion, different from that of the trial court.[7] It is, however, well-settled that a finding of fact arrived at by the trial court on oral testimony should not be lightly disturbed except in rare cases where some error susceptible of being dealt with wholly by argument is disclosed, such as an omission to take account of circumstances or probabilities material to an estimate of the evidence or giving credence to testimony which turns out, on more careful analysis, to be substantially inconsistent with itself or with some indisputable fact.[8] Though there is power under O XLI, rule 11(1) of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC) to summarily dismiss the first appeal without issuance of notice to the respondent, yet, the court must be chary in exercising the power and if it chooses to do so, must express is own reasons as the appellate forum for summarily rejecting the first appeal. First appeal is a valuable right and the parties have a right to be heard, both on questions of law and fact and decided by giving reasons in support of the findings.[9] Therefore, where the appellate court had not chosen to assess the merits of the case in the first appeal by the reasons of its own, the dismissal of the first appeal on the reasons mentioned in the judgment of the first court would not be proper.[10] The maxim "actio personalis cum moritur persona" have been applied not only to those cases where a plaintiff dies during the pendency of a suit filed by him, for damages for personal injuries sustained by him but also to cases where a plaintiff dies during the pendency of an appeal to the appellate court, be it the first appellate court or the second appellate court against the dismissal of the suit by the trial court and/or the first appellate court, as the case may be. This is on the footing that by reason of the dismissal of the suit by the trial court or the first appellate court as the case may be, the plaintiff stands relegated to his original position before the trial court.[11] The jurisdiction of the courts in the first appeals, second appeals or revisions are all, to that extent conferred by the legislature. No litigant possesses any natural or inherent right to appeal against any order, unless a statute confers it and it is to the extent it is conferred.[12] To enforce the preferential right conferred under sub-section (1) of section 22 of Hindu Succession Act, 1956, the only remedy is by way of a civil suit. Therefore, the trial court has necessarily to pass a decree if it finds that the plaintiff is entitled to enforce the preferential right under sub-section (1) of section 22. Against such a decree, an appeal will certainly lie under section 96 of the CPC.[13] A pure question of law, unless waived by the parties can, in the discretion of the appellate court, be allowed to be taken even if raised for the first time, provided notice of it is given to the other side and does not involve a fresh investigation of delving into facts.[14] Thus the question as to the commencement of a tenancy is not a pure question of law and cannot be allowed to be raised for the first time in appeal.[15] It is incumbent upon the final court of fact, i.e., the first appellate court; and particularly when the judgment and decree of the trial court is reversed, to meet the reasoning of the trial court while decreeing the suit and to indicate its own reasons for arriving at contrary conclusions. It is the duty of the lower appellate court to discuss the entire evidence afresh, take notice of the ground taken and the reasons advanced by the trial court to reach its decisions.[16] When no plea of novation of contract is raised in the trial court the appellant cannot be allowed to raise such a plea at the stage of appeal.[17] The plea regarding maintainability of the suit on account of mis-joinder of necessary parties was neither taken in the written statement nor an issue in that respect was framed by the trial court. The objections of non-joinder cannot be raised for the first time at the stage of first appeal.[18] The demand promissory note and the bond of guarantee were allowed by the defendants to be admitted in evidence without objection, and even they did not examine themselves in court to deny their genuineness. The defendants were precluded from contending before the appellate court that the documents have not been duly proved.[19] A party can carry a matter and appeal on a limited question of non-awarding of costs.[20] The plea regarding factual points on inadequacy in evidence of the plaintiff cannot be allowed to be raised for first time in appeal.[21] It is the duty of the first appellate court to write a self-contained judgment, giving reasons, after considering all the evidence adduced by the parties. O XLI, rule 31 requires the first appellate court to write a self-contained judgment, to give reasons for its decision on the points for determination and while doing so, the first appellate court being the final court of facts has to consider all the evidence on record.[22] No issue on the point of limitation framed by the trial court and the findings were recorded straight by the court, without giving an opportunity to the parties to lead evidence on any such specific issue, such findings cannot be sustained.[23] A party who abandons a particular plea, at a particular state, cannot be allowed to re-agitate in appeal.[24] Where the first appellate court has duly discussed important and material evidence adduced by both the parties, its judgment is not vitiated, merely because it had failed to consider one circumstance or evidence relied upon by the trial court.[25] The Madhya Pradesh High Court relying upon State of Maharastra v Ram Das Sriniwas Naiyak,[26] held that the correctness of the court proceedings cannot be challenged before the appellate or revisional court unless such a challenge was made before the said court because the conduct of the judge in recording the proceedings cannot be put in issue.[27] The high court, instead of considering whether the trial court was justified in taking a view, instead, wrongly declined to go into the question on the footing that there was no pleading to enable the court to go into that question. It was held that the high court erred in not considering the judgment of the trial court.[28] The Jammu & Kashmir court observed that there is a growing tendency of the litigants to bypass the trial courts in matters where ex parte orders are subject to objection of other side and are valid only till next date and vacation whereof can be sought under O XXXIX, rule 4 of the CPC before the trial court, it has been consistent policy and practice of the court not to entertain such appeals and not to interfere in such orders. This practice has almost hardened into a rule and it is in very rare cases that a departure is made where impugned orders appear manifestly perverse or where these suffer any manifest lack of jurisdiction or where the bias of the trial court is apparent on the face of the record. There may be some other circumstances also which may warrant interference, but by and large, this policy is adhered to discourage litigating parties from rushing to the court.[29] The judgment and decree of the court of appeal either under section 54 of Land Acquisition Act, 1894 or section 96 of the CPC or under Articles 132, 133 or 136 of the Constitution does not furnish fresh cause of action nor provides fresh limitation to make application under section 28 A(1) of the Land Acquisition Act.[30]

While dealing with the meaning and ambit of the expression "substantial question of law" occurring in section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, the Supreme Court observed that the expression will carry the same meaning as is commonly understood. No distinction can be made between a substantial question of law for the purpose of first appeal and one for the second appeal.[31]

In North East Karnataka Road Transport Corp v Sujatha,[32] the Supreme Court considered the scope of appellate jurisdiction of the high court under section 30 of the Employee's Compensation Act, 1923 (which was earlier known as Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923). The aforesaid section 30 provides for appeal from the order of the commissioner to the high court. The Apex Court clarified that the appeal under section 30 is not like a Regular First Appeal akin to section 96 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 which can be heard both on facts and law. The appellate jurisdiction of the High Court to decide the appeal is confined only to examine the substantial questions of law arising in the case.

A Division Bench of the Karnataka High Court has held that where an application for grant of probate or letter of administration is contested, the said application automatically converted into a regular suit. Once the application under the Succession Act is converted into an original suit, all stages of suit have to be proceeded with. The final decision in the said suit ultimately results in the form of a decree under section 2(2) of the Code. Therefore, in view of sections 2(2) and 96 and O XLI, rule 1 of the Code, a regular first appeal would lie against such decree.[33]

[s 96.4] Rejection of Plaint — Remedy is Appeal and Not Application Under Section 151

The question is whether the court could exercise the so-called inherent power available to it when the plaintiff invokes its jurisdiction under section 151 of the CPCe. It is now well settled that the court can exercise its inherent power, which is saved by section 151 of the CPC, in situation where there is no specific provision in the Code for grant of relief to a party in appropriate cases. When a rejection of the plaint under O VII, rule 11(c) of the CPC is a decree and the party has a substantive right to appeal under section 96 and, in cases where he is able to make out a case for a review under O XLVII, the question of exercise of the inherent jurisdiction of the court normally does not arise. In a case where there is another remedy provided to the party by the CPC, the court cannot ordinarily resort to its inherent power in substitution of that remedy. A remedy by way of appeal has necessarily to be understood as a substantive remedy available to a party. When an appeal is provided, the party aggrieved gets an opportunity to have his whole case reconsidered by the appellate court. It is therefore clear that there is no occasion for the court to exercise its inherent power in such a situation. The Supreme Court, in Manohar Lal Chopra v Rai Bahadur Rao Raja Seth Hiralal,[34] has laid down that the inherent power of the court can be exercised only in the absence of a specific provision in the CPC and if a matter is covered by any of the specific provisions of the Code, no question of the court exercising its inherent jurisdiction would arise. It is therefore clear that the plaintiff is not entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of the court under section 151 of the CPC when a plaint gets rejected in terms of O VII, rule 11. In Varghese v Devi Academy,[35] the learned single judge followed a decision of the Kerala High Court in Gopalakrishna Pillai v Narayan.[36] That decision, in turn, was rendered following a decision of the Travancore High Court in John v Kuriyan.[37] It has to be noted that both these decisions were rendered before the Supreme Court clarified the scope of section 151 of the CPC or the entitlement of the court to exercise its inherent power in the face of other specific provisions in the CPC in Manohar Lal Chopra v Rai Bahadur Rao Raja Hiralal.[38] This principle is reiterated also in Arjun Singh v Mohindra Kumar[39] and in Ram Chand and Sons Sugar Mills v Kanhayalal.[40] The power under section 151 of the CPC cannot be invoked to restore the suit in a case where a plaint has been rejected under O VII, rule 11 (b) or (c) of the CPC.[41]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that an order rejecting a plaint is a decree and is appealable under section 96 of the CPC. A revision under section 115 or an appeal under O XLIII of the CPC would not be maintainable.[42]

[s 96.5] Right of Appeal Must Be Expressly Given

It is not to be assumed that there is a right of appeal in every matter which comes under the consideration of a court; such right must be given by statute, or by some authority equivalent to a statute such as rules framed under a statute.[43] The right to appeal is a creature of statute and an appeal can be presented, only:

(i) by a party in the suit if he is aggrieved by the judgment; or

(ii) by a person who is not a party but who is aggrieved by the judgment if he seeks and gets leave of the court to prefer an appeal against the judgment.

It is also not correct to say that any person can file a suit. The right to file suit is also limited to a person referred to in section 9, provided he has got a cause of action and a remedy to be sought.[44] "Unless a right of appeal is clearly given by statute, it does not exist, whereas a litigant has independently of any statute a right to institute any suit of a civil nature in some court or another".[45] No right of appeal can be given except by express words.[46] In other words, a right of appeal infers in no one and therefore an appeal for its maintainability must have the clear authority of law.[47] The right of appeal, which is a statutory right, can be conditional or qualified. It cannot be said that such a law would be violative of Article 14 of the Constitution. If the statute does not create any right of appeal, no appeal can be filed. The right to appeal inheres in no one and, therefore, for maintainability for an appeal there must be the authority of law. Where such a law authorises filing an appeal, it can impose conditions as well.[48] The right of appeal is a substantive right conferred on a party by the statute. The conferring of right of appeal is not circumscribed by the right being available at the time of the institution of the cause in the court of first instance. The right of appeal in a given situation may already be available at the institution of the cause in the court of the first instance or may even be subsequently conferred. In either situation, without any distinction, such right is conferred by statute.[49] The right to notice in a proceedings in court of law or quasi-judicial proceedings is different from the right of appeal. The former may arise either under the statutory provision or the principle of natural justice may require it or it may be necessary on principle of legitimate expectation. But right of appeal is always statutory. The courts cannot confer or infer it.[50] Any person who moves the machinery of the court for contempt only, brings to the notice of the court certain facts constituting contempt of court. After furnishing such information he may still assist the court, but it may always be borne in mind that in contempt proceedings, there are only two parties, namely, the court and the contemnor.[51] Dealing with the Travancore Cochin Act of 1925, the Supreme Court observed that Acts did not purport to confer a right of appeal and that it dealt only with procedural matters. Accordingly, the court rejected the appellant's contention that he had, under that Act, a vested right to have his appeal heard by a Division Bench under that Act which was in force, not only when the suit was filed, but also when the appeal therefrom was filed and that right was not taken away expressly by Kerala Act 5 of 1959, and could not be taken away by implication.[52] The right of appeal being a creature of the statute, its scope must be determined by reference to the provisions of the statute conferring it,[53] and an appellate court can exercise only such powers as are confided to it.[54] If the legislature in its wisdom thinks in a particular case that no appeal should be provided for, it cannot be held that the legislation is bad.[55] No appeal lies against an award passed by an arbitrator appointed under section 19(1)(b) of the Defence of India Act, 1939, rejecting a claim for compensation, as an appeal is provided under rule 19 only when compensation is awarded and that exceeds Rs 5000.[56] But an order varying a scheme under section 92(1) is a decree and is appealable.[57] The unilateral act of a decree-holder of getting satisfaction of the decree recorded without notice to the judgment-debtor does not take away the latter's right of appeal.[58] This section in express words, gives a right of appeal from every decree passed by any court exercising original jurisdiction to the court authorised to hear appeals from the decision of such court. Where, by a special statute, matters are referred to the ordinary courts of the country, the implication is that the court will determine those matters as court. Its jurisdiction is only enlarged and all the incidents of that jurisdiction including the right to appeal from its decision remain,[59] provided the decision is open to appeal under the law applicable to the court.[60] Section 28 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955 read with its sections 3(b), 19 and 21 makes it clear that the court in which proceedings are held on petitions under that Act is the established court and appeals from its decrees and orders lie to the court to which appeals from its decrees and orders passed in civil cases will lie.[61] The rule is that when a question is referred to an established court, it imparts that court with the ordinary incidents of the procedure of that court including the right of appeal. But this rule would not apply where a special jurisdiction is by the statute conferred on the civil court.[62] Section 202(1) of the Companies Act, 1913 (now replaced by Companies Act, 1956) conferred a right of appeal against orders passed by a district judge or by a single judge of the high court in the matter of winding-up of a company and this right was a right independent of the provisions of this section.[63] But the court of a special judicial officer appointed under section 3(d) of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, is a court of special jurisdiction and the high court is not authorised to hear appeals from it.[64] But a decision on a reference under section 202 of that Act is a decree since it determines the right of parties in respect of their disputes. Such a decree is appealable under this section.[65] Rights of appeal again are substantive rights. They are not merely matters of procedure. Hence, an Act which takes away an existing right of appeal must not be applied retrospectively in the absence of express enactment or necessary intendment.[66] In other words, as stated by the Supreme Court, as soon as a lis commences, all rights get crystallised and no clog upon a likely appeal can be put, unless the law was made retrospective either expressly or by clear implication.[67] However, it is open to the appropriate legislature to take away such a vested right.[68] A notification issued under section 22A of the Bombay Civil Courts Act transferring certain areas to another revenue division does not affect the right of appeal to a superior court situated in the original place, arising from either pending cases or cases decided before the data of notification.[69] The Bengal, Agra and Assam Civil courts (Amendment) Act which raised the jurisdiction of the district judge from Rs 10,000 to Rs 15,000 does not contain any provision which, in any way, takes away the vested right of appeal. Hence, the forum of appeal arising out of a suit filed before the Amendment Act and valued at Rs 12,000 would still be the high court and not the district judge.[70] It has been held by the Supreme Court that a new legislation cannot operate to impart an existing right of appeal and that accordingly a law enhancing court fees payable on appeals can have no application to appeals arising out of proceedings commenced before its enactment.[71] So also a statute creating a new right of appeal is prospective in the absence of a provision to the contrary,[72] and cannot be availed of by parties to proceedings commenced prior thereto.[73]

There was considerable difference of judicial opinion whether an appeal against a decree passed in a suit instituted before the Constitution was governed by section 110 of the CPC as it stood prior to its adaptation in 1950 or by Article 133 of the Constitution and section 110 of the CPC as adapted in 1950. Under section 110, as it stood before adaptation, the party had, subject to other conditions, a right of appeal to the Privy Council and then to the federal court if the value of the subject matter is Rs 10,000 or upwards but under Article 133 and section 110 as adapted, the requisite valuation was Rs 20,000 or upwards. Where the value of the suit instituted prior to the Constitution was Rs 10,000 or more but less than Rs 20,000, would an appeal lie to the Supreme Court? There was no dispute that if the decree had been passed before the Constitution, an appeal would lie against it. The controversy related to decrees passed after the Constitution came into force in cases where the subject-matter was less than Rs 20,000 in value. On this question, the decision were numerous and conflicting, but there is no need to refer to or discuss them as the point is now concluded by the decision of the Supreme Court in Garikapatti Veerayya v N Subbiah Choudhury,[74] where it was held that the right of appeal which vests in a litigant, carries with it, the right to prefer appeals to the superior courts, as constituted on the date of suit and that therefore where an appeal could have been preferred to the federal court before the Constitution, it would lie to the Supreme Court thereafter. But where the court to which the appeal lies, is abolished without any forum being substituted therefore, the right of appeal to that court must perish with it.[75] While the litigant has a vested right of appeal, he has no vested right in the constitution of the forum that is to hear the appeal.[76] A plea which was neither raised before the trial court after the plaint was amended, nor formed part of any issue framed after its amendment, is not maintainable in appeal.[77]

[s 96.7] Admission of Appeal by Registrar, High Court—Validity

From a perusal of rule 205 of the High Court of Jharkhand Rules, 2001, it is manifestly clear that the Registrar General of the high court has been conferred power to admit the appeal by passing formal order of admission and direct issuance of notices to the respondents if the memorandum of appeal is not barred by limitation and is sufficiently and properly stamped, irrespective of the fact whether such appeal has merit or not. Now the question that falls for consideration is to whether procedure provided under rule 205 conflicts with the CPC.[78]

Comparing the two provisions, i.e., sections 99 and 100 of CPC, it is manifestly clear that an appeal shall lie from every decree passed by any court exercising original jurisdiction unless the CPC or any other law expressly bars it, for the time being in force. On the other hand, a second appeal, i.e., appeal from appellate decree shall be entertained by the high court only after it is satisfied that the case involves substantial question of law. Section 100 of the CPC further provides that in a second appeal the memorandum of appeal shall precisely state the substantial question of law involved in the appeal. It further provides that the high court, if satisfied that substantial questions of law are involved, then it shall formulate such questions.

Section 101 of the CPC further clarifies that no second appeal shall lie, except on the ground mentioned in section 100.[79]

Sub-rule (4) of rule 11 has been inserted in the year 1976 by Code of Civil Procedure Amendment Act of 1976. Sub-rule (4) now made obligatory for the appellate court not being a high court to deliver judgment recording in brief the grounds for dismissing the appeal under sub-rule (1). By now the legal proposition has been set at rest by the Supreme Court that notwithstanding the provision of sub-rule (4) of rule 11 of O XLI, CPC, the high court is expected to pass a reasoned order even in dismissing appeal on the first day of hearing at the admission stage in absence of the respondents to ensure that justice not only done but appears to be done. Provisions of O XLI, r 11(4) does not do away with its basic obligation of doing justice in deciding rights and liabilities of the contesting parties.

In this connection reference may be made to the report of Justice Malimath Committees, Chapter III, p 30, which reads as under:

> Indeed, the provisions of Order XLI Rules 11, 11A and 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure read together make it obligatory for the Appellate Court to fix a day for the preliminary hearing of appeal as expeditiously as possible and to make endeavour to conclude such hearing within sixty days from the date of which the memorandum of appeal is filed and, unless the appeal is summarily dismissed at preliminary hearing, to fix a day for final hearing. In other words, the question of fixing a day for the final hearing of appeal arises only if the appeal is not summarily dismissed at the preliminary hearing which has to be fixed as expeditiously as possible after the memorandum of appeal is filed. These provisions should be strictly followed. However, care should be taken that an appeal which raises triable issue is not dismissed in limine. We would also like to emphasis that when an appeal is dismissed in limine, a brief order giving reasons for dismissal at the preliminary stage should invariably be recorded. A similar recommendation has been made by the Law Commission of India in its 79th report.[80]

Reading the entire provisions from O XLI, rule 11, it can safely be held that it is the appellate court and the appellate court alone before whom the appeal shall be listed for admission. If the appellate court finds no merit in the appeal, then it shall dismiss the appeal without even issuing notices to the respondents. On the first day of hearing, at the admission stage, if the appellate court finds arguable points in appeal, then notices shall be issued to the respondents, fixing a date for hearing of the appeal.[81]

Section 29 of the Bihar Reorganisation Act, 2000 under which the High Court of Jharkhand Rules, 2001 are framed, enables the High Court of Jharkhand either to adopt the rules of the High Court of Patna or to make rules for itself. This power to make rules relates to the procedure to be followed in the matter of a proceeding filed in the high court. This power to regulate the procedure has to be understood consistently with the requirement of the CPC, which governs the filing of an appeal in the Jharkhand High Court. So understood, rule 205 of the High Court of Jharkhand Rules, 2001 cannot prevail over the requirement of O XLI, rule 11 of the CPC. Appeals, whether under the CPC or any special enactment have to be sent up for admission before the bench in terms of O XLI, rule 11 of the CPC and notwithstanding the power conferred on the Registrar by rule 205 of the High Court of Jharkhand Rules 2001.[82]

[s 96.8] Appeal and Revision—Respective Scope

It is fairly a well settled position in law that the right of appeal is a substantive right. But there is no such substantive right in making an application under section 115.

82. Sarkar on Code of Civil Procedure, 10th Edn; Bishnu Bhagat v Pushpa Devi, AIR 2006 Jhar 117.

Section 115 is essentially a source of power for the high court to supervise the subordinate courts. It does not in any way confer a right on a litigant aggrieved by any order of the subordinate court to approach the high court for relief. The scope for making a revision under section 115 is not linked with a substantive right.

The language of sections 96 and 100 of the CPC, which deal with appeals can be compared with section 115. While in the former, two provisions specifically provide for right of appeal, the same is not the position vis-a-vis section 115. It does not speak of an application being made by a person aggrieved by an order of subordinate court. As noted above, it is a source of power of the high court to have effective control on the functioning of the subordinate courts by exercising supervisory power.[83]

In Shankar Ram Chandra Abhyankar v Krishnaji Dattatreya Bapat,[84] it has been held by the Supreme Court that the revisional jurisdiction partakes the appellate jurisdiction of a superior Court. In a subsequent decision[85], the Supreme Court affirmed the above view thus:

> The right of appeal is one of entering a superior Court and invoking its aid and interposition to redress the error of the Court below. Two things which are required to constitute appellate jurisdiction are : the existence of the relation of superior and inferior Court and the power on the part of the former to review decisions of the latter. When the aid of the High Court is invoked on the revisional side it is done because it is a superior Court and it can interfere for the purpose of rectifying the error of the Court below. Subject to limitations placed on the exercise of revisional jurisdiction, it remains a part of the general appellate jurisdiction of a superior Court in a wider and larger sense.

In a recent decision the Supreme Court has reaffirmed the above view by stating that revisional jurisdiction, in effect and substance is an appellate jurisdiction.[86]

The Allahabad High Court has held that a revision is maintainable against an order passed on the objection filed by a third party in the execution proceeding of an ejectment decree: filing of appeal under section 96 read with O XXI, rule 103 of the Code is not proper.[87]

When a plaint is returned by the court, the plaintiff is entitled to present it again either by complying with the deficiency pointed out or by explaining that the objections raised by the court are inconsequential. But once the plaint is returned by court or not being satisfied by the explanation given by the plaintiff, the said order is revisable and not appealable.[88] The Patna High Court has held that an order rejecting a plaint is a decree and such decree is not revisable under section 115 but appealable under section 96 of the Code.[89]

In a partition suit, directions were given for issuance of final decree after production of stamp papers. On objections being raised in relation to process of engrossment, the matter was adjudicated upon. It was held by the Rajasthan High Court that such adjudication cannot be said to be determination of rights of parties leading to a decree. Therefore, no appeal under section 96 of the Code would lie.[90]

An order passed under section 28 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963 rescinding an agreement would amount to a decree against which appeal would lie and not a revision.[91]

[s 96.9] Simultaneous Relief of Appeal and Review Permissibility

The right of review is a statutory right. Such right can be invoked if the conditions therefor are fulfilled. So is a right of appeal. A right of review and right to appeal stand on different footings although some grounds may be overlapping. If a review is granted, the decree stands modified, but such modification of a decree is not an ancillary or a supplemental proceeding so as to be revived upon setting aside the decree granting review.[92]

An appeal preferred in terms of section 96, CPC must conform to the requirements contained in O XLI thereof. An appeal at the time of its filing would either be maintainable or would not be.[93] O XLVII, rule 1, CPC postulates filing of an application by a person considering himself aggrieved, by a decree or order from which an appeal is allowed but from which no appeal has been preferred, to file an application if he desires to obtain a review from a decree passed against him. An appeal during the pendency of the review petition was, therefore, not maintainable. In terms of O XLVII, the court may either reject or grant an application for review. In case a review is rejected, the order would not be appealable whereas an order granting an application may be objected at once by an appeal from the order granting the application or in an appeal from the decree or order finally passed or made in the suit. Rule 8 of O XLVII of CPC postulates that when an application for review is granted, a note thereof shall be made in the register and the court may at once re-hear the case or make such order in regard to the re-hearing as it thinks fit.[94]

The jurisdiction of the court in first appeal extends to examine the questions of facts as well as that of law. Although it is true that under O XLI, rule 11, CPC it would be open for the court to dismiss the appeal in limine at the time of admission but even examining the matter from that point of view, the court, while considering the question of admission of appeal filed under section 96, CPC, may admit the appeal if it is considered for full hearing, having prima facie merit. Otherwise, if it finds that the appeal lacks merit it may be dismissed at the initial stage itself. But admission of the appeal, subject to condition of deposit of some given amount, is not envisaged in the provision as contained under section 96 read with O XLI41, rule 11 of CPC. The deposit of money would obviously have no connection with the merits of the case, which alone would be basis for admitting or not admitting an appeal filed under section 96, CPC. Further, imposition of condition that failure to deposit the amount, would result in dismissal of the appeal, compounds the infirmity in the order of conditional admission.

It is a different matter in case the appellant prays for stay of the execution of the decree or for any order by way of an interim relief during the pendency of the appeal, and it is open for the court to impose any condition as it may think fit and proper in the facts and circumstances of

[s 96.11] Proceedings Under the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988

The basic distinction between an appeal under section 96 of the CPC and appeal under section 173 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988 is that under the provisions of the rules framed under the Act only a summary of testimony of witness is to be kept on record by the claims tribunal for the purpose of giving the award. The logical conclusion is that the provisions of the Act for awarding compensation in the motor accident claim cannot be equated with a regular suit tried under the provisions of the CPC. The two provisions, one under section 96 of the CPC providing appeal and the other under section 173 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988, both providing appeal before the high court, cannot be equated. Under section 96 of the CPC, the appeal will lie against a judgment and decree of the court. Under the CPC, a civil court is to decide a suit after following the detailed procedure prescribed under the Code, recording evidence in detail as per statement of the witnesses.[96]

[s 96.12] Appeal Against Order in Execution

There is no gainsaying the fact that an appeal preferred an against an order on a application under rule 97, CPC is an appeal, whether it is termed a "regular appeal" or by any other name, and is governed by the provisions of rule 103 of O XXI, CPC. On adjudicating an application under rule 97, the resultant order is given the status of a decree and as against every decree, appeal is provided for under the CPC. It is under such circumstances that the provisions of rule 103, CPC have been incorporated by the Amending Act 104 of 1976, indicating the manner in which such appeals are to be dealt with. Even if the appeal is styled as a regular appeal, the scope is again to be looked into from the provisions of O XXI CPC. However, describing that as an execution appeal which was an expression in vogue earlier, is not an accurate description of an appeal of this nature. The same has to be treated as appeal as contemplated under O XXI, rule 103.[97]

An execution petition filed within 12 years from date of order of appellate court is not barred by limitation.[98]

The right of appeal must be conferred by a statute or by rules framed thereunder. It cannot be claimed on the basis of agreement of parties or waiver or estoppel.[99]

[s 96.14] Judgment of Trial Court and Appeal by Same Judge not Proper

Same presiding officer disposing of the matter at the trial stage and subsequently in his capacity as appellate court, is opposed to judicial probity, propriety and fairness.[100]

[s 96.15] Findings Not Based on Pleadings

In the absence of any pleading whatsoever on the question as to who gave child in adoption, the father or brother, the courts could not have gone into the same even if some evidence was adduced.[101]

[s 96.16] Agreement Not to Appeal

An agreement, whereby the parties agree not to appeal from a decree, is binding upon the parties thereto, if it is for a lawful consideration and is otherwise valid.[102] But an agreement by the next friend of a minor not to appeal is not binding on the minor.[103]

[s 96.17] Decree

All decrees are appealable unless the appeal is barred under the CPC, e.g., as has now been done under sub-section (4) of this section or any other law. Before section 2(2) defining the word "decree" was amended, a determination of any question under section 47, was included in that definition and hence such determination was subject to an appeal.[104]

An order determining the apportionment of compensation awarded under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 has been held to be a decree and is appealable therefore.[105] A dismissal of a suit, as withdrawn, is not a decree.[106] But an order dismissing a suit for default in payment of costs, is a decree and is appealable.[107] A judgment or order of the family court is appealable under section 19(4) of the Family Court Act, 1984, except where it is passed with consent or is interlocutory.[108] Dismissal of proceeding in a higher forum at the stage of admission does not have the effect of merger of the decision of subordinate forum with that of the higher forum. Where the revision against order of an executing court has been dismissed at admission stage by the high court, the order of dismissal does not have the effect of merger of order of executing court. When appeal against the order of executing court is pending, jurisdiction of appellate forum is not affected by such order of dismissal of revision.[109] A decree passed by a sub-judge against a Muslim husband for divorce is appealable even if the sub-judge is also a Kazi.[110]

A decree passed in a summary suit under O XXXVII of the code where leave to defend has been refused is almost automatic and the consequence of passing a decree cannot be avoided. Against the decree an appeal would lie under section 96. When an appeal would lie, an application under Article 227 of the Constitution would not be entertained.[111]

Explaining the principle, Sinha, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> A decree passed subsequent to the refusal of leave to defend could either be under Order XXXVII, Rule 3(6) of the Code or it could be based on the affidavit evidence on the side of the plaintiff and the documents produced or even based on oral evidence formally proving, say, the execution of a promissory note by the defendant. It may not be proper or necessary to apply the theory of "dependent order" in such circumstances. For one, the theory may not apply. Even if this Court were to set aside the order of the court below and given the defendant leave to defend the suit, the decree that is passed may not go automatically. It may have to be set aside. Secondly, the defendant can always go to the court which passed the decree and move under Rule 4 of Order XXXVII of the Code to reopen the decree.[112]

Where in a Probate application, the maintainability was challenged on the ground of territorial jurisdiction, it was held by the high court that the order discussing application challenging maintainability and holding that the court has jurisdiction, cannot be said to be a substantive order governing rights of parties under the Succession Act. The order being interlocutory, appeal against it is not maintainable.[113]

An order under O XXI r 58 is appealable as a decree, even though section 2(2) excludes adjudications, in general, under section 47, from the definition of decree. This is because of the specific provision in O XXI, rule 58(4).[114] Order made under rule 58 (2) of O XXI of the amended Code adjudicating the claim made against attachment of property in execution, therefore, has only the status of "deemed decree" and not a "decree" by itself. Such orders are not covered by the definition under section 2(2) so as to attract the provisions of section 96 of the CPC:[115]

(i) when an appellate court decides an appeal by affirming, reversing or modifying the decree of the trial court, the decree of the trial court merges in the appellate court.

(ii) The appellate court has also to take into account any subsequent change in the legal relationship occurring between the parties by virtue of the subsequent operation of a previous law.[116]

The words "any court exercising original jurisdiction" under section 96 of the CPC has to be read to mean that if the original jurisdiction has been exercised by any court, the decree passed shall be deemed to be a decree by a court exercising original jurisdiction. Therefore, where the revisional court exercised the original jurisdiction by rejecting the plaint, the order is appealable under section 96 of the CPC.[117]

[s 96.18] Where Decree Not Drawn Up

No appeal can be entertained from a decree unless has been drawn-up.[118] In a suit for partition, even when the report of the commissioner is confirmed and it is ordered that a decree in terms of such report is directed to be drawn up, the suit remains pending until the court signs the final decree.[119] But in a subsequent case, the Mysore High Court has observed that the omission to have the decree drawn up, does not render the decree non-appealable since it is the substance and not the form which determines the appealability.[120] An order dismissing an appeal for failure to file judgment is not a decree and so not appealable.[121] A judgment of the appellate court should be self-contained. It should be a speaking judgment. It should contain decision on each and every point arising for consideration before the court, with reasons therefor. The requirement of giving reasons for the decision on each point is a statutory requirement. It is like the principle of audi alteram partem. It has to be observed in proper spirit. A mere pretence of compliance will not suffice. An appellate judgment, which does not comply with these requirements, would be vitiated.[122] O XLI, rule 3A provides for the filing of the application for condonation of delay, along with the appeal. Sub-rule (3) even prohibits the court from granting any ad interim stay of execution of decree unless after hearing the parties, it admits the appeal. This rule is not mandatory — its requirements are directory. Besides, this rule is not in derogation of the Limitation Act, 1963; it is in addition to that. It has, therefore, to be read along with the said provision. It is clear that despite its provision, application for condonation of delay may be filed even after the filing of the appeal.[123] It is well-established that parties cannot suffer on account of mistake of court. Where the trial court rejected the plaint under O VII, rule 11 of the CPC and failed to frame a decree, and the appellant's attempts to get the decree framed also proved to be futile, dismissal of his appeal for want of certified copy of decree was not proper as the appellate court could have directed the trial court to frame the decree.[124]

[s 96.19] Appeal from Ex Parte Decree

Section 540 of the Code of 1882, as it originally stood, did not contain any clause allowing appeals from ex parte decrees. The clause allowing such appeals was added by section 45 of the Code of Civil Procedure Amending Act 7 of 1888. Prior to that Act it, was doubted in some cases whether an appeal lay from an ex parte decree. An appellant in an appeal against ex parte decree can question the propriety of a refusal to adjourn and proceeding with the suit ex parte since the corrective jurisdiction of the appellate court includes consideration of procedural errors.[125] When an ex parte decree is passed, the defendant (apart from filing a review petition and a suit for setting aside the ex parte decree on the ground of fraud) has two clear options, one, to file an appeal and another to file an application for setting aside the order in terms of O IX, rule 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure,1908 (CPC). He can take recourse to both the proceedings simultaneously but in the event the appeal is dismissed, as a result whereof the ex parte decree passed by the trial court merges with the order passed by the appellate court, having regard to the explanation appended to O IX, rule 13 of the CPC, a petition under O IX, rule 13 would not be maintainable. However, the Explanation 1 appended to the said provision does not suggest that the converse is also true.[126]

When an application under O IX, rule 13 is dismissed, the defendant can only avail a remedy available there against, viz, to prefer an appeal in terms of O XLIII, rule 1 of the CPC. Once such an appeal is dismissed, the appellant cannot raise the same contention in the first appeal. If it be held that such a contention can be raised both in the first appeal as also in the proceedings arising from an application under O IX, rule 13, it may lead to conflict of decisions which is not contemplated in law.[127]

The dichotomy can be resolved by holding that whereas the defendant would not be permitted to raise a contention as regards the correctness or otherwise of the order posting the suit for ex parte hearing by the trial court and/or existence of a sufficient case for non-appearance of the defendant before it, it would be open to him to argue in the first appeal filed by him against section 96(2) of the CPC on the merit of the suit so as to enable him to contend that the materials brought on record by the plaintiffs were not sufficient for passing a decree in his favour, or the suit was otherwise not maintainable. Lack of jurisdiction of the court can also be a possible plea in such an appeal. The "explanation" appended to O IX, rule 13 of the CPC shall receive a strict construction.[128]

It is open to defendant who had a filed an appeal against an ex parte decree under section 96(2) of the Code to show from record that there is in the order proceeding ex parte against him, any error, defect or irregularity which has affected the decision of the case. But in such an appeal, the defendant cannot be allowed to show that he was prevented by sufficient cause from appearing at the hearing. For that purpose, he must have recourse to provisions under O IX, rule 13 of the CPC because for that purpose evidence on factual aspect have to be led. Therefore, an appeal under section 96 against an ex parte decree the appellate court is not permitted to examine the sufficiency of the cause for non-appearance.[129]

As to the power, of an appellate court in the matter of ex parte decrees, see notes to O IX, rule 13, "Whether remedies concurrent". Where no application under O IX, rule 13 was moved for setting aside ex parte decree in an appeal against such decree under section 96(2), an error, defect or irregularity which has affected the decision of the case, can be challenged. Such an appeal cannot he converted into proceedings for setting aside the ex parte decree. The CPC prescribes the remedy for setting aside of the ex parte decree under O IX, rule 13 and when a plea under the said provision fails, an appeal is specifically provided under clause (d) of rule 1 of O XLIII of the CPC against an order of the trial court refusing to set aside ex parte decree. When particular remedy is provided for setting aside an ex parte decree and there is, by way of appeal, another special remedy against an order refusing to set aside such a decree, these remedies alone, and none other, can be taken resort to. Therefore, when these remedies have not been availed of in an appeal under section 96(2) or in the second appeal under section 100 of the CPC no ground can be entertained that the ex parte proceedings were wrongly taken against the appellant which resulted in passing of the ex parte decree.[130] The application under O IX, rule 13 is a statutory remedy which is available to the defendant. In pursuance to this remedy, it could not be said that other remedy available under section 96 of the CPC was suspended, or that the same could be exercised at some later point of time, in case the proceedings under O IX, rule 13 failed.[131]

In a proceeding under section 47-A of the Stamp Act, 1899, two orders were passed, one an ex parte order directing recovery of deficient stamp duty and the second order by which application to set aside the ex parte order was rejected. The appeal against both orders was rejected directing the appellant to file separate appeals. It was held by the Allahabad High Court that the rejection of appeal was improper. The proper course was to give option to the appellant to confine his appeal against either of the orders.[132]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that appeal against au ex parte decree can be performed by third party to suit with the leave of the court.[133]

It is relevant to note that legislature has advisedly not made an analogous provision as has been made in the form of Explanation to rule 13, so as to bar remedy of appeal if the application under O IX, rule 13 for setting aside the decree was to be rejected. It is well settled that defendants can take recourse to three different remedies, viz (i) by way of application under O IX, rule 13 for setting aside the ex parte decree, (ii) by way of appeal against the ex parte decree under section 96(2) of CPC and, (iii) also by way of review before the same court against the ex parte decree. In any case, it is well settled that concurrent remedy in the form of application under O IX, rule 13 as well as appeal under section 96(2) of the CPC against the ex parte decree is available to the defendant. However, the remedy under O IX, rule 13 is subject to the limitation that it cannot be perused once the appeal preferred by the defendant against the same decree is dismissed, except when it is withdrawn. But no such limitation would apply to an appeal under section 96(2) of CPC, even if the application under O IX, rule 13 was rejected. In the latter case, the remedy is a substantive remedy provided against the ex parte decree under section 96(2) of the CPC, which can be pursued regardless of whether application for setting aside the ex parte decree under O IX, rule 13 is filed, or for that matter, rejected. However, it is only when the application under O IX, rule 13 is allowed that the appeal would become infructuous as the ex parte decree would be non est. Therefore, having regard to the scheme of the provisions of the CPC, the rejection of the application under O IX, rule 13 cannot bar the substantive remedy of appeal under section 96(2) of the CPC.[134] forum of appeal, that is, the court to which the appeal lies. What then is the value of a suit for the purpose of appeal? Now, a plaintiff may, in his plaint, fix a sum definitely as the amount of his claim as in a suit for debt, or he may fix it approximately or tentatively as in a suit for accounts or for mesne profits (O VII, rule 2). Where the plaintiff fixes a sum definitely, it is that sum which determines the forum of appeal, and not the amount awarded by the decree and involved in the appeal. Where the plaintiff fixes a sum approximately, there is a difference of opinion as to the forum of appeal. According to the Calcutta High Court, it is the amount decreed by the first court as the amount due to the plaintiff which determines the forum of appeal.[135]

According to the Bombay[136] and Allahabad[137] High Courts, it is the amount determined by the first court as the amount due to the plaintiff and accepted by the plaintiff by payment of additional court fee which determines the forum of appeal. According to the Madras High Court, it is the amount or value of the subject matter as fixed in the plaint, though approximately, which determines the court to which the appeal lies and not the amount decreed. It has accordingly been held by that court that where in a suit for accounts filed in the court of a district munsif whose jurisdiction is limited to suits of which the value does not exceed Rs 2,500 the plaintiff fixes his claim approximately at Rs 2,000 and the munsiff passes a decree for more than Rs 5,000, the appeal from the munsif's decree lies not to the high court, but to the district court.[138] In a subsequent case,[139] the Allahabad and Patna High Courts adopted the same rule as Madras. Where a suit is dismissed by the first court — in which case the mesne profits remain undetermined — the sum stated in the plaint determines the forum of appeal.[140]

It has been held by the Supreme Court that raising of objections as to jurisdiction of court is permissible when objection is with regard to subject-matter of the suit and not with regard to pecuniary or territorial jurisdiction.[141] It has been observed in the above case as follows:

> A distinction, however, must be made between a jurisdiction with regard to subject matter of the suit and that of territorial and pecuniary jurisdiction. Whereas in the case falling within the former category the judgment would be a nullity, in the latter it would not be.[142]

A full Bench of the High Court of Calcutta has held that where a suit is properly brought in the court of a munsiff for recovery of possession of land and mesne profits pendente lite are claimed or assessed at a sum beyond the pecuniary jurisdiction of the munsif, the munsif has jurisdiction to fix such mesne profits and pass a decree for a sum beyond his pecuniary jurisdiction. The value of such a suit for purposes of jurisdiction is the value of the immovable property, plus mesne profits up to the date of the suit where such profits are claimed. If a suit is rightly entertained as within the jurisdiction of the munsif and a decree passed, his power to grant the proper and adequate relief is not affected by any event which increases the value of the relief during the pendency of the suit. The forum of appeal is determined by the value of the suit and not by the amount decreed.[143] The undermentioned decisions[144] of the same high court must be taken to have been overruled by the Full Bench case. Where on the valuation given in the plaint in a suit instituted in the sub-court an appeal would lie to the district court, it is not open to the defendant to prefer an appeal against the decree passed therein to the high court on the allegation that the suit had been undervalued and that on its proper valuation, the appeal would lie to the high court.[145] Nor can the defendant, in such a case, give his own valuation in the memorandum of appeal and on the basis of that valuation prefer an appeal to the high court, when, on the valuation in the plaint, the proper forum for appeal was the district court.[146] A decree is passed by court M in respect of a cause of action which arose at Kadiri. Appeals from decree of court M lie to court C. Subsequently Kadiri is transferred to the territorial jurisdiction of court P from which appeals lie to court B. To which court does the appeal from the decree lie — to court C or to court B? The answer is, the court B, because a transfer of territorial jurisdiction ipso facto effects a transfer of venue.[147] Disposal of appeal by presiding officer of appellate court who himself had disposed of the same matter in his capacity as presiding officer of trial court, is opposed to established norms and canons of judicial procedure. This unawareness that he had earlier dealt with the matter, indicates total lack of application of mind. Such action is bound to undermine confidence reposed by litigants in the justice delivery system.[148]

On the question of forum of appeal, the Orissa High Court has held that appeal against an order on an application under O XXI, rule 97 is to be filed like a regular appeal under section 96 of the Code. The valuation of the suit shall determine the jurisdiction of court where the appeal is to be filed. The Court-fee has to be paid in terms of clause 11(i) of Sch II of the Court Fees Act, 1870.[149] In the above judgement the Orissa High Court followed a Full Bench decision of the Andhra Pradesh High Court. The Full Bench decision was in respect of an order passed under rule 58 of O XXI of the Code, wherein it has been observed in para 32 as follows:

> Once it emerges that an order passed under r 58 of O 21 is conferred the status of a decree, in the particular context of appeal, Section 96 gets attracted. Section 96 does not enumerate the types of decrees that can fall into its fold. Once the outcome of adjudication partakes the character of a decree, it gains an entry into the realm of Section 96. The contention of the learned counsel for the petitioner that the appeal provided for under section 96 are against original decrees and not other kinds of decrees is unacceptable. The word 'original' in the heading of section 96 signifies the jurisdiction, i.e. original jurisdiction in contradiction to appellate jurisdiction.[150]

Paragraph 7 of the plaint clearly showed that for the purpose of jurisdiction and advocate fees, the value of the property was fixed at Rs one lakh, being its market value. In the very first line of para 7, it was stated that for the purpose of the court fees and jurisdiction, the suit was valued at Rs 1,08,000. Since it was a suit for declaration, the relief in that regard was valued at

Rs 300. For the purpose of deciding whether the appeal lies to the high court or not, the value for the purpose of jurisdiction would be material which was Rs one lakh being the market value of the property, as mentioned in para 7. Obviously therefore, against the judgment and decree of the learned civil judge (senior division), an appeal would lie to the high court in view of section 26 of the Bombay Civil Courts Act, 1869, which provided that in all suits, decided by a civil judge, of which amount or value of the subject-matter exceeds Rs 10,000 (which later on was substituted by Rs 20,000), the appeal from his decision shall be direct to the high court. Therefore, the appeal lies to the high court and not the district court.[151]

[s 96.21] "Person aggrieved" — Appeal by Third Party

Sections 96 and 100 of the CPC make provision for an appeal being preferred from every original decree or from every decree passed in appeal respectively; none of the provisions enumerates the person who can file an appeal. However, it is settled by a long catena of decisions that to be entitled to file an appeal, the person must be one aggrieved by the decree. Unless a person is prejudicially or adversely affected by the decree, he is not entitled to file an appeal.[152]

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that sections 96 and 100 are provisions for preferring an appeal from any original appeal or from a decree in an appeal respectively. The two provisions do not enumerate the categories of persons who can file an appeal. The Supreme Court relied on Banarsi v Ram Phal[153] to affirm that if a person is prejudicially or adversely affected by the decree, he can maintain an appeal.[154]

"Locus" of a person to prefer an appeal in a matter of matrimonial nature is vital as the right of privacy of two spouses would be interfered with thereby. The court cannot enlarge the scope of "locus" in a case of this nature where the parties are fighting litigations. Allegations made by the first respondent in his revision application does not disclose any cause of action for maintaining the said application nor does it state as to how and in what manner he would be prejudiced if the impugned judgment is allowed to stand. In the aforementioned premise, bona fide of the first respondent was also required to be determined by the court.[155]

When the status of the parties in a matrimonial case is not in question, such judgments ordinarily cannot be said to be judgments in rem. Even if the said judgment is a judgment in rem, the third party herein could not have questioned the same as he could not be said to be aggrieved thereby. In that view of the matter, the question as to whether in the instant case, the civil court had any jurisdiction to pass the decree in question, takes a back seat.[156] A stranger cannot be permitted to file an appeal unless he satisfies the court that he falls within the category of "aggrieved persons". Furthermore, court noted that the expression "person aggrieved" means a person whose right or interest is affected and does not include a person who suffers from an imaginary injury. The court further discussed about the test that when can it grant leave to appeal to a person who is not a party to a proceeding? The Court observed that leave to appeal should be granted to those persons who, though not parties to the proceedings.

In a suit for specific performance of agreement of sale by vendee, it was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that third parties claiming title to property agreed to be sold are neither necessary nor proper parties to file appeal against decree for specific performance. They can resist delivery of possession and it cannot be said that they have no other remedy except an appeal.[158]

It may be true that a decree obtained by fraud is a nullity. But the question as to whether a decree has been obtained by fraud or not, is again a question which must be raised by a person who is interested in the subject matter thereof and not at the instance of a person who is a third party. The spouses have a right of privacy. Such a right of privacy not only extends to the matrimonial home but also to the matter of dissolution of a marriage. A third party who has nothing to do with the relationship of a husband and wife, cannot be permitted to intrude into their privacy by preferring an appeal only on one or more of the grounds, which do not confer locus on the third party to prefer an appeal against the decree passed by the learned civil judge.[159] The third party in relation to his disputes with the appellant herein has been pursuing his remedies in appropriate proceedings. What would be the effect of the said judgment and decree in a departmental proceeding is required to be determined by the appropriate authorities. Only because a departmental proceeding was initiated against the appellant on the complaint of third party, he, only thereby, cannot be said to have any locus to prefer an appeal.[160]

[s 96.22] Who may Appeal

As a general principle, no one can appeal unless he was a party to the proceedings or was treated as such, or the legal representative of the party or unless his privity in estate, title or interest is apparent on the face of the record. However, any person having a legal grievance which might have deprived him of the benefit or bound by the order passed is certainly entitled to the leave. Even in case of doubt as to the existence of the right of appeal, the appellant should get the benefit of doubt.[161]

An appeal under this section may be preferred by any of the following persons:

(i) Any party to the suit adversely affected by the decree,[162] or, if such party is dead, by his legal representative.[163]

(ii) Any transferee of the interest of such party, who, so far as such interest is concerned, is bound by the decree, provided his name is entered on the record of the suit.[164]

No person, unless he is party to the suit, is entitled to appeal under this section.[165] But a person who is not a party to the suit, may prefer an appeal with the leave of the appellate court and such leave should be granted if he would be prejudicially affected by the judgment and if it would be binding on him as res judicata, under Explanation 6 to section 11.[166] A person who is not a party to a proceeding, can still appeal against the order passed in the proceeding with leave of appellate court, provided he would have been a proper party to the proceeding.[167] Even a party to the suit or a proceeding will have no right of appeal against a decision, unless he is, in fact, affected by it. Thus, a person who is impleaded as a respondent in a writ petition on his own application, is not entitled to appeal against the order therein when there is nothing in it prejudicial. to him.[168] If a suit is filed against a government officer in his official capacity and against the state and is decreed only against the officer, the state has no locus standi to file an appeal even though the decreed amount against the officer will have to be paid by the government.[169] This is because it is only a party who has been adversely affected by a decree or order that can appeal from such a decree or order.[170] When in proceedings under the Companies Act, 1956, the contention was urged on behalf of the Central Government that certain rules framed under the Act were ultra vires and that was accepted by the court and an order passed accordingly, it was held that it was not open to the government to prefer an appeal against that order and contend that the rules are intra vires as the order was one passed at the instance of the government and in its favour.[171]

A successful party in whose favour a decree has been passed, cannot challenge the decree by filing an appeal on the ground that an adverse finding against that party has been recorded in the judgment. According to the Bombay High Court the remedy available to such party to challenge an adverse finding is to file cross-objection when the opposite party files appeal challenging the decree. Where, however, no appeal is filed by the opposite party challenging the decree, the adverse finding cannot be challenged by the party in whose favour the decree was passed.[172]

The question whether a party is adversely affected by a decree is a question of fact to be determined in each case according to its particular circumstances. It is clear that if a plaintiff's claim is decreed in its entirety and all the issues are found in his favour, the plaintiff cannot appeal from the decree. In case the plaintiff's claim is decreed in its entirety, but one of the issues is found against him, can the plaintiff appeal from the adverse finding? It has been held that he cannot.[173] The reason is that the very fact that the decree is entirely in the plaintiff's favour, notwithstanding a finding adverse to him on one of the issues shows that such finding was unnecessary to the determination of the plaintiffs suit. It has been stated in the notes to section 11, that when a finding on an issue is not necessary to the determination of a suit, such finding does not operate as res judicata; and it is an elementary principle that an appeal is not admissible on any point that does not operate as res judicata. Where, however the plaintiff had sued for alternative reliefs and has been granted relief in respect of one such relief, a question arises as to whether he can appeal against the decree which has refused the other relief. The trend of decisions is that he cannot appeal, but the point was left open in a Patna case.[174]

In a later decision, however, the same high court has held that in such a situation the question has to be determined on the averments in the plaint. If the plaint read as whole discloses that the plaintiff will be satisfied with either of the reliefs claimed by him, he cannot appeal if one of the reliefs is granted. One who gets what he wants is not a "person aggrieved". But if the plaint read as whole gives an impression that of the alternative reliefs one is the main relief and the other one is claimed only if it is found that the main relief cannot be granted and is refused, the plaintiff can appeal and urge that he is entitled on the facts of the case to the main relief.[175] Where the order of the appellate court remanding a case becomes final, no appeal can lie against the decision of the trial court which implements the directions of the appellate court.[176] Similarly, if a suit is brought by A and B, and the suit is dismissed in its entirety, B cannot appeal from the decree. And even if one of the issues is found against B, B cannot appeal from the finding, for such finding does not operate as res judicata for the reason stated above.[177] It sometimes happens, where there are two or more defendants, that although a suit is dismissed as against one of them, in other words, the decree on the face of it is entirely in his favour, the decree impliedly negatives the right claimed by such defendant as against the plaintiff and the other defendants. In such a case, it has been held that an appeal lies at the instance of such defendant on the ground that he is adversely affected by the decree. X owes Rs 2,000 to A. A assigns the debt first to B and then to C. C sues A and B to recover the debt, alleging that the assignment to B had become void through non-fulfilment of the conditions upon which it was made. A decree is passed against A, but the suit is dismissed as against B. Here, the decree necessarily implies the finding that the assignment to B had become void, in as much as but for such a finding the decree could not have been passed in favour of C who admittedly was the second assignee of the debt. B may, therefore, appeal from the decree, though as against him the suit was dismissed.[178] In a suit by X against A and B with respect to immovable property, A pleaded the title of B. Then B died and A was recorded as his legal representative. The suit was decreed in favour of X. A is entitled to file an appeal against the decree.[179] But where a suit is filed against two defendants and a decree is passed which effects the rights of only one of them and the defendant so affected allows the decree to become final by omitting to appeal, the other defendant cannot, by appeal, challenge the decree, first, because he did not represent the co-defendant and secondly, because the decree did not adversely affect his interests and therefore he cannot be said to be an aggrieved person.[180]

In some cases, an appeal may be preferred by a defendant against his co-defendants. A sues two Hindu brothers B and C, on a promissory note passed by B for money borrowed by him (B) as manager of the family, alleging that B and C were joint, and that the loan was obtained by B for family purposes. B does not appear at the hearing. C appears and admits that he and B are joint, but denies that the loan was obtained for family purposes. An issue is raised as to whether the debt contracted by B was for family purposes. It is found by the court that the loan was obtained by B for family purposes, and a decree is passed against B and C. Here C can appeal the decree as between himself and B. The rule is that when a court deals with a case as raising not only a question between the plaintiff and the defendants, but also as between the defendants, one of the defendants can appeal from the decree as between himself and the other defendants.[181] An appeal will lie even against a finding if it is necessary and operates as res judicata.[182]

[s 96.23] Consideration Before first Appellate Court

Raising a ground in the form of substantial question of law is not enough unless that question of law in fact arises in the case. To find out whether the first appellate court considered the reasons given by the trial court, a mere mechanical reading of the two judgments is not enough, nor it is enough to find out whether all of the reasons have been re-written in the appellate court's judgment or not. What is binding is the finding. Reasons may be same for upholding the finding of fact, reasons may be supplemented by the first appellate court in addition to the already recorded reasons, the reasons given by the trial court in totality may be considered by the first appellate court and sometimes each individual reason may be considered by the first appellate court. The questions are, whether, in the process of arriving at a conclusion, the first appellate court applied its mind to the facts of the case; whether the first appellate court's judgment discloses that the reasons given by the trial court were considered, which can be gathered from the reading of the judgment of the appellate court, though the appellate court has not quoted or specifically mentioned all the reasons given by the lower court; and whether the first appellate court appreciated the evidence in lawful manner and found reasons for interference in ultimate decision of the trial court.[183] It has long been settled that the first appellate court has ample jurisdiction under section 96 of the CPC to appreciate the evidence independent to the appreciation done by the trial court and come to its own conclusion.[184]

It has been held that an appellate court may not interfere with the finding of the trial court unless the finding recorded by the trial court was erroneous or the trial court ignored the evidence on record. In the instant case, the high court had reversed the decree passed by the trial court without discussing oral and documentary evidence and several grounds raised before the trial court. It was held by the Supreme Court that without considering oral and documentary evidence, the high court had erred in interfering with the factual findings recorded by the trial court and the impugned judgment was therefore set aside.[185]

Where the suit was decided by the judge of the trial court who has not recorded the evidence of the parties, and therefore, had no advantage of observing the manner in which the witnesses deposed in court, nor could he pass the finding on the basis of demeanour of the witnesses, it is the duty of the appellate court to see whether the evidence taken as a whole can reasonably justify the conclusion which the trial court arrived at or whether there is an element of improbability arising from proved circumstances which, in the opinion of the court, outweighs such finding recorded by the trial court. Therefore, it is relevant to consider the evidence of the parties in detail.[186]

In a case of reversal of findings of the trial court by the first appellate court, it was held by the Madras High Court that the first appellate court must give its own reasoning by applying its mind independently on evidence adduced by parties before the trial court.[187]

In an appeal preferred against the judgement of the trial court by the intervenor-defendant, the Patna High Court held that the first appellate court was authorised to consider all points decided by the trial court in the suit including the issue of title as well as correctness or incorrectness of the record of rights. Being the last court of facts, the first appellate court is bound to give its own findings and reasoning on all points discussed in the judgment of the trial court. It was further observed that the first appellate court is entitled to reverse the findings of the trial court after scrutinising the entire materials available on record, although the party against whom the findings has been given by the trial court did not prefer appeal.[188] Where in a suit for declaration of right and title, the appellate court never considered the admission made by the defendant in the written statement and surrounding evidence and passed orders holding that the plaintiff has title over suit land, the appellate order was held to be improper.[189]

In a suit for specific performance of contract of sale of immovable property which was mortgaged with bank, the evidence on record showed that the plaintiff was willing to purchase the property subject to encumbrance. It was held that the grant of the relief of refund of earnest money instead of the relief of specific performance by the trial court was improper and the reversal of the order of trial court by the first appellate court was justified.[190]

In exercise of appellate jurisdiction, the manner of disposal is equally important. Thus, where the high court dismissed appeal against decree is a suit for specific performance and the high court gave a finding regarding adverse possession in a suit for specific performance, it was held by the Supreme Court that there was total non-application of mind and no serious effort to analyse the various points raised.[191]

The first appeal has to be decided on questions of law and of fact. The first appellate court being the final court of fact, a litigant needs full, fair and independent consideration of evidence at that stage and it is the duty of the first appellate court to deal with all the issues and evidence led by the parties before recording its conclusions. If the appellate court reverses findings of the trial court, it has to record its own reasons for such conclusions.[192]

The Supreme Court was seized of a question that whether the high court was right in merely deciding the issue of limitation in a first appeal filed under section 96 without going into the merits of the case. It was held to be impermissible.[193]

The Supreme Court in the above judgment quoted with approval from an earlier decision in Rajeshwari v Puran Indoria,[194] wherein it has been observed as follows:

> 3. Normally, a suit for specific performance of an agreement for sale on immovable property, involves the question whether the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform his part of the contract in terms of Section 16 of the Specific Relief Act, whether it was a case for exercise of discretion by the court to decree specific performance in terms of Section 20 of the Specific Relief Act and whether there were laches on the part of the plaintiff in approaching the court to enforce specific performance of the contract.[195]

Since the above factors and other surrounding circumstances were not considered, the Supreme Court, is BHEL's case (supra) remitted the matter to high court for fresh consideration.

In other case, where the high court quoted the depositions of witnesses as findings and quoted findings of the lower court which had been set aside by high court is an earlier round of litigation and did not consider important aspects relating to adverse possession, the Supreme Court remitted the matter to high court for consideration de novo.

Kapadia, J, (as he then was), speaking for the Division Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> In the matter of adverse possession, the courts have to find out the plea taken by the plaintiff in the plaint. In the plaint, the plaintiff who claims to be owner by adverse possession has to plead actual possession. He has to plead the period and the date from which he claims to be in possession. The plaintiff has to plead and prove that his possession was continuous, exclusive and undisturbed to the knowledge of the real owner of the land. He has to show hostile title. He has to communicate his hostility to the real owner. None of these aspects have been considered by the High Court in its impugned judgment. As stated above, the impugned judgment is under Section 96 CPC, it is not a judgment under Section 100, CPC. As stated above, adverse possession or ouster is an inference to be drawn from the facts proved that work is of the first appellate court.[196]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that where the appellate court which dealing with the actual controversy discussed the matter elaborately, it committed no irregularity even if it has taken the task of examining the validity of a particular document in respect of which there was neither any issue nor any relief claimed.[197]

The claim of a plaintiff in a suit for partition was based on a Will executed by his grandfather. The plaintiff produced only a certified copy of the Will and defendant also referred to the same in his written statement. However, neither party brought the original Will on the record. The trial court and the high court without giving any specific finding on the Will decreed the suit. The Supreme Court remitted the matter to high court for reconsideration.[198]

Where the high court set aside the finding of fact recorded by the trial court without a reasoned order, it was held by the Supreme Court that the conclusions reached by the high court cannot be endorsed.[199]

CK Thakker, J, speaking for the Division Bench in the above case observed as follows:

> 33. Three requisites should normally be present before an appellate court reverses a finding of the trial court:
> (i) it applies its mind to reasons given by the trial court;
>
> (ii) it has no advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses; and
>
> (iii) it records cogent and convincing reasons for disagreeing with the trial court.
> 34. If the above principles are kept in mind, in our judgment, the decision of the High Court falls short of the grounds which would allow the first appellate court to reverse a finding of fact recorded by the trial court. As already adverted earlier, the High Court has 'virtually' reached a conclusion without recording reasons in support of such conclusion. When the Court of original jurisdiction has considered oral evidence and recorded findings after seeing the demeanour of witnesses and having applied its mind, the appellate court is enjoined to keep that fact in mind. It has to deal with the reasons recorded and conclusions arrived at by the trial court. Thereafter, it is certainly open to the appellate court to come to its own conclusion if it finds that the reasons which weighed with the trial Court or conclusions arrived at were not in consonance with law.[200]

Where, in a suit for permanent injunction, the plea as to non-joinder of necessary parties viz non-implement of legal representatives of the deceased defendant was not taken up during trial and no evidence was lead on that point and the matter proceeded with the consent of the defendant who invited finding without any objection, it was held by the Himachal Pradesh High Court that it amounts to abandonment and the plea non-implement cannot be raised by defendant for the first time in appeal.[201]

In another case, the Himachal Pradesh High Court has held that the duty of the appellate court is to discuss the entire evidence, points of law and submissions urged by parties in support of their contentions. Where the judgment is not showing the grounds factual or legal on the basis of which the appellate court came to a different conclusion than that arrived at by the trial court, such judgment cannot be termed as proper. The summary dismissal or mere expression of concurrence with the conclusions of the trial court is not contemplated by the Code.[202]

In a first appeal, the judgment of the trial court showed that on the question of identity of the disputed land, the parties adduced evidence, court commissioner was appointed, who submitted his report and was examined and only cross-examined. Under these circumstances it was held by the Supreme Court that the remand of the matter by high court with direction to give opportunities to parties to adduce further evidence on the question of identity of disputed land was not proper.[203]

In a case relating to fire insurance policy, where the appellate court upheld the reasons given by trial court but reduced the amount of damage without giving any reasons, it was held by the Supreme Court that the appellate court's order was liable to be set aside.[204]

[s 96.24] Decree-Holder May Accept What the Decree Awards Him, and Appeal for What the Decree Refuses Him

If the decree awards the decree-holder a sum smaller than what he claims, he may accept the smaller sum and appeal for the balance. He may approbate the decree as to what it awards him and reprobate the decree as to what it refuses him.[205]

The CPC confers a right upon a plaintiff to pray for one or more reliefs, categorised as main and alternative reliefs. A decree may grant or decline all the reliefs. It may also grant some of the reliefs claimed and decline others. The Code does not place any bar upon the right of an aggrieved plaintiff to file an appeal against that part of the decree which declines relief. Even otherwise, where law permits the claim of an alternative relief, like grant thereof would not disentitle an aggrieved plaintiff from filing appeal against that part of the decree which adversely affects his right. Thus, in a suit for specific performance, where the court granted the alternative relief of damages, the plaintiff is not debarred from filing appeal against denial of the main relief.[206]

[s 96.25] Appeal by Defendant, When Suit is Dismissed

A decree challenged in appeal is reopened and the appellant hearing is a rehearing of the whole subject matter and when the decree is passed in appeal, the first decree merges in the appellant decree.[207] An appeal does not lie against mere "findings" recorded by a court unless the findings amount to a "decree" or "order". Where a suit is dismissed, the defendant against whom an adverse finding might have come to be recorded on some issue has no right of appeal and he cannot question those findings before the appellate court.[208]

[s 96.26] Merger of Decrees

When a trial court decrees a suit and the decree is challenged by a competent appeal, the appeal is considered as a continuation of this suit and when the appellate decree affirms, modifies or reverses the decree on merits, the trial court decrees said in law to merge in the appellate decree, and it is the appellate decree which rules.[209] But when the decree is passed without notice to party that decree will not, in law, be a decree to which he is a party. Equally so in the case of an appellate decree.[210]

[s 96.27] Joinder of Appellants

It is irregular for defendants with different defences to a suit and with different grounds for appeal to join in a single appeal,[211] aliter where the defence is the same.[212] Plaintiff himself had said in the plaint, that he was in doubt as to which two sets of defendants was liable and sued them in the alternative. In the circumstances, as one set of defendants was held liable, an appeal against the other set would not be maintainable.[213]

[s 96.28] Cross Suits — Appeal Against One of Two Decrees — Maintainability

Two cross-suits were filed between the very same parties; the subject matter of dispute was the very same property, and the reliefs sought by each plaintiff in their respective suits were similar; the trial court, by consent of parties, consolidated the two suits and directed that they be tried together. The two suits were decided by a common judgment. As a result of the said common judgment, the suit filed by one party was dismissed, whereas the suit filed by another party was allowed. Thus, although the judgment was common, it dealt with two separate suits and consequently the common judgment resulted in two separate and distinct decrees. The party whose suit was dismissed filed only one appeal against the decree whereunder the suit of another party was allowed, but did not file any appeal against the decree, wherefore his suit was dismissed. It was held in the circumstances that, when two decrees were passed, appeal against only one of them was not maintainable.[214]

Admittedly, two suits were filed by the parties against each other. For the sake of convenience, the trial court passed a common judgment. The trial of the suits was separate and the judgment and decree in the two suits are different. The first appellate court has reversed the result in both the suits in a single appeal. That was not permissible in law. Even though the judgment is common, for all practical purposes it shall be treated as two judgments and decrees. Hence the lower appellate court was not justified in passing the judgment and decree under appeal in a single appeal filed before it.[215]

[s 96.29] Appeal To Be From Each Decree

The language of the section makes it clear that each decree should be the subject matter of an independent appeal and that one appeal against two decrees passed in two different suits based on different causes of action is not contemplated.[216] Even in a single suit such as a suit for partition, there can be more than one preliminary decree. An order of the court directing sale of a certain property, after the passing of the preliminary decree, which cannot be conveniently divided among the sharers, amounts to a final adjudication of the rights of the parties regarding the manner in which that property has to be divided. Such an order amounts to a preliminary decree and can be appealed against.[217] The principles of merger of original decree with appellate decree cannot be invoked to claim protection under the general provisions of Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947.[218]

[s 96.30] First Appeal — Request for Issuewise Finding — Not Proper

First appeal is a valuable right and the parties have a right to be heard both on questions of law and on facts and the judgment in the first appeal must address itself to all the issues of law and fact and decide it by giving reasons in support of the findings.[219]

In the regular first appeal, the request to examine conclusions arrived at, and to the district judge to give finding on each issue as first appellate court, is not proper.[220]

[s 96.31] Finding of Fact — Limited Scope of Interference

The general rule is that the appellate court should permit the finding of fact rendered by the trial court to prevail, unless it clearly appears that some special feature about the evidence of a particular witness has escaped the notice of the trial court or there is sufficient balance of improbability to displace its opinion as to whether the credibility lies.[221] The trial court has the advantage of recording the evidence and noticing the demeanour of the witness. In such a situation, the view is that the first appellate court should be slow to interfere with the findings recorded by the trial court.[222]

In a case relating to work contract, the plaintiff challenged the assessment of the work made by the defendant. However, the trial court found that the plaintiff did not sign the measurement book or give any endorsement thereon. He did not lead any evidence to establish taken he get the work measured by any independent agency. On the contrary the trial court also found that evidence of the defendant was credible and cogent and work upto only 65% and not 95% had been done. Under these circumstances the high court declined to interfere in the findings of fact.[223] Where no exceptional circumstances was pointed out by the appellate court for dislodging the finding of fact recorded by the trial court on the basis of appraisal of oral testimony, it was held by the Allahabad High Court that the appellate court erred in upsetting the findings of the trial court on all issues.[224]

A money suit was filed by the bank against manufacturer of handloom sarees. The suit was decreed by the trial court granting 12 equal quarterly instalments. Considering the loss suffered in business owing to drought condition, the appellate court granted six more quarterly equal instalments to the defendants.[225]

[s 96.33] Sub-section (3): Consent Decrees not Appealable

Sub-section (3) declares that no decree passed by consent of parties shall be appealable. Under the 1882 Code, consent decrees were passed under section 375. Under the present CPC,[226] a consent decree may be passed under O XXIII, rule 3.

Right of appeal has been given under O XXIII, rule 1(A)(2) to a party who challenges the recording of the compromise to question the validity thereof while preferring an appeal against the decree. Section 96(3) of the CPC is not barred to such an appeal, because section 96(3) is applicable to cases where the factor of compromise or agreement is not in dispute.[227] Nothing in O XXIII describes that the order passed under rules 1 and 3 thereof, has force of decree and none of the provisions contain in the CPC renders an order under O XXIII, rule 1, refusing or to allow such an application or the order under O XXIII, rule 3 refusing to record compromise. has force or is deemed decree. Though, however an order passed under O XXIII, rule 3 may be treated to be a decree, but then again, section 66(3) prohibits appeal against the decree passed by the court with the consent of the parties.[228] An appeal against a consent decree passed in presence of counsel of both the parties in not maintainable.[229] No appeal lies against a consent order appointing an arbitrator.[230] The bar under section 96(3) does not get attracted when the compromise entered into between the parties is disputed. If a part of the compromise decree is refused by the court or is not recorded, then also the bar of section 96(3) would not be applicable in those cases.[231]

The rule contained in this sub-section is one of estoppel. Therefore, once a decree is passed with the consent of parties and the decree ex facie indicates that the parties thereto had given their consent, the decree cannot be challenged in an appeal on grounds such as fraud, misrepresentation, coercion etc.[232] On the other hand, it has been held that where in an appeal against a consent decree the ground taken is that there was in fact no agreement between the parties, though such an appeal is barred by this section, there could be an appeal by the party aggrieved by such consent decree under clause (m) of rule 1 of O XLIII. It is submitted that the distinction made between the two classes of cases, namely, those where the factum of compromise is in dispute and those in which its legality is in question cannot be sustained on principle. Such a distinction is no longer tenable in view of the deletion of clause (m) of rule 1 of O XLIII by the Amendment Act, 1976 and which renders the decisions cited below[233] inapplicable.

In a case relating to lease of property for residential purposes, where the suit is said to have been compromised and a compromise decree was passed, the Supreme Court held that no appeal is maintainable against a consent decree in view of the specific bar contained in sub-section (3) of section 96 of the Code.[234]

Raveendran, J, speaking for the Bench in the above case laid down the law in the following words:

> The position that emerges from the amended provisions of Order 23, can be summed up thus:
> (i) No appeal is maintainable against a consent decree having regard to the specific bar contained in Section 96(3) CPC.
> (ii) No appeal is maintainable against the order of the court recording the compromise (or refusing to record a compromise) in view of the deletion of Clause (m) Rule 1 Order 43.
>
> (iii) No independent suit can be filed for setting aside a compromise decree on the ground that the compromise was not lawful in view of the bar contained in Rule 3A.
>
> (iv) A consent decree operates as an estoppel and is valid and binding unless it is set aside by the court which passed the consent decree, by an order on an application under the proviso to Rule 3 of Order 23.
> Therefore, the only remedy available to a party to a consent decree to avoid such consent decree, is to approach the court which recorded the compromise and made a decree in > terms of it, and establish that there was no compromise. In that event, the court which recorded the compromise will itself consider and decide the question as to whether there was a valid compromise or not. This is so because a consent decree, is nothing but contract between parties superimposed with the seal of approval of the court. The validity of a consent decree depends wholly on the validity of the agreement or compromise on which it is made.[235]

It has, however, been held by the Jharkhand High Court that in a matrimonial suit for passing a decree for dissolution of marriage by mutual consent as contemplated under section 13B of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, the provisions of O XXIII, rule 3 of the Code will not apply and as such an appeal is maintainable against a decree passed under section 13B of the Act.[236]

When a preliminary decree is passed in disregard of the provisions of O XXXII, rule 7 it has been held by the Supreme Court in Kausalya Devi v Baijnath Sayal,[237] that it could not be questioned in an appeal against the final decree. By parity of reasoning an order recording compromise without complying with O XXXII, rule 7, should not be liable to be attacked in an appeal against a decree following therefrom. The CPC does not allow an appeal from a consent decree in any case. The deletion of clause (m) of rule (1) of O XLIII shows that it is no longer competent to appeal from an order recording the compromise where such compromise is not lawful on the ground that where the compromise is not a lawful one, the court has no power under O XXIII, rule 3 to record such a compromise.

This section applies to consent decrees passed in appeal also.[238] Plaintiff sued upon an account stated. The court found that the account stated was a deliberate fabrication and fraud and the plaintiff had to fall back on items in the general account. Each of these was found to be barred by limitation but defendants consented to a decree for such items as plaintiff could prove. A decree was passed on this footing. The Privy Council held that it was a consent decree and not appealable and that if it were not a consent decree the plaintiff's claim would have to be dismissed.[239] In a suit for partition, all the parties are plaintiffs and defendants, and, without even one party, the suit cannot proceed, nor can the matter be settled. Where all parties to a suit agree to the appointment of a referee and agree to be bound by his decision, the decree passed on the basis of the decision of the referee may amount to a "consent decree". But rule 8 of the CPC provides for the issuance of notice to all interested persons, in case the suit was to be decided by a referee and the parties were to be bound by his decision. If this is not done, then there is no agreed appointment of referee and no agreement by all the interested persons to be bound by the decision of the referee.[240]

It has been held by the Rajasthan High Court that a party to a suit whose rights are affected by a compromise decree for which he had not consented, is not precluded from assailing the validity of the decree by way of an appeal under section 96 of the Code.[241]

[s 96.34.1] Extraneous Matter

This omission has been supplied by sub-section (3) of the present section. The said words barred an appeal from a consent decree only so far as such decree related to so much of the subject matter of the suit as was dealt with by the agreement, compromise or satisfaction on which the decree was based. If a consent decree dealt with any matter extraneous to the suit, that is, matters that did not relate to the subject matter of the suit, it was held that the decree, though passed with the consent of parties, was appealable, and that it should be modified by omitting such terms as did not relate to the subject matter of the suit.[242] As regards the terms so excluded, it was held that they might be enforced in a separate suit as a contract.[243] It would also be so under the present CPC.[244]

[s 96.34.2] When Compromise is Unlawful

Both under O XXIII, rule 3 and the corresponding section 375 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, the agreement or compromise in terms of which the court is invited to pass a consent decree must be "lawful". It was accordingly observed by the High Court of Bombay in Goculdas Bulabdas Manifacturing Co Ltd v James Scott,[245] a case under section 375, that notwithstanding the declared finality of the decree, an appeal against it would be maintainable, where the party against whom the decree was passed alleged that there had been in fact no "lawful agreement" arrived at, in which case the condition precedent to the making of the decree would not be fulfilled. These observations were mere obiter dicta, but they were adopted by the High Court of Madras in Sridharan v Puramathan,[246] where it was held that an appeal would lie from a consent decree if the agreement in terms of which the decree was passed was not lawful. The High Court of Allahabad has held that an appeal lies against a consent decree when the compromise on which it is based is attacked as unlawful, as, for example, when a compromise is entered into on behalf of a minor without the leave of court under O XXXII, rule 7,[247] or without the sanction of the Central Board which is required under section 51 of the Uttar Pradesh Muslim Wakf Act, 1936,[248] or when a compromise is entered into by counsel without authority.[249] That is also the view taken by the High Court of Rajasthan.[250]

The Patna High Court has held that filing of title suit for setting aside compromise decree on the ground that compromise was not lawful is specially barred under O XXIII, rule 3A of the Code. The remedy open to plaintiff is to challenge the said decree by preferring an appeal under section 96 of the Code.[251] The Patna High Court placed reliance on a decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Banwari Lal v Chando Devi,[252] wherein it has been observed as follows:

> Section 96(3) of the Code says that no appeal shall lie from a decree passed by the Court with the consent of the parties. Rule 1A(2) has been introduced saying that against a decree passed in a suit after recording a compromise, it shall be open to the appellant to contest the decree on the ground that the compromise should not have been recorded. When Section 96(3) bars an appeal against decree passed with the consent of parties, it implies that such decree is valid and binding on the parties unless set aside by the procedure prescribed or available to the parties. One such remedy available was by filing the appeal under Order 43, Rule 1(m). If the order recording the compromise was set aside, there was no necessity or occasion to file an appeal against the decree. Similarly, a suit used to be filed for setting aside such decree on the ground that the decree is based on an invalid and illegal compromise not binding on the plaintiff of the second suit. But after the amendments which have been introduced, neither an appeal against the order recording the compromise nor remedy by way of filing a suit is available in cases covered by Rule 3A of Order 23. As such a right has been given under Rule 1A(2) of Order 43 to a party, who challenges the recording of the compromise, to question the validity thereof while preferring an appeal against the decree. Section 96(3) of the Code shall not be a bar to such an appeal because Section 96(3) is applicable to cases where the factum of compromise or agreement is not in dispute.

[s 96.34.3] Compromise not Showing Ground Relief

The High Court of Allahabad has held that if a compromise decree for dissolution of marriage does not show that any of the grounds specified in sections 10 and 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955 is made out, the decree would be without jurisdiction and that this sub-section would not apply to such a decree.[253]

[s 96.34.4] Dispute on the Question of Compromise

When there is a contest on the question whether there was a compromise or not, a decree accepting the compromise on resolution of that controversy, cannot be said to be a decree passed with the consent of the parties. Therefore, the bar under section 93 (3) of the CPC could not have applied. An appeal, and a second appeal, with its limitations would be available to the party feeling aggrieved by the decree passed on such a disputed compromise or on a rejection of the compromise set up.[254]

Balasubramanyan, J, speaking for the three-Judge Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> When on a dispute in that behalf being raised, an enquiry is made (now it has to be done in view of the proviso to Order XXIII Rule 3 of the Code added by Act 104 of 1976) and the suit is decreed on the basis of a compromise based on that enquiry, it could not be held to be a decree passed on consent within the meaning of section 96(3) of the Code. Section 96(3) contemplates non-appealability of a decree passed by the court with the consent of parties. Obviously, when one of the parties sets up a compromise and the other disputes it and the court is forced to adjudicate on whether there was a compromise or not and to pass a decree, it could not be understood as a decree passed by the court with the consent of parties.[255]

In a compromise of a suit, one party raised dispute with respect to the terms of the compromise and the objecting party requested the court not to pass a decree on the basis of the consent. But dispute objections the court passed decree in terms of the consent. The Gujarat High Court held that in the face of the controversy regarding terms of consent it cannot be said that the decree was passed with the consent of parties and as such appeal under section 96 would be maintainable.[256]

[s 96.35] Practices

The Privy Council has said that when a decree or any part of a decree is by consent of parties, it should always so appear on the face of the decree when drawn up.[257] The terms of a decree agreed to between the parties need not be in writing. It is enough if the judgment discloses that the decree or order which came to be passed was on the basis of consent of the parties.[258] There was a question whether the appeal itself is not maintainable. A preliminary contention and prolonged arguments about the entertainment of the appeal had been urged. For the purpose of this interlocutory matter, it can be assumed that the appeal was maintainable. There are compulsive situations, however, where the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction is mandated to avert a possible deflection of the course of justice, when the affected party is relegated to the routine process of fighting the interlocutory matter under the normal procedure of O XXXIX, rule 4.[259] The rule of practice, which has almost the force of law, is that the appellate court does not reverse a finding of fact rested on proper appreciation of the oral evidence.[260]

[s 96.36] Award of Lok Adalat — Not Appealable

The Lok Adalat will pass the award with the consent of the parties, therefore there is no need either to reconsider or review the matter repeatedly, as the award passed by the Lok Adalat shall be final, even as under section 96(3) of CPC it is stated that "no appeal shall lie from a decree passed by the Court with the consent of the parties". The award of the Lok Adalat is an order by the Lok Adalat under the consent of the parties, and it shall be deemed to be a decree of the civil court, therefore an appeal shall not lie from the award of the Lok Adalat as under section 96(3) CPC.[261]

However, where parties who entered into compromise has no power to enter into compromise and the compromise had been effected by playing fraud, it was held that the award passed by Lok Adalat on the basis of such compromise is not settlement and is void. Therefore, appeal against such an award would be maintainable under section 96 of the Code.[262]

[s 96.37] Procedure for Setting Aside Consent Decrees

Sub-section (3), in so far as it bars an appeal from consent decrees, gives effect to the principle that, a judgment by consent, acts as an estoppel.[263] In the case of a consent decree, the Privy Council refused to entertain an appeal or to consider the sufficiency or otherwise of the consent as the decree could only be set aside by substantive proceedings appropriate to that particular remedy.[264] A consent decree can be set aside on any ground which would invalidate an agreement, such as misrepresentation, fraud or mistake.[265] This can only be done by a suit, and a consent decree cannot be set aside by an appeal,[266] of a review,[267] or by a rule obtained on a motion.[268] But the court in its inherent jurisdiction, may set aside an interlocutory consent order which is not a final order or judgment.[269] Where in the facts and circumstances of the case, the plaintiff's amendment did not change the nature and character of the suit, the amendment could be allowed at the appellate stage as that did not cause any prejudice to the defendants.[270]

But an appeal from an order recording a compromise under O XXIII, rule 3, is not incompetent if the decree is passed before the appeal.[271] This is no longer the position in view of the fact that clause (m) of O XLIII, rule 1 which provided that an order under O XXIII, rule 3 recording or refusing to record an agreement, compromise or satisfaction was an appealable order has been deleted by the Amendment Act, 1976. In some cases, it may be done by an application for a review.[272] But it cannot be done by a rule.[273]

It is no doubt true that the appellants-plaintiffs could have approached the trial court under the proviso to rule 3, O XXIII, CPC, but they can also challenge the decree in appeal under section 96(1), CPC before the high court. However, when high court has already entertained the appeal against the consent decree passed by the trial court, then, merely because they have alternative remedy of approaching the trial court by way of application under the provision to rule 3 of O XXIII, it would not be a ground for the high court not to entertain this appeal on merits.[274]

[s 96.38] Subsequent Events

A court (including a court of appeal) should take into account developments subsequent to the commencement of the litigation. When the relief, otherwise awardable at the date of commencement of the suit, would become inappropriate in view of the changed circumstances, the court should mould the relief in accordance with the changed circumstances, whenever it is necessary to do so, for shortening the litigation or doing complete justice. This is particularly so in the case of matrimonial proceedings, proceedings relating to guardianship, etc, where the interests involved are not merely those of the immediate parties to the litigation, but also those of society and of the future generation. In the instant case, custody of a girl was awarded under section 25 of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890, to her mother, at a time when the girl was under five years of age. During the pendency of the litigation, the girl attained the age of five years. The high court proceeded to dispose of the appeal on the merits, taking note of the fact that as the girl had completed the age of five years, the mother could not claim the custody as a matter of right.[275]

Ordinarily, the rights of the parties stand crystallized on the date the suit is instituted before a court and only the same set of facts must be considered by such court. Relying on the said principle, a decision of the high court made in an appeal under section 96 of the CPC was challenged before the Supreme Court in Gaiv Dinshaw Irani v Tehmtan Irani.[276] The Supreme Court upheld the order of the high court and held that in the interest of justice, a court, including a court of appeal under section 96 is not precluded from taking note of developments subsequent to the commencement of the litigation, when such events have a direct bearing on the relief claimed by a party or on the entire purpose of the suit and hence the courts taking note of the same should mould the relief accordingly.

An appellate court can take note of events that have taken place since the judgment of the trial court. In a suit by landlord for eviction, the high court in second appeal, can take note of the fact that:

(i) landlord's children have since grown up and so his family has increased;

(ii) tenant's sons have shifted to another house, one son has gone to foreign country, daughter has got married and wife has expired.[277] The case of Pasupaleti v Motor and General Traders,[278] was followed.

[s 96.39] Decisions of the Court Extra Cursum Curiae

Sometimes it happens that parties to a suit or proceeding refer the matter for the decision of the court. The question is whether such a decision when given is open to appeal. When the parties invite the court to adopt a procedure extra cursum curiae and give a decision agreeing to be bound by it, such a reference is not one under the Arbitration Act. Such a decision amounts to a decree but is not open to appeal.[279] Hence, the language used in decisions for such a decree is that such a decision is 'in the nature of an award' or 'as if it is an award'.[280] Where the dispute related to the value of improvements made by a mortgagee in possession and the parties filed a joint statement asking the court to make a local inspection, peruse the documentary evidence in the case and give its decision and agreed that they would abide by that decision, it was held that the procedure agreed to was extra cursum curiae and no appeal lay against the decision.[281] But where the procedure adopted is one prescribed and followed in courts, the fact that the parties agreed to dispense with oral evidence and take the decision of the court on the materials on record would not make it a consent decree so as to bar an appeal.[282] Likewise, an agreement between the parties that they would not adduce oral evidence and that the court might give a decision against the party on whom the onus of proving the case lay, would not make the decree passed a consent decree and it would be open to the party aggrieved to appeal against it on the ground that the onus had been wrongly thrown.[283] Where counsel for the parties agreed that a decree might be passed on the basis of the decision of the court on issue (1) without reference to other issues and the court acting on this agreement decreed the suit, it was held that the defendant was entitled to file an appeal against it and challenge the correctness of the decree on issue (1).[284] Where the parties agreed that the court should authorise a commissioner to take additional evidence and that that order should not be appealable, that does not render the ultimate decree passed in the suit, a consent decree.[285] Mere acceptance by a party of an order offered by the court has been held not to amount to consent.[286] Where the terms of the decree were not agreed to by the parties but imposed upon them by the court, there is no consent decree and an appeal against it is not barred.[287] A decree passed on the strength of a special oath administered in pursuance of an agreement thereto between the parties is a consent decree and is not appealable.[288] Where, in a suit, the plaintiff agrees to be bound by the statement of the defendant on oath, the decree passed on the basis of such a statement is not a consent decree.[289]

[s 96.40] Appeal is a Continuation of the Suit

In theory, the appeal is only a continuation of the hearing of the suit.[290] Accordingly, the word "suit" in section 15 of the Uttar Pradesh Temporary Control of Rent and Eviction Act, 1947 has to be understood to include an appeal. The result is that although at the time of the institution of the suit for eviction, section 15 was not in force in the area where the rented premises are situated, if at the time of appeal it was brought in force in that area, the tenant in appeal becomes entitled to its protection.[291]

[s 96.41] Dismissal of Application for Condonation of Delay and Appeal is Decision of Appeal

An appeal presented out of time was nevertheless an appeal in the eye of law for all purposes and an order dismissing the appeal was a decree that could be the subject of a second appeal. It was also held that rule 3A of O XLI introduced by Amendment Act 104 of 1976 to the CPC. did not in any way affect that principle. An appeal registered under rule 9 of O XLI of the CPC had to be disposed of according to law and a dismissal of an appeal for the reason of delay in its presentation, after the dismissal of an application for condoning the delay, is in substance and effect a confirmation of the decree appealed against.[292]

Thus, the position that emerges on a survey of the authorities is that an appeal filed along with an application for condoning the delay in filing that appeal when dismissed on the refusal to condone the delay is nevertheless a decision in the appeal.[293]

The order passed by appellate court allowing appellant to file copy of decree at the time of final hearing amounts to condonation of delay in filing appeal.[294]

[s 96.42] Amendment of Pleadings

Plaintiff failed in his plea of invalidity of will. He wanted to amend the plaint to include pleas based on certain partition and section 14(1) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956. Amendment was held to be setting up a different cause of action and cannot be allowed in appeal.[295] Where in the facts and circumstances of the case, the plaintiff's amendment did not change the nature and character of the suit, the amendment could be allowed at the appellate stage as that did not cause any prejudice to the defendants.[296]

[s 96.43] Appeal Disposed of No further Orders can be Passed by Court on Application of Parties

After the dismissal of first appeal by the high court, property stood vested with both sisters and they became absolute owners and property no more remain custodia legis. The appointment of joint receiver came to an end and they stood discharged. As such, there was no need for the Division Bench to consider the application filed by the applicant.[297]

Thus, the high court had no jurisdiction to pass any order on subsequent application filed by parties in that matter.[298]

When an appeal is dismissed and finally disposed of, he becomes functus officio and all applications pending adjudication before the appellate court become infructuous. Thus, after dismissal of the appeal where the appellate court further passes order to dismiss a pending application under O VI, rule 17 of the Code, the order is improper.[299] Where in a first appeal before the high court, an application an application under O XLI, rule 27 of the Code was filed for acceptance of additional evidence and the high court dismissed the appeal without considering the said application, it was held that the order was liable to be set aside and the matter remitted for consideration of the application for additional evidence in accordance with law.[300]

This sub-section is new, having been inserted by the Amendment Act, 1976. Though the section provides for appeals against every decree, the new sub-section restricts that right and bars appeal from facts against decrees passed in suits cognizable by the courts of small causes and where the amount or value of the subject matter of the suit does not exceed three thousand rupees. The sub-section has been enacted to bring the section in line with the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882 and the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887 which contain similar restriction.

It should not be forgotten that right of appeal is not an inherent right, but it is essentially a creature of statute. Unless the statute gives the right of appeal, the same does not exist. At the same time, it cannot be disputed that once such right is conferred by a statute, it becomes a vested right; however, the same can always be subjected to conditions which may be imposed by the legislature, in which case a party would not be entitled to exercise such right without fulfilment of those conditions. Bearing in mind this well settled principle of law, if one peruses sub-section (4) of section 96, it is apparent that the same comprises two conditions relating to the exercise of right of appeal against a decree passed by the civil court. The first condition is that, for the purpose of regular appeal against a decree, the valuation of the suit has to exceed Rs 10,000. Otherwise, the second condition is that the interference by the appellate court can only be on the point of law and not otherwise. Therefore, the contention that the petitioner has no right of appeal, cannot be accepted.[301]

In respect of appeal from decrees passed by Courts of Small Causes, a very unusual question arose before a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court. In a suit the plaint was not returned by the Court Small Causes and the suit was decided by that Court. An appeal was filed against the decree on the ground that sub-section (4) of section 96 permitted filing of an appeal against a decree of a Court of Small Causes where the value of the subject-matter does not exceed Rs 10.000/-. Repelling the plea, the Division Bench held that section 96(4) has no application in such cases.[302]

The legal aspect involved in the matter has been explained by the Division Bench in the following way:

> 7. According to the Presidency Small Causes Courts Act, all money decree of the nature cognizable by the Presidency Small Causes Court and decided by such Court is final and no appeal lies against such decree. There is a similar provision also in the Provincial Small Causes Court Act. However, Sub-section (4) of Section 96 of the Act (sic) has been introduced for the purpose of giving right of appeal against decree passed by an ordinary civil Court in respect of a suit which is of the "nature cognizable by Court of Small Causes", but the plaint of which has been returned by the Court of Small Causes as the question of title is involved in such suit.
> 8. Therefore, if a suit of the nature cognizable by Courts of Small Causes is not decided by such Court in view of involvement of question of title and consequently, is returned to an ordinary civil court for disposal, a decree passed by such ordinary civil Court in this type of suit is appealable in terms of Section 96(4) of the Act.(sic).
>
> 9. In the case before us, the plaint was not returned by the Court of Small Causes and the suit was decided by such Court. Therefore, Section 96(4) of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application.
>
> 10. The use of the phrase "from a decree in any suit of the nature cognizable by Courts of Small Causes" itself signifies that if a decree is passed by the Court of Small causes without returning the plaint, there is no scope of appeal and for that reason the legislature has not used the phrase "from a decree of any suit passed by Courts of Small Causes.[303]

[s 96.45] Death of One of Appellants

Laws of procedure are meant to regulate effectively, assist and aid the object of doing substantial and real justice and not to foreclose even an adjudication on merits of substantial rights of citizen under personal, property and other laws. Procedure has always been viewed as the handmaid of justice and not meant to hamper the cause of justice or sanctify miscarriage of justice. A careful reading of the provisions contained in O XXII of the CPC as well as the subsequent amendments thereto, would lend credit and support to the view that they were devised to ensure their continuation and culmination into an effective adjudication and not to retard the further progress of the proceedings and thereby non-suit the others similarly placed as long as their distinct and independent rights to property or any claim remain intact and are not lost forever due to the death of one or the other in the proceedings. The provisions contained in O XXII are not to be construed as a rigid matter of principle but must ever be viewed as a flexible tool of convenience in the administrating of justice.[304]

Where, in the appeal, there was death of one or the other appellant, an application for setting aside abatement, condonation of delay and bringing legal representatives on record was made and the main appeal was on file before the high court, and in such circumstances, an order by the high court rejecting application of legal representations would result in grave injustice to remaining appellants by denying them of their right to have an adjudication of their claims on merits and such order was found liable to be set aside by the Supreme Court.[305]

[s 96.46] Bar of Limitation – Effect

As soon a court decides that a particular suit or appeal or application is barred by limitation, then, the only course left to the court is to dismiss that suit or appeal or application. This is for the simple reason that being time barred, if such suit, appeal or application is not maintainable, the court cannot proceed to decide the issues involved therein on merits.[306]

[s 96.47] Power of Court

See notes under the same heading under section 47.

The Supreme Court has held that a suit is ordinarily tried on the issues raised by the parties. Additional issues which do not arise for consideration in suit or appeal cannot be framed by court on its own.[307]

SB Sinha, J, speaking for the Division Bench in the above case observed as follows:

> We, therefore, are of the opinion that the High Court was not correct in framing the additional issues which did not arise for consideration in the suit or in the appeal. Even otherwise, the High Court should have formulated the points for its consideration in terms of Order XLI, Rule 31 of the Code. On the pleadings of the parties and in view of the submissions made, no such question arose for its consideration.[308]

The Supreme Court also observed in the above case, as follows:

> Scope and ambit of jurisdiction of the High Court in determining an issue in an appeal filed in terms of Section 96 of the Code of Civil Procedure (which would be in continuation > of the original suit) and exercising power of judicial review under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India would be different. While in the former, the court, subject to the procedural flexibility has laid down under the statute is bound to act within the four corners thereof, in adjudicating a lis in exercise of its power of judicial review, the High Court exercises a wider jurisdiction. No doubt, the court in an appropriate case, even in a civil suit may mould a relief but its jurisdiction in this behalf would be confined to Order VII, Rule 7 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[309]

Where criminal proceedings are initiated on the basis of observations made in civil suit, the appellate court in appeal against decree can go into the correctness of the observations made by the lower court. But filing of an independent criminal proceeding is not barred by any statute. Therefore, stay granted to criminal proceedings is improper.[310]

[S 97] Appeal from final decree where no appeal from preliminary decree.— Where any party aggrieved by a preliminary decree passed after the commencement of this Code does not appeal from such decree, he shall be precluded from disputing its correctness in any appeal which may be preferred from the final decree.

SYNOPSIS

[s 97.1]	Object	1158	[s 97.5]	Two Preliminary Decrees	1161
[s 97.2]	Preliminary Decree	1158	[s 97.6]	Final Decree Passed Prior to or During Pendency of Appeal from Preliminary Decree	1161
[s 97.3]	Appeal from Preliminary Decree	1159
[s 97.4]	Where Preliminary Decree not Drawn Up	1161

[s 97.1] Object

The object of the section is that questions which have been urged by the parties and decided by the court at the stage of the preliminary decree will not be open for re-agitation at the stage of the preparation of the final decree, and would be taken as finally decided if no appeal has been preferred against the preliminary decree.[311]

[s 97.2] Preliminary Decree

(a) Definition.—For definition of preliminary decree, see section 2(2).

(b) Scope.—Section 97 provides that where any party aggrieved by a preliminary decree. passed after commencement of this code does not appeal from such decree, he shall be precluded from disputing its correctness in any appeal which will be preferred from the final decree. Thus, in view of section 97 of the CPC finality is attached to the preliminary decree. If no appeal is filed against the preliminary decree, its correctness cannot be disputed in any appeal which may be preferred from the final decree. If this is so and this has been the intention of the legislature, then it would be going against the wisdom of the legislature to permit appellant to raise the same question going to the root of the preliminary decree in an appeal from final decree, which was already raised and decided during the appeal against preliminary decree. Likewise, those questions cannot be permitted to be raised in the second appeal.[312]

The Supreme Court held that property can be added in the list of properties in the decree after a preliminary decree is passed in a partition suit. It was observed that a decree, whether preliminary or final is the formal expression of an adjudication, which, so far as regards the court expressing it, conclusively determines the rights of the parties with regard to all or any of the matters in controversy in the suit. The court, therefore, may not have a suo motu power to amend a decree but the same would not mean that the court cannot rectify a mistake. Hence, section 97 would not be a bar to file an application for amendment of a decree to rectify a mistake of the court.[313]

A perusal of the provision of section 97 of CPC will go to show that any party aggrieved by a preliminary decree is under an obligation to file an appeal from such decree, but if he declines to avail of this opportunity, he cannot thereafter dispute the correctness of the preliminary decree when preferring an appeal against the final decree. In other words, in the event of failure to prefer an appeal against a preliminary decree, the preliminary decree is deemed to have attained finality.[314]

The section expressly excepts preliminary decrees from the position assigned to interlocutory orders, precluding an appellant from impeaching them in the course of an attack upon the final decree. This is because a preliminary decree, unless it is appealed against, finally adjudicates the rights and titles of the parties.[315] The final decree in its nature, is dependant and subordinate as it is a decree which has been passed as a result of proceedings directed and controlled by the preliminary decree and based thereon.[316] Matters decided by a preliminary decree cannot therefore be re-agitated at the time of the final decree.[317] In a suit for partition where a preliminary decree is passed, at the time of passing of the final decree it was not open to the respondent to raise the contention that he was a tenant of the suit premises. Section 97 of the CPC specifically provides that where any party aggrieved by the preliminary decree does not appeal from the said decree, he is precluded from disputing its correctness in any appeal which may be preferred from the final decree.[318]

The court reiterated its earlier stand that where an appeal against preliminary decree is filed after passing of the final decree, the right of the party does not get anywhere affected by the subsequent passing of the final decree. Furthermore, the court observed that there is no provision in the Code that says that an appeal against a preliminary decree becomes defunct by the passing of a final decree pending the appeal.[319]

The finality of a decree or judgment does not depend on the executability of a decree. The court may pass a decree declaring the rights of parties. In such decrees, there may be no executable mandate. Nevertheless, issues raised and decided in those cases are binding on the parties and conclusive between the parties in later suits. Section 97 is certainly an indication that matters decided by the court in a preliminary decree should be regarded as embodying the final decision on those matters, as far as the parties are concerned. The points decided in a preliminary judgment in a partition suit will estop the parties on the principle of res judicata from contending the same point in a later suit.[320]

The Calcutta decisions under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 are now obsolete. The general trend of these decisions was in the opposite direction. According to these decisions, a party aggrieved by an order in the nature of preliminary decree was not bound to appeal from the order; though the order was appealable as a decree, he was at liberty to wait until the final decree was passed, and then to dispute the correctness of the order in an appeal from the final decree, though the period of limitation for an appeal from the order had then expired. Thus, it was held that when an order was passed in a suit for dissolution of partnership and accounts, declaring the shares of the parties and referring the case to a commissioner for taking accounts, it was open to the party aggrieved by the order to dispute its correctness in an appeal from the final decree, though no appeal was preferred from the order, and the period prescribed by the law of limitation for appealing from the order had then expired.[321] In subsequent case, it was held by a full bench of that court in Khadem Hossein v Emdad Hossein,[322] that where an order was passed in a suit for partition, declaring the rights of the parties,[323] it was open to the party aggrieved by the order to dispute its correctness in an appeal from the final decree, though no appeal was preferred from the order within the time allowed by law. The contrary had been laid down in an earlier case decided by the same high court,[324] but that decision was dissented from by a majority of the full bench in Khadem Hossein's case. Under this section omission to prefer an appeal from a preliminary decree precludes objections to it in an appeal from the final decree.[325] Thus, it has been held that when a preliminary decree in a partition suit was passed by consent without complying with the provisions of O XXXII, rule 7(1), and no appeal was preferred against it, its validity cannot be questioned in an appeal against the final decree.[326] Where the preliminary decree declared the liability of the defendant to pay compensation, and there was no appeal against it, its correctness could not be attacked in an appeal against the final decree.[327] A contention that the defendant is a man of unsound mind, cannot be urged in an appeal against the final decree, as it could have been put forward at the trial of the suit, nor a contention that the award of mesne profits in the preliminary decree was not legal.[328] A claim by the manager of a tarwad to a fourth share in certain properties alleged to be self-acquired cannot be put forward for the first time in an appeal against the final decree.[329] It is to be noted that the present section applies only to preliminary decrees passed after the commencement of the CPC.[330]

As per section 97, CPC, if a person aggrieved by the preliminary decree has not preferred an appeal from such decree, he or she is not allowed to dispute the correctness of the findings in the preliminary decree in an appeal filed against the final decree. In Selvi v Gopalakrishnan Nair[331], an aggrieved defendant had not preferred an appeal against the preliminary decree but he contested the findings thereof in an appeal against the final decree. Keeping in view the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, where the trial court had not enquired into consistent averments made by the defendant disputing the boundaries and description of the suit property, the apex court made an exception and remanded the case back to the trial court to decide the disputed question on the basis of evidence.

[s 97.4] Where Preliminary Decree not Drawn Up

A right of appeal under this section arises only when a preliminary decree is "passed", that is, drawn up. It is the duty of the court, and not of the parties, to see that a decree is drawn up. Unless a decree is drawn up, there is no appeal. Therefore, the provisions of this section do not apply unless the preliminary decree is drawn up.[332]

[s 97.5] Two Preliminary Decrees

According to a decision of the Bombay High Court, the CPC contemplates only one preliminary decree.[333] But this observation requires modification. In the view of the Calcutta High Court, there can be, in exceptional cases, more than one preliminary decree.[334] So far as partition suits are concerned, if an event transpires after a preliminary decree has been passed which necessitates an alteration in the shares already determined, the court can and should do so and if there is dispute in that regard, the order of the court deciding such a dispute and altering the shares is a decree which is appealable.[335]

[s 97.6] Final Decree Passed Prior to or During Pendency of Appeal from Preliminary Decree

A Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court, after an exhaustive review of the case law, has held that an appeal from a preliminary decree is not incompetent if the final decree is passed before it is presented, and that in such a case, it is not necessary for the party aggrieved by the preliminary decree to appeal against the final decree, if the final decree, apart from being based on the preliminary decree, is otherwise correct.[336] Chief Justice Rankin said that the function of the final decree is merely to restate and apply with precision what the preliminary decree has ordained; that the decrees being in the same suit, the court in appeal from the preliminary decree, as it has power to reverse or vary the preliminary decree, has also the power to affect the final decree; that as the right of appeal from the preliminary decree is given without any qualification, the passing of a final decree is no bar to the institution or hearing of any appeal against the preliminary decree; that if the preliminary decree is set aside the final decree is superseded whether the appeal was brought before or after the passing of the final decree; and that the court when setting aside or varying the preliminary decree can and should give directions for setting aside or varying the final decree if the existence of the final decree is brought to its notice as in all cases it should be. The Bombay High Court has taken a similar view.[337] Even apart from special directions, the principle is well-settled "that orders and decrees which are subordinate and dependent on earlier orders and decrees could remain in force so long as the order or decrees on which they are dependent are not reversed or superseded".[338] Where an appeal has been preferred against a preliminary decree, and during its pendency a final decree is passed, that is no bar to the hearing of the appeal against the preliminary decree, as the final decree will be governed by it.[339]

The abovementioned judgment has the effect of overruling previous Calcutta decisions which had held that after the final decree, an appeal from the preliminary decree was incompetent,[340] or infructuous as the final decree cannot be contingent on the result of the appeal from the preliminary decree,[341] and that if the final decree is passed after institution of the appeal from the preliminary decree, the latter should be amended to include an appeal from the final decree.[342]

The Madras and Allahabad High Courts had held that an appeal from the preliminary decree is competent although no appeal has been filed against the final decree, and that after the preliminary decree is set aside, the final decree fails with it.[343] The same view had been taken by the Lahore High Court.[344] If after the passing of the final decree, an appeal from the preliminary decree is dismissed, the decree-holder has a right to apply for a second final decree in conformity with the appellate decree. He may exercise this right within three years of the date of the appellate decree.[345]

[S 98] Decision where appeal heard by two or more Judges.—(1) Where an appeal is heard by a Bench of two or more Judges, the appeal shall be decided in accordance with the opinion of such Judges or of the majority (if any) of such Judges.

(2) Where there is no such majority which concurs in a judgment varying or reversing the decree appealed from, such decree shall be confirmed:

Provided that where the Bench hearing the appeal, is [346][composed of two or other even number of Judges belonging to a Court consisting of more Judges than those constituting the Bench] and the Judges composing the Bench differ in opinion on a point of law, they may state the point of law upon which they differ and the appeal shall then be heard upon that point only by one or more of the other Judges, the such point shall be decided according to the opinion of the majority (if any) of the Judges who have heard the appeal including those who first heard it.

This section corresponds with section 575 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1882 except that the proviso to sub-section (2) of the present section differs in several material respects from the proviso to the second paragraph of section 575. That proviso ran as follows:

> Provided that if the Bench hearing the appeal is composed of two Judges belonging to a court consisting of more than two Judges, and the Judges composing the Bench differ in opinion on a point of law, the appeal may be referred to one or more of the other Judges of the same court, and shall be decided according to the opinion of the majority (if any) of all the judges who have heard the appeal including those who first heard it.

The proviso to sub-section (2) before its amendment in 1976 used the words:

> where the Bench hearing the appeal is composed of two Judges belonging to a court consisting of more than two Judges.

The amendment substitutes for these words the following:

> where the Bench hearing the appeal is composed of two or other even number of Judges belonging to a court consisting or more Judges than those constituting the Bench.

The amendment has been carried out to include cases where a bench of more than two even number of judges is equally divided, and a reference is made to one or more of the other judges of that high court.

Sub-section (3) was inserted in the section by the Repealing and Amending Act 18 of 1928.

There can be only one judgment in a case. Two contradictory judgments or judgments in variance with each other will not have the effect of deciding any question or issue in the case or of deciding any of the rights of the parties. It is also plain that such judgments can neither be enforced nor be given effect to. Therefore, if two judges constituting a Division Bench give contradictory decisions or decisions in variance with each other, in law, such decisions cannot be called as judgments as they do not decide any question or issue in the case or proceeding nor do they decide any of the rights of the parties—the real test being what is the effect of the two decisions on the case or proceedings in which it is made, the language or phraseology used being wholly immaterial, having no bearing. In such a situation, the decisions so rendered will only amount to opinions of the respective judges. This principal will, however, not apply where on account of some statutory provisions like section 98 of the CPC, contradictory decisions by their own force lead to decision of any question or issue in the case or any of the rights of the parties.

347. Inserted by Act 18 of 1928, section 2 and Sch I.

There can be no doubt that the proper course for the judges who have dissented in their respective opinions while hearing a writ petition is not to pass final order, either allowing or dismissing the same, but to state their point of difference after expressing their opinions. However, it will still be open to them to state the point upon which they have differed even if they have passed final orders. If the point of difference is not stated, it will be for the third judge (or judges) to whom the case is referred to ascertain the same and to give his (or their) opinion thereon.[348] For the applicability of the section 98(2) of the CPC, the basic requirement is that the Division Bench of the high court consisting of two or more judges must be dealing with the case, where there is a decision of the lower court which is placed for consideration of the Division Bench of the high court. By its very language, section 98(2), of the CPC cannot be applied to the decisions rendered by a Division Bench of a high court in exercise of its original civil jurisdiction.[349]

In a very recent judgment from the Supreme Court, a peculiar situation arose in the High Court of Sikkim, wherein a matter was heard by the Division Bench at a time when the total strength of the high court was of two judges. There was a difference of opinion between both the judges, as such the matter was agreed to be placed before the Hon'ble Chief Justice/judge as soon as he assumes charge. Thereafter, one of the judges of the Division Bench was transferred to another high court and another judge assumed office in his place. One of the parties thereafter moved an application under section 98(2) read with section 151 of CPC, praying that appeal be not heard by a third judge. Due to inadvertence, the matter was not listed before the successor court but was listed before the court of the Chief Justice. The learned Chief Justice was of the view that the order of reference made on the judicial side by the Division Bench cannot be upset either on the administrative side or on the judicial side. The Chief Justice, hearing the appeal as a third judge, dismissed the application under section 98.

The Supreme Court held that taking into account the fact that for the time being there were only two judges in position and that the learned judges, who constituted the Division Bench, expressed different views and at the same time thought fit to refer the matter to the opinion of a third judge, the matter should wait till the arrival of a third judge.[350]

The words "consisting of" shall mean and also considered to have relevance only to the sanctioned strength. Therefore, taking into account the fact that for the time being, there were only two judges in position and that the learned judges, who constituted the Division Bench.

expressed different views and at the same time thought fit to refer the matter to the opinion of a third judge, the matter should await till the arrival of a third judge.[351]

[s 98.4] Difference of Opinion as to Part of Decree

When a bench of two judges agree in reversing part of a decree but differ as to the rest, the portion of which they agree will be reversed and the rest confirmed.[352]

[s 98.5] Difference of Opinion on a Point of Law

No reference can be made under this section if the judges differ on a question of fact. The power to refer can only be exercised if there is a difference of opinion on a point of law.[353]

[s 98.6] Difference of Opinion on a Question of Fact

No reference can be made under this section if the judges differ on question of fact.

The issues of facts arising between the parties in the suit and appeal were sufficient to decide the cases for or against the plaintiff; the cleavage of opinion between the two judges of the Division Benches on the other mixed issues of law and fact is inconsequential. Their difference of opinion on mixed issues of law and fact, even if it would have been referred for obtaining majority opinion of the judges of the court, would not have changed the ultimate result of the appeals because the judges had also differed on issues of fact and the decision of one of them was sufficient for decision of the cases in appeals. Thus, as the opinion of one of the judges on issues of fact was decisive of the appeal, it would not be in accordance with the established practice of the Supreme Court to interfere by grant of special leave to appeal. Grant of special leave to appeal against judgments raising issues of fact which were determinative would be against the legislative intent contained in provisions of sub-section (2) of section 98 of the CPC.[354]

A two Judge Bench of the Supreme Court[355] doubted the correctness of the decision in PV Hemalatha[356] in which the High Court of Kerala had while relying upon section 98 confirmed the decree under appeal despite difference of opinion between the two judges on the bench and the Supreme Court held that while section 23 of the Travancore-Cochin High Court Act was the general law, section 98(2) was a special provision. In Pankajakshi - I,[357] the Supreme Court took a diametrically opposite view. The matter came up before a three Judge Bench in Pankajakshi –II[358] in 2014, wherein the matter was referred to a 5 Judge Bench on two questions –

> (1) Whether Section 23 of the Travancore-Cochin Act remains unaffected by the repealing provisions of Section 9 of the Kerala High Court Act. If so, whether Section 23 is in the nature of a special provision vis-à-vis Section 98(2) of CPC?
> (2) Whether this Court can under Articles 136 and 142 of the Constitution direct in any appropriate case a reference to a third judge to resolve the conflict arising between two judges of the High Court hearing an appeal, on a question of fact?

A constitution bench of the Supreme Court, therefore, in Pankajakshi –III[359] speaking through Justice Nariman held that held that section 23 of the Travancore-Cochin High Court Act remains unaffected by the repealing provision of section 9 of the Kerala High Court Act, and that, being in the nature of special provision vis-à-vis section 98(2) of the CPC would apply to the Kerala High Court. The view taken in PV Hemalatha,[360] Kulwant Kaur[361] and Tej Kaur[362] therefore stand overruled on this aspect. In his supplementing opinion, Kurian Joseph, J while calling out for a comprehensive legislation pointed out that –

> Under Section 98 of The Civil Procedure Code, 1908 (for short, 'the CPC'), when the Judges differ in opinion on a point of law, the matter is required to be placed for opinion of the third Judge or more of other Judges as the Chief Justice of the High Court deems fit and the point of law on which a difference has arisen is decided by the majority and the appeal is decided accordingly. It is to be seen that under the proviso to Section 98(2) of the CPC, hearing by a third Judge or more Judges is only on the point of law on which the Division Bench could not concur. There is no hearing of the appeal by the third Judge or more Judges on any other aspect. Under Section 98(2) of the CPC, in case an appeal is heard by a Division Bench of two or more Judges, and if there is no majority and if the proviso is not attracted, the opinion of that Judge or of the equally divided strength in the Bench which concurs in a judgment following or reversing the decree appealed from, such decree shall stand confirmed.

[s 98.7] The Appeal Shall Then Be Heard upon That Point Only

Under the old section, it was the appeal that was referred to a third judge when the judges hearing the appeal differed in opinion on a point of law and it was held that on such reference the whole appeal was open for argument, and not only the point of law on which the judges had differed.[363] Under the present section, the judges have to state the point of law upon which they differ, and the appeal is to be heard upon that point only. The third judge has no jurisdiction to adjudicate on points on which the two judges were in agreement.[364]

When a reference is made to the third judge on the difference of opinion on the question of law, it is not open to the third judge to go behind the question of fact arrived at by both the judges. Under section 98, only the question of law on the admitted fact can be referred to the third judge for the disposal.[365]

[s 98.8] By Whom Appeal to be Heard Upon Point of Law Stated

Where a point of law on which the judges hearing the appeal differ has been stated, the appeal is to be heard upon that point by one or more of the other judges of the court. This was, in fact, the practice followed in Bombay under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882.[366] In Allahabad, the appeal was heard by a bench including the judges who first heard it.[367] It is to be noted that while the appeal upon the point of law under this section is to be heard by a judge or judges other than those who first heard it, the point is to be decided according to the opinion of the majority (if any) of the judges who have heard the appeal including those who first heard it.

[s 98.9] Where Judges Differ on a Point of Law, but do not State the Point

A obtains a decree against B in the court of a subordinate judge. B appeals from the decree to the district judge and the decree is confirmed in appeal. B appeals to the high court. The appeal is heard by a bench of two judges. The judges differ in opinion on a point of law, but they do not state the point of law, and deliver judgments as judgments of the court without any reservation, one judge holding that the appeal should be allowed and the other that it should be dismissed. In such a case, the dissenting judgments operate as confirming the decree of the district court under para 1 of sub-section sub-section (2).[368] The question still remains whether an appeal lies to the high court under the Letters Patent from the confirming judgment. Under the Letters Patent, before they were amended in 1928, it was held that an appeal did lie from such judgment.[369] Under the amended Letters Patent no appeal lies to the high court.[370] It may here be noted that where the judges differ in opinion on a point of law, but do not state the point of law and deliver judgments as judgments of the court without any reservation, they cannot afterwards state the point of law.[371] Judges hearing an appeal were equally divided. Hearing of appeal by third judge was proposed. But there was no joint order, specifying the difference. It was held that this did not vitiate the hearing by the third judge.[372] differed, then if the appeal was one from the original side of the high court the procedure was governed by clause 36 of the Letters Patent,[374] but if the appeal was from the decree of a subordinate judge, the procedure was governed by the present section.[375] At the same time, it was held by the High Court of Allahabad[376] that clause 27 of the Letters Patent of that high court (corresponding to clause 36 of the Letters Patent of the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay) applied even to appeals from the decree of a subordinate judge. All the cases were reviewed by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court[377] and it was held that the effect of sub-section (3) was that clause 36 applied not only to appeals from the original side of a chartered high court but also to appeals to the high court from decrees of subordinate courts. The Supreme Court considered the Madras judgment and held that the view of Madras High Court and various other high courts is right that the provisions of section 98 are not applicable to high courts which are governed by Letters Patent and a matter can be referred to a third judge on a difference of opinion between two judges even on a point of fact.[378] Thus, the effect of sub-section (3) is that section 98 applies only to courts other than chartered high courts. The difference of procedure between clause 36 and section 98 is:

(i) that while a reference on the point of difference is obligatory under clause 36, it is optional under section 98; and

(ii) while a reference under clause 36 may be on a question of fact and law, it can be on a question of law only under section 98.[379]

In State of Andhra Pradesh v Pratap Karan,[380] it was contended that the judges of Division Bench who heard the appeal differed vertically in as much as section 98(2) provides for confirmation of the decree of the trial court. Reference to the third judge was made in the present case not after formulating any points of disagreement on the question of law, hence the reference by the Chief Justice to the third judge was ultra vires. It was also submitted that even if the provisions of the Letters Patent Act were invoked the same cannot override the provisions of section 98. It was also submitted that even if clause 36 of the Letters Patent of Madras High Court as adopted by the Andhra Pradesh High Court is held applicable, as no points of agreement have at all been formulated for consideration by two judges who heard the appeal, reference to third judge was incompetent. The Supreme Court held that there was complete compliance with clause 36 of the Letters Patent of the Andhra Pradesh High Court and refused to reverse the finding of the two judges of the high court.

Rule 6 of Chapter II of Patna High Court Rules states as follows:

> 6. Appeals to the High Court under Clause 10 of the Letters Patent from the judgement of a Bench confirming the judgement of a Lower Court under Section 98 of the Code of Civil Procedure shall be heard by a Bench consisting of at least three Judges, including both or neither of the Judges of the Bench from whose judgment the appeal is preferred, and

The mere circumstance of there being an error, defect or irregularity in any proceeding in a suit, is no ground for reversing or varying a decree in appeal. But if it appears that the error, defect or irregularity affected the merits of the case or jurisdiction of the court, it would be a ground for reversing or varying the decree. Where an irregularity is one which affects the merits of a case or the "jurisdiction of a court", it is said to be a material irregularity. Where it does not, it is usually spoken as a mere irregularity. This section cures a mere irregularity, error of defect. It does not cure a material irregularity, error or defect. In a case of alleged misjoinder of causes of action, the Privy Council applied the principle of this section and observed:

> The provisions contained in the Civil Procedure Code do not regulate the procedure of their Lordships in bearing appeals from India, but there can be no doubt that the rule embodied in Section 99 proceeds upon a sound principle, and is calculated to promote justice.[388]

The appellate court should interfere with the judgment under appeal not because it is not right, but when it is shown to be wrong.[389] In Kiran Singh v Chaman Paswan,[390] the policy behind this section was thus stated by the Supreme Court:

> When a case had been tried by a court on the merits and judgment rendered, it should not be liable to be reversed purely on technical grounds, unless it had resulted in failure of justice.

A claim of second wife for maintenance after the suppression of the fact about the first marriage and desertion of second wife after cruelty is a substantial question of law for the purposes of section 100.[391]

An objection as to territorial jurisdiction of a court which has passed the decree on merits and where no prejudice has been caused, is held to be of a technical nature to which this section would apply. Thus, where judicial separation in an application by the husband was decreed, such a decree would not be treated as a nullity in subsequent divorce proceedings under section 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955 on the ground that the marriage was neither solemnised nor had the parties the required residence within the territorial jurisdiction of the court.[392] But this section would not protect a decree where there is defect of pecuniary jurisdiction.[393] The eviction of the same tenant or the same tenants jointly from two or more tenements in one suit by the landlord is legally permissible; and that such a suit cannot be dismissed for mis-joinder of causes of action.[394] The question before the Hon'ble Supreme Court was whether every violation of regulations renders the inquiry and the punishment void under the provisions of State Bank of Patiala (Officers') Service Regulation, containing provisions corresponding to section 99 of the CPC and section 465 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 or whether the principle underlining section 99 of the CPC and section 465 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 are applicable in the case of disciplinary proceedings as well. The Hon'ble Supreme Court held that the test in such a case should be one of prejudice, as would be later explained in this judgment. But this statement is subject to a rider. The regulation may contain substantive provisions and example regarding the authority competent to impose a particular punishment on a particular employee/officer. Such provisions must be strictly complied with. But there may be any number of procedural provisions which stand on a different footing. Even among procedural provisions, there may be some provisions which are of fundamental provision in the case of which the theory of substantial compliance may not be applicable.[395]

The question for consideration before the Supreme Court was that whether the suit filed by the father of the appellants in respect of property owned by appellants could be held to be not maintainable even when the appellants were added as plaintiffs as heirs of their father who died during pendency of the suit and whether description of the appellants who are owners as heirs instead of owners in their own right will be a case of mere "error, defect or irregularity" not affecting the merits or jurisdiction of the court which did not affect the maintainability of the suit? The Supreme Court, speaking through Goel, J, held that the District Judge was not justified in reversing the decree of the trial court on such a technicality which did not in any manner affect the merits of the case and referred to section 99 to hold that decree of trial court cannot be reversed on the said ground.[396]

[s 99.3] Misjoinder of Parties or Causes of Action

This expression may be analysed and the rule contained in this part of the section may be stated as follows:

No decree shall be reversed or substantially varied, nor shall any case be remanded in appeal, on account of:

(i) misjoinder of plaintiffs (O I, rule 1);

(ii) misjoinder of defendants (O I, rule 3);

(iii) misjoinder of plaintiffs and causes of action (O II, rule 3).

The practice was different under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882;[397]

(iv) misjoinder of defendants and causes of action.[398]

The words, "on account of any misjoinder of parties or causes of action", have been inserted in the section to make it clear that such a misjoinder is to be treated as a mere irregularity. Hence, the court will not interfere if the merits of the case have been satisfactorily disposed of in spite of the complication of the proceedings due to multifariousness.[401]

[s 99.4] Non-Joinder

The Madras High Court has held that the expression "misjoinder" in this section includes "non-joinder".[402] But this was doubted in a later Madras case.[403] The non-joinder of a necessary party is a defect which affects jurisdiction and is not within this section.[404] This is now confirmed legislatively by the new proviso to the section. The decision to the contrary in Shanmuga v Subbayya,[405] is no longer good law; and where the statute requires the joinder of certain parties, omission to do so cannot be cured by this section.[406] (See O I, rule 9, and notes thereto.)

Exercise of power under O I, rule 10(2) and O VI, rule 17 is not impaired by the addition of provisos to section 99 and O I, rule 9 by 1976 Amendment to the Code. Where there is non-joinder of a necessary party, the court should not dismiss the suit, but should invoke power under O I, rule 10(2) and O VI, rule 17. In such cases, the power of the court under O I, rule 10(2) and O VI, rule 17 (which remain unamended), can be invoked. This power is not impaired or indented in any manner by the aforesaid provisos, the real purport of which is not penal, but remedial.[407]

[s 99.5] Error, Defect or Irregularity not Affecting the Merits of the Case

A decree will not be reversed or substantially varied in appeal for admitting a document not properly stamped,[408] or for non-compliance with O XIII, rule 4, in admitting a document in evidence,[409] or for admitting a document declared invalid where the judgment is not based on that document,[410] or because the wrong side was allowed to begin,[411] or because the suit was decided on a Sunday,[412] or because the suit was instituted by an agent under a defective power of attorney[413] (O III, rule 2), or failure to obtain leave under O II, rule 4,[414] or because the plaint was signed on behalf of the plaintiff by his wife, and no power of attorney was on record,[415] or because an order allowing execution against the legal representative of a deceased judgment-debtor was made by the transferee court instead of by the court which passed the decree.[416] The expression 'any error, defect or irregularity in any proceedings in this suit' will also include signing and verification of the plaint as laid down in rules 14 and 15 of O VI of the CPC. It would be unfair and unjust to reject the plaint merely on the ground that the plaint was not properly signed and/or verified as plaintiff himself came to the witness box and made out the case (I) the plaint.[417] All these are irregularities not affecting the merits of the case or the jurisdiction of the court and they are cured by this section. It has similarly been held that this section applies when there is a misdescription of a party,[418] or when the summons issued is defective[419] or when a guardian ad bite is appointed without notice to the natural guardian as provided in O XXXII, rule 3,[420] or when notice is served without a direction from the court.[421] Where the court, having no jurisdiction, entertained the suit and no prejudice was caused to either side,[422] or where there is an improper verification of the plaint as regards the promissory note in the suit by the plaintiffs mukhtar-i-am especially when execution of the promissory note is admitted,[423] or when agreement to sell immovable property is executed by constituted attorney on behalf of the owner of the property and the suit for specific performance is filed against owner represented by his attorney holding irrevocable power of attorney,[424] the exclusion of evidence by the lower court is an irregularity which may or may not affect the merits of the case; if it does not, the irregularity is condoned under this section.[425] An omission to draw up a final decree under O XXXIV, rule 6, has been condoned under this section;[426] so also when it is not drawn in accordance with the form prescribed.[427] Similarly, substitution of the legal representatives of a deceased judgment-debtor in execution proceedings by the transferee court instead of the court which passed the decree is a procedural defect.[428] So also, failure to transpose the defendant as plaintiff.[429] But it would not be a defect within these sections where an ex parte decree has been passed without the defendant having been duly served.[430] For other cases, see—

In a suit for restoration of possession, the court framed issue regarding title to property which was not required. The court also gave findings on the issue of title which was unnecessary. However, it was held that the decree which is otherwise correct need not be interfered on that ground. Such unnecessary issues and findings thereon can be struck off.[431]

[s 99.6] In any Proceedings in the Suit

These words have been substituted for the words, "whether in the decision or in any other passed in the suit or otherwise", which occurred in section 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882. The latter words were held to apply only to irregularities in proceedings subsequent to the institution of the suit, and not to irregularities in the frame or institution of the suit.[432] The rules of the Chief Court of Oudh require money deposited in court to be paid to the person entitled through the treasury; but when the munsif paid the money directly, this was held to be an irregularity cured by this section.[433] An order for a second commission on the same subject matter without setting aside the report of the first commissioner amounts to an irregularity in the proceedings.[434] The present section applies to irregularities in any proceedings in the suit. But it has no application to awards.[435]

When a suit has been decided after going into merits and judgment delivered, the appellate court would not entertain an objection as to jurisdiction unless it has resulted in failure of justice. Thus, in a suit for accounts if the trial court has tried the issues on merits and passed a preliminary decree, the appellate court, in an appeal against that decree, would refuse to go into the question of territorial jurisdiction.[436]

Defendants claimed for themselves title to a temple constructed a hundred years ago and adjoining land in, and joined issues on the points with the plaintiffs. Oral evidence alone was led by the parties in the suit. It was held that the defendant cannot ask for reversing the finding given by the court in favour of the plaintiff, on the mere ground that the same was given on oral evidence.[437] Suit on basis of sale deed which was registered was filed. Certified copy of the sale deed was admitted by the trial court, as the original was lost. It was held that admissibility of the document could not be assailed in appeal.[438]

[s 99.8] Sale of Property of Minor

Where there was alienation of minor son's property by father and on attaining majority, the son filed a suit for declaration of title and ejectment of vendee without asking for relief of setting aside alienation covered by sale deed, it was held that the suit was not maintainable and was liable to be dismissed, as omission to ask for such relief cannot be considered as an error or defect or irregularity within the meaning of section 99.[439]

[s 99.9] Omission to Sign Exhibit — Effect

Where the exhibit which was accepted by both sides as a piece of document and which was marked in presence of both the parties, the failure to sign it by the presiding officer should not vitiate a judgment and a judgment cannot be deemed to be a nullity.[440]

[s 99.10] Suits Valuation Act, 1887, Section 11

Section 11 of the Suits Valuation Act, 1887 modifies the provisions of the present section in cases where an objection is taken in appeal that by reason of the over-valuation or under-valuation of a suit a court which had no jurisdiction with respect to the suit exercised jurisdiction with respect thereto.

After the amendment of section 2(2) by the deletion of the words "section 47 or (in 1976), an order under section 47 is no longer 'a decree' and is not appealable either under section 99A or under section 104."[441]

In a suit for possession, the reversal of the decree was sought on the ground that counter-claims was not properly valued. The plaintiffs could not establish their rights by means of an iota of evidence. It was held by the Allahabad High Court that even if the valuation was not in accordance with the Suits Valuation Act, the judgment and decree cannot be interfered with in second appeal.[442]

[[443][S 99A] No order under section 47 to be reversed or modified unless decision of the case is prejudicially affected.—Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of section 99, no order under section 47 shall be reversed or substantially varied, on account of any error, defect or irregularity in any proceeding relating to such order, unless such error, defect or irregularity has prejudicially affected the decision of the case.]

The section follows the policy of the last section. Its object is to prevent interference with an order passed under section 47 by the executing court only on the ground of some error, defect or irregularity in the proceeding wherein it has been passed. But the section does not save from interference by the appellate court a material error, defect or irregularity which has prejudicially affected the decision of the case.

Kerala.—In sub-section (1) of Section 100, after clause (c), the following new clause (d) shall be added, namely:—

(d) the finding of the lower Appellate Court on any question of fact material to the right decision of the case on the merits being in conflict with the finding of the court of first instance on such question—CPC (Kerala Amendment) Act (13 of 1957) (w.e.f. 1-10-1958).

The amended section has drastically cut down the scope of this section by providing in sub-section (1), that a second appeal is henceforth competent only if the case involves, at the stage of admission, a substantial question of law. Further, such a question has to be precisely stated in the memorandum of appeal. Where the substantial question of law is not stated in the memorandum of appeal, the court shall formulate the same. The respondent however, has the right to challenge that no substantial question of law is involved. It has been reiterated that the framing of a substantial question of law is not necessary where the high court decides to dismiss the second appeal at an admission stage itself.[445]

Where the high court framed the substantial question of law involved in second appeal, but instead of answering them, it remitted the matter to the first appellate court, the Supreme Court set it aside on this ground itself and remanded the matter to the high court.[446]

It has been settled by the Supreme Court that on the day when the second appeal is listed for hearing on admission if the high court is satisfied that no substantial question of law is involved, it shall dismiss the second appeal without even formulating the substantial question of law. In cases where the high court after hearing the appeal is satisfied that the substantial question of law is involved, it shall formulate that question and then the appeal shall be heard on those substantial questions of law, after giving notice and opportunity of hearing to the respondent and the high court cannot reverse the judgment of the courts below without formulating the substantial question of law and complying with the mandatory requirements of section 100.[447]

In Balwinder Singh v National Fertilizers Ltd,[448] the Supreme Court held that the second appellate court has no jurisdiction to admit or decide the second appeal without formulating a substantial question of law at the initial stage.

In Amar Nath v Kewla Devi,[449] the Supreme Court observed:

> In our considered viewpoint, the High Court has committed a grave error in procedure by not framing substantial question of law and setting aside the judgment and decree of the first appellate court. The finding of fact recorded by the first appellate court on the contentious issues was based on reappreciation of the pleadings and evidence on record and careful perusal of the law and the High Court has failed to discharge its duty by not framing the mandatory substantial questions of law in order to examine the correctness of the judgment and decree passed by the first appellate court. In the interest of justice, the judgment and decree of the High Court has to be set aside as it has omitted to frame substantial questions of law and answer the same and thus has failed to discharge its duty under Section 100 CPC.

Under section 100 of Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (as amended in 1976) the jurisdiction of the high court to interfere with the judgment of the court below is confined to hearing on substantial questions of law. Interference with a finding of a fact by the high court is not warranted if it involves re-appreciation of the evidence.[450] Where on the basis of evidence on record the trial court and the first appellate court had concurrently arrived at a finding of fact. The high court, in second appeal, cannot reverse the said concurrent findings under ordinary circumstances,[451] especially when the high court has not been able to find out any material that the findings of the trial court as well as the first appellate court were palpably erroneous.[452] The Supreme Court, time without number, pointed out that interference with the concurrent findings of the court below by the high court under section 100, must be avoided unless warranted by compelling reasons. In any case, the high court is not expected to re-appreciate the evidence just to replace the findings of the lower courts.[453] Where a court comes to a finding that the matter involved virtually the appreciation of oral and documentary evidence, it will not be proper in exercise of jurisdiction, under section 100 of the CPC to consider evidence afresh at the second appeal stage and in view of the fact that the parties are litigating for last 24 years. The interest of justice would be met if judgment and decree passed by lower appellate court is set aside and the matter is remanded back to the lower appellate court with a direction to decide afresh the appeal on merits in view of the observations of the high court in the judgment.[454] If, however, that court has patently gone wrong in casting the burden of proof and has misread the evidence and has also not considered the basic requirements to substantiate the case, it cannot be said that the high court is not competent to re-appreciate the evidence, to correct the mistake by the lower appellate court.[455]

Where the answer to the substantial questions of law framed by the high court was given after thorough adjudication to annul the concurrent findings of the courts below, the Supreme Court affirmed the same.[456]

It is well settled that in a second appeal, the high court can interfere with the concurrent findings of fact if they are perverse.[457] In Rajasthan SRTC,[458] the Supreme Court held that in exceptional circumstances, the high court can entertain the second appeal on pure questions of fact. It was further held that there is no prohibition for the high court to entertain a second appeal in this manner where factual findings are found to be perverse. Even in Easwari v Parvathi,[459] the Supreme Court reiterated the same. It was held in this case that though a plain reading of section 100 conveys that a second appeal be allowed only when there is a "substantial question of law" involved, the high court can interfere in second appeal when the findings of the first appellate court are not properly supported by evidence. There is no absolute ban on the high court in second appeal to interfere with the facts advanced in concurrent findings.

Thus, the position of law is that the high court can only entertain a second appeal on a substantial question of law and it has absolutely no jurisdiction to entertain a second appeal on the ground of erroneous finding of law, however gross the error may seem to be.[460] A combined reading of sections 100 and 101 of CPC providing the grounds for second appeal and providing further that no second appeal can be entertained on any other ground, will make it clear that facts are almost a no entry zone for the second appellate court.[461] Though, this is a basic principle of law, there is or cannot be any rigid rule in this respect. In deciding a second appeal in proper perspective, the second appellate court may have to enter into the question of facts.[462] Where the high court did not examine the facts of the case in the light of the laws prevailing at the time of the sales, the finding of the court is amenable to correction by way of an appeal.[463]

Section 100 states that the memorandum of the second appeal shall precisely state the substantial question of law involved in it. In such cases, the high court while admitting or entertaining the appeal must formulate the substantial question of law involved in the appeal if satisfied. The appeal shall then be heard on the questions so formulated and the parties shall be allowed to argue on the framed substantial questions of law. However, the proviso to section 100 empowers the court to hear the parties on other substantial questions of law which were not formulated earlier after recording reasons. Therefore, if the memorandum of appeal is not drafted in the stipulated manner, the court may reject the memorandum of appeal or return the same for the purposes of being amended within the time fixed by the court.[464]

In a suit for declaration of title and possession, which had been discussed by the trial court, the first appellate court granted partial relief to the plaintiff. The plaintiff filed second appeal questioning the rejection of his claim over part of the suit land. It was held by the Supreme Court that the reversal of the second appellate court of the partial relief granted by the lower court, without there being any appeal filed by the defendant, was improper.[465]

In P Chandrasekharan v S Kanakrajan,[466] it has been stated by the Supreme Court that there cannot be any doubt whatsoever that a substantial question of law is different from a question of law. Interpretation of a document which goes to the root of the title of a party to the lis would indisputably give rise to a question of law. It has been further observed that "what is prohibited for the High Court while exercising this jurisdiction under s 100 of CPC is to interfere with a finding of fact. This limited jurisdiction, inter alia, would become exercisable when the findings are based on misreading of evidence or so perverse that no reasonable person of ordinary prudence could take the said view."[467]

Explaining the scope of section 100 of the Code, a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court held that the prohibition against second appeal contained in sub-section (3) of section 37 of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996, refers to second appeal from an order passed in appeal under section 37 of the said Act and not to second appeal contemplated under section 100 of the Code.[468]

Bhonsle, J, speaking for the full bench, observed as follows:

> It is true that s 37(3) expressly prohibits a "second appeal" from an order passed in appeal under s 37(1) and 38(2) except an appeal to the Supreme Court. However, there is clear indication inherent in sub-section (3) that the expression "second appeal" does not mean an appeal under100 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[469]

The Full Bench further went on to observe that second appeal contemplated under section 37(3) of the Act means an appeal under the letters patent for which there is express prohibition.[470]

In between the domains occupied respectively by questions of fact and of law, there is a large area in which both these questions run into each other, forming so to say, enclaves within each other. The question that arises for determination in that area is known as mixed questions of law and fact. These questions involve first the ascertainment of facts on the evidence adduced and then determination of the rights of the parties on an application of the appropriate principles of law to the facts ascertained.[471]

A cross objection can be maintained in an appeal against an appellate decree but only if a substantial question of law is raised therein. The stringent conditions embodied in section 100 shall be applicable to a cross objection filed in a second appeal. In other words, the cross objection shall precisely state the substantial questions of law involved in the cross objection and the cross objection will be admitted only if the high court is satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law.[472]

The high court, it is well settled, while exercising jurisdiction under section 100 of the CPC, cannot reverse the finding of the lower appellate court on facts merely on the ground that on the facts found by the lower appellate court, another view was possible.[473]

The jurisdiction of the courts in first appeals, second appeals or revisions are all, to the extent, conferred by the legislature. No litigant possesses any natural or inherent right to appeal against any order, unless a statue confers it and it is to the extent it is conferred.[474] The right of appeal which is statutory right can be conditional or qualified. It cannot be said that such a law would be violative of Article 14 of the Constitution. If the statue does not create any right of appeal, no appeal can be filed. The right of appeal inheres in no one, and therefore, for maintainability of an appeal, there must be the authority of law. When such a law authorises filing of an appeal, it can impose conditions as well.[475] Right to notice in proceedings in court of law or quasi-judicial proceedings is different from the right of appeal. The former may arise, either under the statutory provisions or the principal of natural justice may require it or it may be necessary on principal of legitimate expectation; but right of appeal is always statutory. The courts cannot confer or infer it. What is legislatively not permitted cannot be read by implication, not in respect of right of appeal, as it "is a creature of statue". Granting right to appeal to local authorities against order of reference court would be legislating and not interpretation.[476] An appeal does not lie against mere "findings" recorded by a court unless the finding amount to a "decree" or "order". Where a suit is dismissed, the defendant against whom an adverse finding might have come to be recorded on some issue, has no right of appeal and he cannot question those findings before the appellate court.[477] A second appeal is not maintainable against an order dismissing an appeal as time barred, after rejecting condonation application under section 5 of Limitation Act, 1963.[478]

The issue before the Supreme Court was whether the high court was right in interfering with the findings of facts arrived at by the lower appellate court on the ground that the appellate court had not adverted to the various reasons given by the trial court and whether the burden of proving the heirship was on the defendant. It was held that even assuming burden of proof is relevant in the context of the amended provisions of section 100 of CPC, the same would not be relevant when both sides had adduced evidence. It would be relevant, only if a person on whom the burden of proof lay failed to adduce any evidence altogether.[479]

In the undernoted case,[480] the Supreme Court has a word of caution for the high courts in respect of second appeals:

> 9.3. it is a matter of concern that the scope of second appeals and as also the procedural aspects of second appeals are often ignored by the High Courts. Some of the off-repeated errors are:
>
> (a) Admitting a second appeal when it does not give rise to a substantial question of law.
>
> (b) Admitting second appeals without formulating substantial question of law.
>
> (c) Admitting second appeals by formulating a standard or mechanical question such as 'whether on the facts and circumstances the judgment of the first Appellate Court calls for interference' as the substantial question of law.
>
> (e) Rejecting second appeals on the ground that the case does not involve any substantial question of law, when the case in fact involves substantial questions of law.
>
> (f) Reformulating the substantial question of law after the conclusion of the hearing, while preparing the judgment, thereby denying an opportunity to the parties to make submissions on the reformulated substantial question of law.
>
> (g) Deciding second appeals by re-appreciating evidence and interfering with findings of fact, ignoring the questions of law.
> These lapses or technical errors lead to injustice and also give rise to avoidable further appeals to this court and remands by this court, thereby prolonging the period of litigation. Care should be taken to ensure that the cases not involving substantial questions of law are

The high court, in second appeal, should remand the case to the first appellate court which is the final court of fact and not directly to the trial court for recording a finding of fact. Where, however, the high court directly calls for a finding from trial court, depriving right of appeal to the first appellate court, it should scrutinise that finding.[481]

Once second appeal has been dismissed, this special civil application under Article 227 of the Constitution of India is not maintainable. The petitioners cannot be permitted to avail of the remedy under Article 227 of the Constitution of India when regular remedy under CPC has been availed of, in which they failed.[482]

An order under O XXII, rule 9, appealable as an order, would not be a decree and therefore, no second appeal would lie against that order. Such an appeal is liable to be rejected as incompetent.[483] Finding of the appellate court with the possession was not adverse and cannot normally be interfered within second appeal under section 100.[484]

While it is true that events and changes in the law occurring during the pendency of an appeal required to be taken into consideration in order to do complete justice between parties so that a futile decree may not be passed, it is also right and necessary that the decree should be so moulded as to accord with the changed statutory situation. The right obtained by a party under a decree cannot be allowed to be defeated by delay in the disposal of appeal against the decree, if it is possible to save the decree by moulding it to confer to the statute subsequently coming into force.[485]

An error in the lower court judgment can be rectified by the high court, even though the plaintiff has not preferred any appeal.[486]

Where the lower appellate court after taking all aspects into consideration directed CBSE to declare the final result of the candidate who did not possess the requisite attendance, the high court, in second appeal, shall not interfere in the findings of the lower appellate court, particularly, because question was regarding academic career of the students.[487]

An order of court decreeing suit cannot be set aside in second appeal on grounds of non-service of application for substitution as provided by rule 21 of Civil Rules and Orders when no such grievance was made before passing of decree.[488]

If under a wrong impression the appellate court has drawn up a decree, if does not confer a right on the appellant to prefer an appeal.[489]

A party who abandons a particular plea at a particular stage cannot be allowed to re-agitate an appeal.[490]

The defendants could suffer a decree before the trial court, by their omission to file any appeal before the first appellate court must be considered to have abandoned their right to file an appeal against the decree in so far as it went against them before the trial court, and cannot, therefore, be allowed to file an appeal in the high court by way of second appeal under the pretext of challenging the judgment and decree of the first appellate court. Permitting such an appeal will amount to permitting appeal directly to be allowed to file against the judgment and decree of the trial court by a person who has not chosen to challenge the judgment of the trial court before the first appellate court.[491]

Section 100 does not affect the provision of second appeal as contained in special or local laws like the Punjab Courts Act, 1877.[492]

The question before the Supreme Court was whether the Letters Patent Appeal (Patna High Court) filed against the order of the single judge was maintainable. It was held that a judgment passed by one judge in second appeal, under section 100 of the CPC or any other provision of an special Act no letters patent appeal will lie to the high court provided the second appeal was against a decree or order of a district judge or a subordinate judge or any other judge subject to the superintendence of the high court passed in a first appeal under section 96 of the CPC or any other provision of a special Act.[493]

The first sub-section is largely retained, except for two changes. The first change is that the word "where" in the commencement of the sub-section is replaced by the word "as". The substitution is only nominal and makes no significant difference. The second change is vital and restricts the scope of the second appeal drastically in that clauses (a), (b) and (c) of the unamended sub-section are limited and are replaced by the words "if the High Court is satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law". The substitution means that even if the decision of the court of first appeal is contrary to law, or some usage, or custom having the force of law or even if the decision has failed to determine a material issue of law or suffers from a substantial error or defect in the procedure, no second appeal would lie unless there is a substantial, question of law involved. There is, thus, a possibility of injustice being perpetuated. Sub-section (2) remains the same. Sub-sections (3), (4) and (5) and the proviso to sub-section (5) are new. One wonders why the high court is required to formulate the substantial question of law under sub-section (4) even though such question is required to be precisely formulated in the memorandum of appeal under sub-section (3) and the high court is required to be satisfied presumably at the time of admission that such a question is involved in the appeal. The section, as framed, is unnecessarily involved, for, if the object was to limit the second appeal where a substantial question of law is involved, sub-sections (1), (2) and (3) were enough. Even where the high court is satisfied that the appeal involves a substantial question of law and formulates it, the respondent is still given the right to argue that the case does not involve such a question' Luckily, the proviso retains the power of the high court to hear the appeal on a substantial point of law even though it has not been formulated by it. thus, ensuring that no injustice is done to appellant where such a question is not formulated through mistake or inadvertence.

[s 100.4] Section as it Stood Before the Amendment

In order to understand the scope of the second appeal as now restricted, the section as it stood before the amendment is set out below:

> 100(1). Save where otherwise expressly provided in the body of this Code or by any other law for the time being in force, an appeal shall lie to the High Court from every decree passed in appeal by any court subordinate to a High Court on any of the following grounds, namely:
> (a) the decision being contrary to law or to some usage having the force of law;
>
> (b) the decision having failed to determine some material issue of law or usage having the force of law;
>
> (c) a substantial error or defect in the procedure provided by this Code or by any other law for the time being in force, which may possibly have produced error or defect in the decision of the case upon the merits.
>
> (2) An appeal may lie under this section from an appellate decree passed ex parte.

[s 100.5] Grounds of Appeal Under the Unamended Section

The section even as it stood before its recent amendment allowed a second appeal only on the grounds set out in clauses (a), (b) or (c). Therefore, whereas a court of first appeal is competent to enter into questions of fact and decide for itself whether the findings of fact by the lower court are or are not erroneous, a court of second appeal was not and is not competent to entertain the question as to the soundness of a finding of fact by the court below.[494] A second appeal, accordingly, could lie only on one or the other grounds specified in the section.[495] A judge to whom a memorandum of appeal was presented for admission could consider whether any of the grounds specified in the section existed, and if they did not could reject the appeal summarily.[496] The limitations to the power of the court imposed by sectionss 100 and 101 in a second appeal had to be attended to and an appellant was not allowed to question the finding of fact of the first appellate court upon a matter of fact[497]. "Nothing can be clearer that the declaration in the Civil Procedure Code that no second appeal will lie except on the grounds specified in the section. No Court in India or elsewhere has power to add to or enlarge those grounds."[498]

As held in Durga Chowdhrani v Jawahar Singh,[499] by the Privy Council, there is no jurisdiction to entertain a second appeal on the ground of erroneous finding of facts, however gross in error they may seem to be. The same view has been expressed also by the Supreme Court.[500] No doubt, a second appeal lay where there was a substantial error or defect in procedure under clause (c), but an erroneous finding of fact is distinct from an error or defect in procedure. Accordingly, where there was no error or defect in procedure, the finding of the first appellate court upon a question of fact had to be regarded as final, if that Court had before it evidence proper for its consideration in support of the finding,[501] even though the finding was material or the determination of a question not raised in the Court below but raised in the second appeal.[502] The finding of tact to be final has, ofcourse, to be clear, specific and unambiguous.[503] In Ramratan Sukul v Mussamat Nandu,[504] the Judicial Committee said:

> It has now been conclusively settled that the third Court, which in this case was the Court of Judicial Commissioner, cannot entertain an appeal upon any question as to the soundness of findings of fact by the second Court; if there is evidence to be considered the decision of the second Court, however unsatisfactory it might be if examined, must stand final.

The mere fact that the high court would have upon documents and evidence placed before the Court of first appeal come to a different conclusion is no ground for a second appeal.[505] The section was enacted for the express purpose of securing some measure of finality in cases where the balance of evidence, verbal and documentary, arose for decision.[506] In Nafar Chandra Pal v Sukar,[507] their Lordships said:

> Questions of law and of fact are sometimes difficult to disentangle. The proper legal effect of a proved fact is necessarily a question of law, so also is the question of admissibility of evidence and the question whether any evidence has been offered on one side or the other; but the question whether the fact has been proved, when evidence for and against has been properly admitted, is necessarily a pure question of fact.

In the question to be decided is one of fact it does not involve an issue of law merely because documents which are not instruments of title or otherwise the direct foundation of rights but are merely historical documents have to be construed.[508] A second appeal did not lie on the ground that some of the evidence was contained in a document or documents and the first appellate court had made a mistake as to its meaning.[509] Misconstruction of documents which merely formed part of the evidence has been held not to be a ground of appeal.[510] Mere inferences from or the evidentiary value of a document generally raise only a question of fact.[511] However, it was held that a second appeal would lie if the documents erroneously construed themselves constituted the foundation of rights claimed.[512] The question whether a statutory presumption was rebutted has been held to be always a question of fact.[513] Accordingly, no appeal could lie from a finding that an oral sale in Punjab was not proved and that entries in the Record of Rights were erroneous.[514] Again, if there was evidence to support the finding of the appellate court that the appellants were not tenure-holders and that an entry to that effect in the Record of Rights was erroneous no second appeal lay.[515] A finding as to the valuation of property has been held to be one of fact.[516] A finding on appeal that an estate had not been privately partitioned previously to its partition under the Estates Partition Act, 1897, was held to be a finding of fact binding on the high court in a second appeal.[517] So also a finding on the question whether there had been division or severance of interest in a joint family,[518] It might, however, be a mixed question of fact and law and therefore open to reconsideration in a second appeal.[519] Questions such as partition among co-owners,[520] or waiver of notice to quit[521] or waiver of the benefit of an instalment of decree by the decree-holder[522] have been held to be questions of fact. Whether the status of the plaintiffs was that of members of a particular tarwad has been held to be a question of fact.[523] So too, the question whether an instrument was obtained under undue influence and misrepresentation.[524] On the other hand, a second appeal was held to be competent where it was shown that the appellate court had misdirected itself on a question of law in dealing with evidence,[525] or where it had refused to consider material evidence on the erroneous ground that it was immaterial,[526] or where there was no evidence to support the finding or the finding was based on inadmissible evidence,[527] or where the first appellate court had not considered the evidence, or where its finding is wholly conjectural and not based on evidence.[528] It has been held that where the appellate court has based its finding on the failure of a party to discharge the onus of proof which had been wrongly held to be incumbent on him, the finding, though one of fact, was not based on positive evidence.[529] In general the high court cannot in a second appeal take upon itself to reappreciate the evidence or enter into a consideration of sufficiency or adequacy of evidence.[530]

It has sometimes been held on the strength of observations in Rani Hemanta Kumari v Jagadendra Nath[531] that a finding of fact by the lower appellate court which reverses that of the trial court is liable to be set aside in a second appeal if it did not come to close quarters with its reasoning.[532] But as the Supreme Court has pointed out those observations of the Privy Council were made in an appeal against the high court's judgment which had reversed that of the trial court and had no application to a second appeal under this section and under this section a clear finding of fact was not liable to attack on the ground that the judgment of the lower appellate court was not as elaborate as that of the trial judge or because some of the reasons given by the trial judge had not been expressly reversed by the lower appellate court.[533] It must follow that when there are concurrent findings by two lower courts on what is a question of fact, the high court would not interfere in second appeal.[534] A concurrent finding to be binding in second appeal must have been arrived at after legal adjudication. Thus, where a finding has been given by the trial court without deciding the question whether an impugned public register should be accepted or rejected, though confirmed by the first appellate court is not binding as a concurrent finding on the high court in a second appeal.[535]

In Nasib Kaur,[536] interference with the concurrent findings of the courts below by the high court in the second appeal was challenged before the Supreme Court. The high court had framed a substantial question as to whether the courts below had failed to consider the material evidence on record? However, the high court in the impugned judgment did not point out the exact material evidence which had not been considered by the courts below and made its own assessment of the entire evidence. The Supreme Court held that the high court in exercise of its powers under section 100 could not have reversed the concurrent findings of the courts below so as to adversely affect such legal possession of the appellants.

The Supreme Court will not, except in unusual circumstances, interfere with concurrent findings of fact by the Courts below.[537] This is in consonance with the practice followed both by the Privy Council[538] and the Federal Court.[539]

There have been a number of decisions on the question as to what are questions of fact. Thus, a question of benami.[540] or bona fides.[541] or negligence,[542] or a document being fictitious or not,[543] or certain proceedings being collusive,[544] or whether the suit properties were not family properties,[545] or whether there was reasonable or probable cause for prosecution in a case for damages for malicious prosecution,[546] or the question of status of the defendant as a tenant or not[547] is a question of fact. An order which is in the discretion of thc Court also was not disturbed in a second appeal, for instance, where the court had refused on consideration of all the circumstances to grant relief to a tenant against forfeiture.[548] See also cases noted below.[549]

An issue with regard to a fact cannot be raised before the second appellate court for the first time. The Supreme Court has held that a question whether the suit property belonged to an individual, i.e. whether he/she is a beneficial owner or is a benami, is a question of fact. As there was no averment made in the plaint with regard to that and consequently no issue was raised before the trial court, the said issue could not have been raised for the first time before the second appellate court.[550]

Vendor was an illiterate lady. Sale deed was alleged to be the outcome of fraud and undue influence. Material document, i.e. acknowledgement in token of having received consideration, was not produced by vendor. Burden to prove execution of sale deed and passing of consideration was not discharged by vendee. Plea by vendee, that sale was necessitated to discharge debts was found not convincing. Findings of facts that fraud and undue influence was perpetrated on vendor and that no consideration was paid to her, were not liable to interference by high court in second appeal. Appeal was dismissed.[551] Question whether a particular person is a transferee with notice of agreement of sale is a question part. The fact that the fending of the lower appellate court is based upon a document does not make it any the less a finding of fact.[552] First appellate court found that the plaintiffs (and not defendants) were in possession. Finding was one of fact. It cannot be disturbed, unless it is shown that the finding was based on a misconception of evidence or on an overlooking of material evidence. Certificates of sale are documents of title, which ought not be lightly regarded, or loosely construed.[553] High court cannot interfere with a finding about bona fide need of the landlord.[554] Second appeal in suit under O XXI, rule 63 was filed against orders passed in execution proceedings. It was held that a question not constituting the subject-matter of dispute cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal.

The further question as to whether the appellants are only liable to pay the decretal amount, was not the subject-matter of the dispute in the present suit. That is a question which the appellants if at all should have raised before the executing court.[555] Finding whether respondents were tenants or sub-tenants is a question of fact.[556] Courts below reached finding of "cruelty" fully aware of established principles pertaining to nature of proof necessary to establish a charge of cruelty so as to justify decree of divorce. It was held that — concurrent finding cannot be set aside on mere reappraisal of evidence.[557] A pure question of law arising on the admitted facts can be raised in second appeal. But a reasonable assessment of evidence cannot be set aside.[558] High court cannot entertain second appeal on the ground of an erroneous finding of fact, however gross or inexcusable the error may seem to be. That the finding of the first appellate court is based upon some documentary evidence, does not make it any the less a finding of fact.[559]

The high court acts erroneously if it disturbs concurrent findings of fact:—

(a) overlooking clear admissions of the plaintiff and

(b) erroneously interpreting the rent note.[560]

Where both the lower courts have held the will to be proved the court of second appeal cannot enter into the evidence.[561] The question of whether, in respect of a lease of trust property, notice of termination had been given by the Mukhtar (attorney) of his own or whether the Mukhtar had given the notice in pursuance of the resolution of trustees, is a question of fact, which cannot be allowed to be raised in second appeal.[562] Question whether an agreement of sale was in fact executed and whether it was genuine are questions of fact. Findings on these cannot be interfered with in second appeal.[563] A concurrent finding of the lower courts, to the effect that the tenant was in possession since 1962, cannot be disturbed in second appeal merely because a different view of the evidence is possible.[564] Concurrent finding of fact (based on appreciation of evidence) that the licensee's shop did not remain closed on account of the authority's failure to supply liquor as per demand of licensee, cannot be interfered with, where no infirmity is pointed out.[565] A finding that the income earned from the business by a person (natural guardian) was necessary to maintain his minor son and that the guardian invested the sale proceeds of the property of the minor in the business, is a finding of a fact, which cannot be questioned in second appeal.[566] A finding that the demands for pre-emption (required to be made under Muslim law) were not made, based on an appraisal of the evidence on record, cannot be questioned in second appeal.[567] Finding as to relationship of husband and wife between two persons is one on a question of fact. Court in second appeal cannot interfere with the finding in the lower courts.[568]

The high court in second appeal cannot interfere with a finding of the trial court that the sale deed was executed by the plaintiff when he was in an unsound state of mind where the finding is supported by reasons and evidence.[569] In an appeal against a decree in a suit by the plaintiff for a declaration that the suit property was joint family property and claiming a share therein, the first appellate court gave a finding of fact that the suit property was self acquired property of the father of the plaintiff, as he was a well known goldsmith and the suit property was purchased from his income from the business after the death of his father, i.e. the plaintiff's grandfather, who did not carry on any business. This finding was reasonable and legal and based on evidence. It was held that the high court would not be justified in interfering with it and holding that the goldsmithery was ancestral business of the plaintiff's father, from the income of which the suit property was purchased. It was not even the case as pleaded by the plaintiff in the plaint that goldsmithery was their ancestral business. Nor was evidence produced to that effect.[570] A finding that the accommodation already in the landlord's possession is sufficient for his needs is one of fact.[571]

A deed was executed by an illiterate old man who sued to set it aside on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud and misrepresentation. The courts below negatived the Plea, after considering the evidence. It was held that the finding, being just and proper, did not warrant interference in second appeal.[572] New point requiring determination of material facts cannot be raised for the first time in the second appeal.[573] Concurrent finding by lower courts that plaintiff's had established their right of pre-emption claimed on the basis of Shafi-a-Khalit cannot be challenged in second appeal in the high court.[574] The appellate court would be wrong in thinking that it would detract from the value to be attached to a trial judge's finding of fact if the judge does not expressly base his conclusion upon the impressions he gathers from the demeanour of witnesses. The duty of the appellate court in such cases is to see whether the evidence, taken as a whole, can reasonably justify the conclusion which the trial court arrived at, or whether there is an element of improbability arising from the proved circumstances which, in the opinion of the court, outweighs such finding.[575]

Concurrent finding that the disputed will was genuine, cannot be disturbed in second appeal.[576] To determine whether the relationship between the parties is one of licensee or lessee, neither documentary evidence nor even the recitals in the document in question will be so relevant, as the real intention of the parties in entering into that relationship. When lower appellate court re-appreciates the evidence and differing from the trial court comes to the conclusion that the relationship is that of lessee, so long as nothing not before the court has been taken into account, such conclusion does not suffer from any error of law and does not call for interference.[577] The question whether a person is "Khatedar" within the meaning of section 42, proviso, Rajasthan Tenancy Act, 1955 (which prohibited transfer of interest as Khatedar by a member of Scheduled Caste etc. to one who is not such a member), cannot be gone into in second appeal, as it is a question of fact[578]. A plea that the Rent Control Act was not made applicable to the city in question and that such non-applicability was discriminatory, cannot be invoked for the first time in second appeal. Such a plea might involve controversial facts.[579]

[s 100.6] Amended Section and Pending Matters

The principle as to the applicability of a subsequent statutory provision doing away with or abridging the right of appeal arising from a matter pending at the date of enactment of such subsequent provision is well established. As early as in 1905, the Privy Council declared the principle in the following terms:

> As regards the general principles applicable to the case there was no controversy. On the one hand, it was not disputed that if the matter in question be a matter of procedure only, the petition is well founded. On the other hand, if it is more than a matter of procedure, if it touches a right in existence at the passing of the Act, it was conceded that, in accordance with a long line of authorities extending from the time of Lord Coke to the present day, the appellants would be entitled to succeed. The Judiciary Act is not retrospective by express provision, or by necessary implication. And therefore the only question is, was the appeal to His Majesty in Council a right vested in the appellants at the date of the passing of the Act, or was it a mere matter of procedure? It seems to their Lordships that the question does not admit of doubt. To deprive a suitor in a pending action of an appeal to a superior tribunal which belonged to him as of right is a very different thing from regulating procedure. In principle, their Lordships see no difference between abolishing an appeal altogether and transferring the appeal to a new tribunal. In either case there is an interference with existing rights contrary to the well-known general principle that statutes are not to be held to act retrospectively unless a clear intention to that effect is manifested.[580]

This principle has been approvingly cited not only by the Supreme Court,[581] but has been followed in several high courts' decision.[582] In Daivanayaga Reddiyar's case the Madras High Court held that the right to appeal to a particular superior court (there the district court) was governed by the law prevailing at the date of the institution of the suit and not by the law prevailing at the date of the decision or at the date of the filing of the appeal. To the same effect is the Lahore decision in Kirpa Singh v Ajaipal Singh.[583] In Kasibai v Mahadu,[584] the suit was filed in 1944 in respect of property situated in the then Nizam territory. It was held that such a suit would be governed by the relevant provisions of the Hyderabad Civil Procedure Code then in force and that the restrictions set out in section 100 would not apply to a second appeal arising from such a suit. They would apply to second appeals arising from suits filed after 1 April 1951 when the CPC was applied. Hence the high court's jurisdiction in respect of suits filed before that date would be governed by section 602 of the Hyderabad Code which permitted interference with findings of fact in second appeals. The principle is thus well-established that the right to appeal is not a matter of procedure only and that that right to enter a Superior Court is deemed to arise to a litigant before any decision has been given by the inferior court. In other words, that right accrues to him at the date of the institution of the suit by him. The right of a second appeal being thus a substantive right, the new section 100 would not have restricted that right in appeals arising from suits already filed before the date when the Amendment Act, 1976 was brought into force and to such appeals the section, as it stood before it was replaced by the new section 100 would have applied. But to avoid such a result section 97 of the Amendment Act, 1976 which is a repeal and saving section, provides by its clause (m) that the provisions of the new section 100 shall not apply or affect any appeal from an appellate decree or order which had been admitted before the date of its enforcement after hearing under O XLI, rule 11 and that every such admitted appeal shall be dealt with as if the new section 100 had not come into force. It is clear from the language of clause (m) that the legislature intended to save from the applicability of the new section 100, only those second appeals, which had already been filed and admitted under O XLI, rule 11 before it was brought into operation. Consequently, the restrictive provisions of the new section 100 would apply to all appeals even though they arise from suits or first appeals filed before the date of enforcement of the new section except as aforesaid those second appeals already admitted by the high courts before that date. To such appeals, as were already admitted, must apply the section before its replacement by the new section. It has been considered necessary to retain the commentary under the old section, at least for the purposes of such saved appeals.

[s 100.7] Clause (a) of the Unamended Section; Decision Being Contrary to Law

In cases to which the old section before its replacement still applies as aforesaid, cl. (a) of that section would be relevant. That clause provided that a second appeal would lie where the decision of the lower appellate court is contrary to law. The term "law" in that clause is not limited to statute law; it means general law.[585] question is one of law, and a second appeal will lie. Thus, where in a suit for a declaration of the plaintiff's proprietary title to the land in suit, the lower appellate court found on a construction of the wajib-ul-arz and other documentary evidence relating to the land that the plaintiffs were proprietors, their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the right construction of the documents was a question of law which the high court was not precluded from considering in second appeal. In the course of the judgment their Lordships said:

> That finding (namely, that the plaintiffs were proprietors of the lands) of the Subordinate Judge was the result of his having misconstrued the wajib-ul-arz. The right construction of documents is a question of law which Judges in second appeal are not by sections 584 and 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure (now sections 100 and 101) precluded from considering by any finding of a lower Appellate Court based upon such documents. The Subordinate Judge arrived at his finding by inferences drawn upon an incorrect construction of the wajib-ul-arz and the Judges in second appeal consequently were not bound by his finding that the plaintiffs were the proprietors of the lands.[589]

Similarly, the question whether a writing which is ostensibly a deed of absolute sale and an agreement by the purchaser to reconvey the property to the vendor constitute an out and out sale and an agreement for reconveyance or a mortgage by conditional sale, is a question of construction of documents and the high court is entitled to interfere in second appeal.[590] In a Privy Council case where the question was whether the possession of properties by a Hindu widow was merely in lieu of maintenance and not adverse to the plaintiffs, their Lordships held that the question was one of inference from documents and not one of fact and that they were, therefore, entitled to draw their conclusion notwithstanding the con current opinions of the courts in India.[591] But where the question is not one of construction of a document or of legal inference to be drawn from a document, but is one as to the effect to be given to a document as evidence of a fact or facts in issue, a second appeal is not admissible. Thus, when the question was whether certain pension moneys were included in a watan or hereditary endowment and two courts after an examination of the sanad and other relevant documents had found that they were not, the Privy Council held that the high court in second appeal was not entitled to reverse the finding unless the documents had been misconstrued.[592] Also, where a suit involves a question of the fact of adoption, and documents are produced as evidence of the fact of adoption, the question whether the documents do or do not support the alleged adoption is a question of fact, and no second appeal will lie.[593] The law on the subject was thus stated by Mookerjee, J in Makund Deb v Gopi Nath[594]:

> We hold accordingly that, unless there is a question of the legal effect of a deed which may be treated as a document of title or embodies a contract or is the foundation of the suit, a second appeal does not lie. A second appeal is not admissible, merely because some portion of the evidence is in writing of which the meaning has been mistaken by the lower Appellate Court.

Where the lower appellate court arrives at a conclusion which is an inference based upon an erroneous view of the law, the judgment is open to question in second appeal.[595] A judgment is also open to question in second appeal where a defect in the judgment is due to an error as to the admissibility of evidence,[596] or where the judgment is based on a document which does not form part of the judicial record of the case,[597] or which had been improperly admitted as additional evidence by the first appellate court,[598] or where secondary evidence is admitted in contravention of the provisions of sections 65 and 66 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872[599] or where there is failure to invoke a presumption of fact under section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.[600] It is a ground for interference in second appeal if the lower appellate court relies on inadmissible evidence.[601] When a certified copy was admitted in evidence without objection, it was held that a contention that it was not properly proved could not be raised in second appeal.[602] The question of burden of proof is a question of law, and the high court is entitled to interfere in second appeal if the lower appellate court has placed the burden on the wrong party.[603] But where evidence is led by both the parties and is considered, no second appeal can lie on the ground that the onus was misplaced.[604] The question, however, whether a party has discharged the onus rightly placed on him is one of fact.[605] A second appeal will also lie where an unregistered document which requires registration is admitted in evidence.[606] Where the first appellate court has not applied its mind to the evidence in the case in a judicial manner and has omitted to take into consideration some important evidence, the high court can interfere in second appeal.[607] Though the high court cannot interfere with concurrent findings of fact in second appeal, where the lower appellate court has failed to record a finding, it can itself do so on a consideration of the evidence.[608]

Where the court of first instance grants a mandatory injunction for the demolition of a building, and the decree is reversed in appeal on an erroneous view of the law, a second appeal will lie.[609] Though a person may not have been duly appointed executor, he may render himself liable as an executor if he intermeddles with the estate of the deceased; misapplication of law on this point is a good ground for a second appeal.[610] The question whether a stipulation in a contract is by way of penalty is a question of law which renders a second appeal competent.[611] So also the question whether an agreement is in restraint of trade or not.[612] The question whether enquiries made for purposes of section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act were reasonable is one of law.[613]

Where an appeal which ought to have been preferred to the high court is preferred to a district court and the latter court hears and decides the appeal, the decision is contrary to law, and a second appeal will lie from the decree of the district court.[614] The High Court of Madras and Patna have held that where a court assumes jurisdiction which it would not have had if the facts necessary to determine the question of jurisdiction had been rightly decided, a second appeal lies from the findings of facts.[615] If an appeal is wrongly entertained, it is open to the party aggrieved to prefer a second appeal and take the objection that the appeal to the lower appellate court was incompetent.[616]

[s 100.8] Question of Proper Inference in Law From Findings of Fact; Mixed Question of Law and Fact

Even though under the unamended section a second appeal did not lie from a finding of fact, it was held that a second appeal lay under clause (a) of that section where a legal conclusion was drawn from a finding of fact if such conclusion was found erroneous.[617] The reason given was that whereas in determining a question of fact no application of any principle of law was involved in finding either the basic facts or in arriving at the ultimate conclusion, in the case of a mixed question of fact and law the ultimate conclusion has to be drawn by applying principles of law to the basic findings.[618] Accordingly, where the lower appellate court found that the plaintiff and his predecessors were not Hindu Sanyasis and therefore were incompetent to assume the office of the mahant for the reason that they had not performed the requisite ceremonies and had not uttered the required mantra, the factual part of the finding, that is, the non-performance of the ceremony and the omission to utter the mantra was a finding of fact, but the ultimate conclusion therefrom was a question of law.[619] Thus, the question whether possession is adverse or not is often one of simple fact, but it may also be a conclusion of law or a mixed question of law and fact. Where the question of adverse possession is one of simple fact, no second appeal will lie; but a second appeal will lie from a finding as to adverse possession when such finding is a mixed question of law and fact depending upon the proper legal conclusion to be drawn from the findings as to simple facts.[620] Where the question in a suit was whether the defendant was bound by a mortgage executed by his mother, and it was held that he was, their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the findings was substantially one of law, and that it was, therefore, open to question in second appeal. In the course of their judgment their Lordships said: "The facts found (by the lower appellate court) need not be questioned. It is the soundness of the conclusions from them that is in question, and this is a matter of law."[621] As stated by their Lordships of the Privy Council in another case, "the proper legal effect of a proved fact is essentially a question of law", and the high court is, therefore, entitled to interfere in second appeal.[622]

Where the trial court granted injunction restraining respondent/defendants from dispossessing appellant-plaintiff from suit land but refused to grant decree of plaintiff's ownership of suit land based on adverse possession and the decree pertaining to preventive injunction was not challenged by defendants and thus same became final, in second appeal the high court, while denying relief of ownership by adverse possession, denied injunction earlier granted, and observed that owner of suit land being Gram Panchayat and appellant being in possession thereof without any right, it had no right to seek injunction against Gram Panchayat, it was held by the Supreme Court that this finding of the high court was perverse, unnecessary and beyond the scope of second appeal when respondents, by not challenging the decree pertaining to injunction, had accepted adverse possession of the suit land.[623]

It is not the practice of the Supreme Court to permit a mixed question of law and fact to be raised for the first time before it.[624]

[See also notes under sections 100, 46 mixed question of law and fact]

[s 100.9] Clause (c): Substantial Error or Defect in Procedure

A second appeal will lie where there is, as an English lawyer would express it, no evidence to go to the jury, because that does not raise a question of fact such as arises upon the issue itself, but a question of law for the consideration of the Judge.[625] It is settled law that if the findings of fact given by the first appellate court are based on appreciation of all the relevant evidence, the high court would not upset them. It is only when such findings are based on no evidence at all or where the evidence is disbelieved for no reason at all or if there is any substantial error or defect in procedure that its interference with such findings is called for in second appeal.[626] Thus, where the lower appellate court found that a deed of compromise was not for the benefit of a certain infant, and there was no evidence in the case upon which that Court could found its judgment, it was held by the Judicial Committee that the case was one of a substantial error or defect in the procedure of the first appellate court and that it was a ground for a second appeal to the high court.[627] Normally, court in second appeal will not disturb a concurrent finding of fact. However, where the lower court ignores material evidence with respect to the fact in issue, its finding can be interfered with even in second appeal. Presumption of truth is attached to the entries in the revenue records and to rebut such presumption, convincing and reliable evidence is required. Where in a suit seeking permanent injunction, the lower courts concurrently found that defendant was in possession of land as tenant, whereas entries in the relevant revenue records showed plaintiff as owner in possession of the land. In the absence of evidence to rebut the presumption of truth of entries in the revenue records, concurrent finding of lower courts that defendant was in possession of land, ignoring the entries in revenue records could not be sustained.[628] A finding of the first appellate court can set aside if it is not based on any evidence as it is an illegality.[629]

Pleas as to validity of notice and non-maintainability of suit under Panchayat Act can be allowed in second appeal, as they involve consideration of law points and interpretation of provisions of the Act.[630] Ordinarily a finding as to possession-must be regarded as a finding of fact, but even a finding of fact can be upset in second appeal on the score that there was no evidence to support it or that it was based on a misconception.[631] A finding of fact is not bending in second appeal if it does not consider the evidence on record and if it fails to appreciate the principles regarding the customary right of irrigation asserted by the plaintiff.[632] Lower appellate court reversed the finding of the trial court, believing the plaintiff's evidence and disbelieving the defendant's evidence. The judgment of the lower appellate court showed that its finding suffered from a substantial error of procedure in appraising the evidence. This error had materially affected the decision of the case on the merits. Such an error gives the high court jurisdiction to interfere on second appeal, under section 100(1)(c).[633] A finding of fact made by the first appellate court, which is the final court of facts can be interfered with in second appeal, only when the finding is without evidence or based on inadmissible evidence or is perverse, i.e. the finding is such that no reasonable and prudent man can come to it from the materials on record.[634]

A finding recorded with no reasoning, or a finding based on illogical or perverse reasoning is not binding on the high court under section 100. The burden of proving non-receipt of consideration was on the defendants, The contrary approach of the lower appellate court was erroneous and was not legally sound. It is not enough that the lower appellate court concurs with the finding, but the process of reasoning must also be sound.[635] The district judge, in appeal, decreed A's suit for possession of whole disputed property against B and C, on the ground that they were not sons of A's deceased father. He did not consider important oral and documentary evidence, which was material to prove the relationship of B with A's father. It was held that the judgment could be interfered with in second appeal, as the district judge had ignored a very vital and important document in the case.[636] Where the first appellate court fails to consider the most material evidence in the case, and especially when it reverses the judgment of the trial court, the finding recorded by the first appellate court, is not binding on the high court, though it is true that every non-consideration of the reason given by the trial court in a judgment of reversal will not attract this principle.[637] Even if the appreciation of evidence made is patently erroneous and the finding of fact recorded in consequence is grossly erroneous, that cannot be said to introduce a substantial error of defect in the procedure. However, when the first appellate court discarded the evidence as inadmissible and the high court is satisfied that the evidence was admissible, that may introduce an error or defect in procedure. So also in a case where the court below ignored the weight of evidence and allowed the judgment to be influenced by inconsequential matters, the high court would be justified in re-appreciating the evidence and coming to its independent decision.[638]

Findings of fact can be interfered with by the high court under certain circumstances, when the court is satisfied that on account of wrong approach to a matter, injustice has been done to one of the parties before it.[639] Lower court recorded finding of fact by wrongly misreading the evidence. It was held that it had committed an error of law, warranting interference. Appeal was allowed.[640] The error or defect in the procedure to which section 100 (l)(c) refers, is not an error or defect in the appreciation of evidence adduced by the parties on the merits. Even if the appreciation of evidence is patently erroneous and the finding of fact is in consequence grossly erroneous, that cannot be said to introduce a substantial error or defect in the procedure. However, when the first appellate court discarded the evidence as inadmissible and the high court was satisfied that the evidence was admissible that may introduce an error or defect in procedure. So also, where the court below ignored the weight of evidence and allowed the judgment to be influenced by inconsequential matters, the high court would be justified in reappreciating the evidence and coming to its own independent decision.[641]

In a case where the lower appellate court had come to a finding of fraud, although, in point of law there was no evidence to support the finding, the Privy Council held that the Judicial Commissioner was within his powers in second appeal in deciding the case on the evidence in the record.[642] The high court in second appeal is not bound by a finding as to whether the defendants were permanent tenants liable to pay a reasonable rent when the finding was based neither on evidence nor admission.[643] Again, when the lower appellate court inferred from the fact that a mortgagee had delayed filing a suit until the last day allowed by the law of limitation that he had been receiving interest all the time and that the mortgage was satisfied, the high court held that the inference was not drawn from any evidence so that there was an error of law.[644] Where the lower appellate court had reversed a finding of fact arrived at by the court of first instance without considering the material facts on which the first court's finding was based the high court would interfere in second appeal on the ground that the judgment is not a proper judgment of reversal.[645] The Supreme Court has observed that if a finding of fact is arrived at ignoring important and relevant evidence, the finding is bad in law.[646] Similarly, where the lower appellate court disposes of a suit upon a case not raised by the parties land to which the evidence has not been directed, it is a substantial error or defect in procedure within the meaning of this section and a second appeal lies to the high court.[647] But where the court gives a finding on a question on which both parties go to trial, it is not liable to be disturbed on the ground that it was not raised in the pleadings.[648] The Bombay High Court has held that a finding based on a misconception of what the evidence is cannot be accepted in second appeal,[649] and this was followed by the Allahabad High Court in a case where the lower appellate court, in a perfunctory judgment which did not state correctly what the evidence was, found that a village officer's report was tainted with malice.[650] The Lahore High Court had held that where the court has not considered all the available evidence, a second appeal lies.[651] A second appeal will lie if the evidence has been misread or misunderstood,[652] or the lower appellate court has misdirected itself in point of law in dealing with the question upon the evidence,[653] or has overlooked or ignored material documentary evidence.[654] The same view has been taken also by the Supreme Court.[655] But the mere fact that the lower appellate court has made specific reference in its judgment to only some of the witnesses does not by itself mean that it was unmindful of the rest of the evidence.[656] Error in appreciation of evidence is not a substantial error in procedure within section 100(1)(c) of the Code.[657] When the finding of fact is based partly on conjectures, and partly on a misunderstanding of the evidence, a second appeal lies.[658] On the same principle a second appeal will lie where the finding of the lower appellate court, e.g., a finding on the existence of a usage, is based on irrelevant matters.[659] A second appeal also lies where the lower appellate court decides a question of fact not upon the evidence before it, but on the authority of a previous finding of a court of superior jurisdiction upon similar facts in a case between different parties.[660]

[s 100.9.1] Where the Courts Below Have Misconceived the Real Question They had, to Try

The high court has jurisdiction under this section to set aside the decree of the trial judge in favour of the plaintiff, affirmed on the facts by the first appellate Judge, on the ground that the evidence taken showed that the true question of fact which had not been considered and as to which no issue had been framed should have been answered in favour of the defendant.[661] A conclusion based on an erroneous understanding of the case that the plaintiff committed breach of contract[662] or on a misinterpretation of pleadings[663] can likewise be challenged in a second appeal The Supreme Court has held that the high court could interfere with a finding of fact in second appeal when the courts below had misunderstood the point for determination.[664]

[s 100.9.2] Other Cases of Error or Defect in Procedure

Interference with a finding of fact would be warranted where there is a substantial error or defect in the procedure provided by this Code or by any other law for the time being in force which has produced an error in the decision on merits. If the lower appellate court allows a new point of fact to be raised for the first time or permits a party to take up a new plea or make out a new case that may amount to an error in procedure.[665] Omitting to decide a material issue,[666] omitting to examine witness tendered,[667] refusing to receive documentary evidence which ought to have been accepted,[668] allowing the plaintiff in the lower appellate court to change the nature of his suit,[669] permitting the defendant in the first appeal to raise a new plea not taken in the written statement,[670] deciding an appeal without waiting for the return of a commission directed to be issued by the first appellate court,[671] rejecting an extract from the death register admissible under section 35 of the Evidence Act, 1872 and then holding that the date of death is not proved,[672] have all been held to be good grounds for special appeal. But disregard of an Amin's second report as to a boundary line does not constitute a substantial error or defect in procedure within the meaning of this section, and is no ground for second appeal.[673] The refusal by a lower appellate court to exercise the discretion vested in it by O XLI, rule 27, with respect to the admission of additional evidence, is a substantial error or defect in procedure, and affords a ground of special appeal. But where the Court has exercised its discretion in a sound and reasonable way, and in the exercise of its discretion refused to admit additional evidence, the case is not one of substantial error or defect in procedure.[674] The same is the position where the court after exercising its discretion properly accepts or rejects the commissioner's report[675] or admits an application for amending the plaint.[676] Admission by the lower appellate court of additional evidence tendered by the respondent without the consent of the appellant and without recording the reasons for its admission as required by O XLI, rule 27, is a substantial error in procedure, and is a good ground for second appeal.[677] Proceeding with a suit without the legal representatives of the deceased plaintiff being brought on the record is also a good ground for second appeal.[678] In a suit for restraining the defendant from using and occupying an open space in front of his house, the burden to prove title to that space is on the plaintiff. If that is ignored, the high court would be justified in interfering with the finding even though such finding would be one of fact.[679]

The scope of this clause was considered in Ramachandra v Ramalingam.[680] After observing that it had reference not to error or defect in the appreciation of evidence but to error or defect relating to procedure, the Court went on:

> if in dealing with a question of fact, the lower Appellate Court has placed the onus on a wrong party and its finding of fact is the result, substantially of this wrong approach, that may be regarded as a defect in procedure; if in dealing with questions of fact, the lower Appellate Court discards evidence on the ground that it is inadmissible and the High Court is satisfied that the evidence was admissible, that may introduce an error or defect in procedure. If the lower Appellate Court fails to consider an issue which had been tried and found upon by the trial Court and proceeds to reverse the trial Court's decision without the consideration of such an issue, that may be regarded as an error or defect in procedure; if the lower Appellate Court allows a new point of fact to be raised for the first time before it, or permits a party to adopt a new plea of fact, or makes out a new case for a party, that may, in some cases, be said to amount to a defect or error in procedure. But the High Court cannot interfere with the conclusions of fact recorded by the lower Appellate Court, however erroneous the said conclusions may appear to be to the High Court, because, as the Privy Council has observed, however gross or inexcusable the error may seem to be, there is no jurisdiction under section 100 to correct that error.

[s 100.10] Main Effect of Amendment

The effect of the amendment, mainly, according to the amended section, was: (i) The high court would be justified in admitting the second appeal only when a substantial question of law is involved; (ii) The substantial question of law is to be precisely stated; (iii) A duty has been cast on the high court to formulate substantial question of law before hearing the appeal; (iv) another part of the section is that the appeal shall be heard only on that question.[681]

[s 100.11] Rationale Behind This Section

The rationale behind allowing a second appeal on a question of law is, that there ought to be some tribunal having a jurisdiction that will enable it to maintain, and, where necessary, re-establish, uniformity throughout the state on important legal issues, so that within the area of the state, the law, in so far as it is not enacted law, should be laid down, or capable of being laid down, by one court whose rulings will be binding on all courts, tribunals and authorities within the area over which it has jurisdiction. This is implicit in any legal system where the higher courts have authority to make binding decisions on question of law.[682]

[s 100.12] Finality of Decision

In the 54th Report of the Law Commission of India, it is incorporated that it may be permissible to point out that a search for absolute truth in the administration of justice, however, laudable, must in the very nature of things be put under some reasonable restraint. In other words, a search for truth has to be reconciled with the doctrine of finality. In judicial hierarchy, finality is absolutely important, because that gives certainty to the law. Even in the interest of litigants themselves, it may not be unreasonable to draw a line in respect of the two different categories of litigation where procedure will say at a certain stage that questions of fact have been decided by the lower courts and the matter should be allowed to rest where it lies without any further appeal. This may be somewhat harsh to an individual litigant; but in the larger interest of the administration of justice, this view seems to be juristically sound and pragmatically wise. It is in the light of this basic approach that we will now proceed to consider some of the cases which were decided more than a century ago.[683]

The analysis of cases decided by the Privy Council and the Supreme Court prior to 1976 clearly indicated the scope of interference under section 100, CPC, by the Supreme Court. Even prior to amendment, the consistent position has been that the courts should not interfere with the concurrent findings of facts.

Now, after 1976 Amendment, the scope of section 100 has been drastically curtailed and narrowed down. The high courts would have jurisdiction of interfering under section 100, CPC, only in a case where substantial questions of law are involved and those questions have been clearly formulated in the memorandum of appeal. At the time of admission of the second appeal, it is the bounden duty and obligation of the high court to formulate substantial questions of law and only then is the high court permitted to proceed with the case to decide those questions of law. The language used in the amended section specifically incorporates the words as "substantial question of law" which is indicative of the legislative intention. It must be clearly understood that the legislative intention was very clear that legislature never wanted second appeal to become "third trial on facts" or "one more dice in the gamble". The effect of the amendment mainly, according to the amended section, was:

(i) The high court would be justified in admitting the second appeal only when a substantial question of law is involved.

(ii) The substantial question of law is to be precisely stated;

(iii) A duty has been cast on the high court to formulate substantial question of law before hearing the appeal;

(iv) Another part of the section is that the appeal shall be heard only on that question.

In a series of cases, the Supreme Court was compelled to interfere was because the true legislative intendment and scope of section 100 CPC have neither been appreciated nor applied. A class of judges, while administering law, honestly believe that if they are satisfied that, in any second appeal brought before them evidence has been grossly mis-appreciated either by the lower appellate court or by both the courts below, it is their duty to interfere, because they seem to feel that a decree following upon a gross mis-appreciation of evidence involves injustice and it is the duty of the high court to redress such injustice. It is reiterated that the justice has to be administered in accordance with law.[684]

[s 100.14] Principles Relating to This Section

The principles relating to section 100, CPC, may be summarised thus:-

683. Gurdey Kaur v Kaki, AIR 2006 SC 1975 : (2007) 1 SCC 546.
684. Gurdey Kaur v Kaki, AIR 2006 SC 1975 : (2007) 1 SCC 546.

(i) An inference of fact from the recitals or contents of a document is a question of fact. But the legal effect of the terms of a document is a question of law. Construction of a document involving the application of any principle of law, is also a question of law. Therefore, when there is misconstruction of a document or wrong application of a principle of law in construing a document, it gives rise to a question of law.

(ii) The high court should be satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law, and not a mere question of law. A question of law having a material bearing on the decision of the case (that is, a question, answer to which affects the rights of parties to the suit) will be a substantial question of law, if it is not covered by any specific provisions of law or settled legal principle emerging from binding precedents, and, involves a debatable legal issue. A substantial question of law will also arise in a contrary situation, where the legal position is clear, either on account of express provisions of law or binding precedents, but the court below has decided the matter, either ignoring or acting contrary to such legal principle. In the second type of cases, the substantial question of law arises not because the law is still debatable, but because the decision rendered on a material question, violates the settled position of law.

(iii) The general rule is that the high court will not interfere with concurrent findings of the courts below. But it is not an absolute rule. Some of the well recognised exceptions are where (i) the courts below have ignored material evidence or acted on no evidence; (ii) the courts have drawn wrong inferences from proved facts by applying the law erroneously; or (iii) the courts have wrongly cast the burden of proof. When we refer to "decision based on no evidence", it not only refers to cases where there is a total dearth of evidence, but also refers to any case, where the evidence, taken as a whole, is not reasonably capable of supporting the finding.[685]

Section 96 of the Code of Civil Procedure makes provision for an appeal being preferred from every original decree or from every decree passed in appeal respectively; none of the provisions enumerates the person who can file an appeal. However, it is settled by a long catena of decisions that to be entitled to file an appeal, the person must be one aggrieved by the decree. Unless a person is prejudicially or adversely affected by the decree he is not entitled to file an appeal.[686]

No appeal lies against a mere finding. It is significant to note that both sections 96 and 100 of the CPC provide for an appeal against decree and not against judgment.[687]

[s 100.16] Pleas Which may be Taken for the First Time in Second

An appellant will not be allowed to set up for the first time in second appeal a plea not taken by him in the lower court[688].But if the objection is one which goes to the very root of the case, it may be taken for the first time in second appeal.[689] Plea of bona fide purchaser, in good faith from ostensible owner (section 41, Transfer of Property, Act) cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal.[690] Thus, an objection to jurisdiction may be taken for the first time in special appeal, if it is patent on the face of the record,[691] except, it is submitted, in those cases which fall within section 21 above. Similarly, the plea of res judicata may be taken for the first time in second appeal provided it can be decided upon the record before the court.[692] A change in the law which has come into force after the decision of the lower appellate court and which has been given retrospective effect also will be allowed to be raised for the first time in the second appeal.[693] So also the plea of want of notice in an ejectment suit[694], or vice versa termination of tenancy by valid notice where the fact of notice is not denied nor any issue is demanded by the defendant,[695] or a plea of lis pendens,[696] for a judicial pronouncement available only at the time of the hearing of the second appeal.[697] As to the plea of limitation, see notes to O XLI, rule 2. "Leave of Court: Limitation," which refer to first appeals, apply also to second appeals.[698]

The high court will entertain in second appeal a point of law although it has not been raised in any of the lower courts, provided the point of law arises on the findings of the lower court or on the issues as framed and on the evidence already recorded. Thus, where the lower appellate court awarded to the plaintiff a third share of the property in suit on the ground that remoter gotraja sapindas inherited per stirpes and the defendant preferred a second appeal to the high court on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to any share at all, the defendant was allowed to contend at the hearing of the second appeal that the plaintiff was not entitled in any event to more than a sixth share as remoter gotraja sapindas inherited per capita and not per stripes.[699] The Supreme Court has also laid down that a pure question of law can be raised for the first time in appeal.[700] See also the cases noted below.[701] But while the court will be acting within its powers in permitting a question of law to be raised for the first time in appeal, it is not bound to do so, and, may in its discretion, decline to do so, if that would operate unfairly on the other side.[702] But the high court will not entertain a point of law raised for the first time in second appeal, if the point cannot be decided without remanding the case for further evidence,[703] nor will it take into account any subsequent development and allow additional evidence in regard to it to be taken.[704] When the question is one of mixed law and fact, the high court will not entertain it for the first time in second appeal.[705] A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court has held that a point of law not taken in the lower appellate court cannot be raised in second appeal unless it is a point involving res judicata, jurisdiction, or a point the decision of which is necessary to prevent further litigation, and then only if the question does not necessitate the taking of further evidence.[706] A plea that a suit is barred by section 47 will not be entertained if raised for the first time in second appeal.[707] Similarly the Kerala High Court rejected the plea for awarding the value of improvements under Kerala Act XXIX of 1958 where such a plea was not taken in the lower appellate court though the Act had come into operation while the appeal before that court was pending.[708] The Privy Council quoted with approval in an appeal from Rangoon,[709] the following passage from a judgment of Lord Watson in Connecticut Fire Insurance Co v Kavanagh:[710]

> When a question of law is raised for the first time in a Court of last resort upon the construction of a document or upon facts either admitted or proved beyond controversy, it is not only competent but expedient in the interests of justice to entertain the plea.

The Privy Council in a later case refused to allow a new point to be raised before it without any pleadings and evidence on it.[711] The Supreme Court has likewise declined to hear a new question of fact raised before it.[712] A custom neither pleaded nor sought to be established by evidence cannot be set up for the first time in second appeal;[713] nor a new case of agency, when the plea of partnership had failed;[714] nor a new plea that a suit is not maintainable as the partnership which was the foundation of the claim was unregistered as required by section 69 of the Partnership Act, 1932[715] nor a new plea as to the invalidity of registration of a document.[716] Nor can a point of law be taken for the first time in second appeal if it sets up a new right differing in kind from that asserted throughout the trial, and not merely in decree. the right claimed by one of the defendants was treated as one of maintenance only in the courts below, she was not allowed to contend in second appeal that, besides maintenance, she was entitled to a half share in the property.[717] The failure of the court to formulate the "substantial question of law" (while admitting the appeal) does not mean that the appeal cannot be heard. Such failure is an omission by court. Litigants cannot be penalised for it.[718]

See matter under the same heading in section 96 ante.

[s 100.18] This Section and Section 18 of TRAI Act, 1997

Under section 18, the appeal would lie against any order of appellate tribunal to the Supreme Court only on the ground specified in section 100 of CPC and necessarily, therefore, it must be a substantial question of law.[719]

The power of Supreme Court under section 18 of the Act cannot be equated with the power of judicial review. Supreme Court will be concerned with a substantial question of law arising in the case, its jurisdiction would not be restricted to illegality, irrationality or procedural impropriety in the decision-making process.[720]

[s 100.19] This Section and Section 72 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950

A Full Bench of the Bombay High Court has after referring to section 18 of the TRAI Act, section 260A of the Income Tax Act, section 15-Z of the SEBI Act, 1992 and section 30 of the Employee Compensation Act, 1923, held that in section 72(4) of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950, there is no such specification that the appeal from an appellate order of the district court, presented to the high court, shall be heard only if it involves any substantial question of law. Neither section 72(4) makes reference to section 100 of the CPC, nor specifically puts any restriction or limitation on the powers of the high court in entertaining the appeal. Since the provision itself does not limit the scope of the appeal nor puts any limitations on the court dealing with the appeal, it cannot be construed that appeal to the high court, as provided under section 72(4) is subject to any limitations as prescribed under section 100 of the CPC.[721]

Under section 125 of the Electricity Act, 2003, any person aggrieved by any decision or order of the appellate tribunal may file an appeal to the Supreme Court on any one or more of the grounds specified in section 100 of the CPC. In view of the said provision, the Supreme Court has held that unless the court is satisfied that the findings of fact recorded by the forum/ Tribunal below are perverse, irrational and based on no evidence, it would not interfere.[722]

It is needless to say that O XLI, CPC deals with appeals from the original decrees. O XLII, CPC deals with appeals from the appellate court decrees. O XLII, rule 1, CPC, dealing with the procedure specifies that the rules of O XLI, shall apply, so far as may be, to appeals from appellate decrees. The words "so far as may be" assume importance. In view of the said wording, it cannot be said that all the rules of O XLI, CPC can be made applicable in the case of second appeals and they are applicable only to the extent 'so far as may be'.[723]

[s 100.21] Section 100, Section 102, O XLI, Rule 11 and O XLII, Rule 2 — Harmonious Construction — Admission of Appeal

The court has the power to direct that the appeal be heard on the question formulated by it. At the time of making an order under rule 11 of O XLI for the hearing of a second appeal, the court shall formulate the substantial question of law as required by section 100, and in doing so, the court may direct that the second appeal be heard on the question so formulated and it shall not be open to the appellant to urge any other ground in the appeal without the leave of the court, given in accordance with the provision of section 100.

While giving harmonious construction to section 100, O XLI, rule 11, O XLII, rule 2, CPC, if all these three provisions are read together, then, the appeal in which a substantial question of law is not formulated, cannot be heard finally and every such appeal in which the substantial question of law is not involved will be dismissed under O XLI, rule 11, CPC, and then there is no question of final hearing of the appeal. The essential requirement for further proceeding when the appeal is not dismissed under O XLI, rule 11, is formulation of substantial question of law. Until and unless the court is satisfied that any substantial question of law is involved in the appeal, such appeal cannot be entertained. In the circumstances, if in a second appeal substantial question of law is not formulated then it cannot be heard finally. In the circumstances, the formulation of substantial question of law is sine qua non. To give effect to section 102, newly amended, it can reasonably be held that until and unless substantial question of law is formulated, an appeal cannot be deemed to have passed through the stage of O XLI, rule 11, CPC. In the circumstances, the intention of legislature in section 102 is that when the substantial question of law is formulated as required under section 100, and O XLII, rule 2 of the CPC, appeal shall be deemed to be admitted. If before this, the court has issued notice to the other side, it is in the stage of determining whether in the appeal any substantial question of law is involved or not. Thereafter, the court will either formulate such substantial question of law and the appeal will proceed further, otherwise appeal shall be dismissed. Only after admission of appeal, will the provision of rule 16 of O XLI apply. In the circumstances, the word "admitted" used in section 16(2)(a) of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 2002 will mean that the court, after hearing the appeal on formation of substantial question of law and being satisfied that a substantial question of law is involved, formulates such substantial question of law, only then would the appeal would be deemed to have been admitted. Merely from the fact that the court issued notice to other side in the process of admitting the appeal, it cannot be said that the appeal is admitted. In the circumstances, if an appeal is not admitted before 1 July 2002, the saving clause would not apply and the bar created under section 102 of the CPC would apply.[724]

The assumption that an appeal under O XLIII, rule 1, clause (u) should be heard only on the grounds enumerated in section 100, is incorrect as O XLIII, rule 1, CPC is only an enabling provision for regulating the procedure and prescribing the various orders from which appeal would lie to an higher court. A rule prescribing the procedure can never be understood in law as circumscribing the powers of the higher court hearing the matter in appeal, unless the rule specifically speaks of it. Where an order of remand is questioned as being improper and uncalled for in an appeal provided against such an order, it would be always open to the court hearing the appeal to consider all questions, both of fact and law, to determine whether or not the order of remand is right in law. The learned judge, by taking such view of the matter, has equated an appeal under section 100, CPC whereunder the jurisdiction of the high court to entertain a second appeal after the 1976 amendment is confined only to such appeals which would involve a substantial question of law, with an appeal under section 104, CPC whereunder no such limitation is imposed on the powers of the high court. That is quite improper. In an appeal from an order of remand preferred under O XLIII, rule 1 clause (u), the high court is not confined on the question whether the order satisfies the requirement of the rule. It may also determine the correctness of the lower appellate court's decision on the point on which the trial court disposed of the case. Thus, where the trial court decrees a suit on rejection of the defence of perfection of title by adverse possession and the appellate court reverses the decree and remands the case under this rule, the high court has the power to determine whether the point of adverse possession was correctly decided on merits by the lower appellate court.[725]

In a suit for dissolution of partnership firm and accounts, the trial court appointed a court commissioner in the final decree proceedings. In the second appeal against the order allowing objections against the commissioner's report, the Supreme Court held that though a second appeal against the said order was not maintainable in view of rule 1 of O XLIII of the Code, but if the appeal has been entertained upon hearing both the parties, the court may not exercise its extra-ordinary jurisdiction to set aside that order. It was observed that the scope of an appeal under section 100 was narrowed and the one under. O XLIII, rule 1 is wider. What matters most is to see whether substantial justice has been done to the parties and not the technicalities involved therein.[726]

The aspect that has to be considered is the respective scope of appeal and revision. It is fairly a well settled position in law that the right of appeal is a substantive right. But there is no such substantive right in making an application under section 115.[727]

Section 115 is essentially a source of power for the high court to supervise the subordinate courts. It does not, in any way, confer a right on a litigant aggrieved by any order of the subordinate court to approach the high court for relief. The scope for making a revision under section 115 is not linked with a substantive right.

Language of sections 96 and 100 of the CPC which deal with appeals can be compared with section 115. While the former two provisions specifically provide for right of appeal, the same is not the position vis-a-vis section 115. It does not speak of an application being made by a person aggrieved by an order of subordinate court. As noted above, it is a source of power of the high court to have effective control on the functioning of the subordinate courts by exercising supervisory power.[728]

An appeal is essentially continuation of the original proceedings and the provisions applied at the time of institution of the suit are to be operative even in respect of the appeals. That is because there is a vested right in the litigant to avail the remedy of an appeal. As was observed in K Eapen Chako v The Provident Investment Co Pvt Ltd,[729] only in cases where vested rights are involved, a legislation has to be interpreted to mean as one affecting such right to be prospectively operative. The right of appeal is only by statute. It is necessary part of the procedure in an action, but "the right of entering a superior court and invoking its aid and interposition to redress the error of the courts below. It seems to this paramount right, part of the progress of the inferior tribunal".[730] The appeal, strictly so called, is one in which the question is, whether the order of the court from which the appeal is brought was right on the materials which that court had before it'.[731] The right of appeal, where it exists, as a matter of substance and not of procedure.[732]

[s 100.24] Right of Second Appeal — Duty of High Court

It has been noticed by the Supreme Court time and again that without insisting for the statement of such a substantial question of law in the memorandum of appeal and formulating the same at the time of admission, the high courts have been issuing notices and generally deciding the second appeals without adhering to the procedure prescribed under section 100, CPC. It has further been found in a number of cases that no efforts are made to distinguish between a question of law and a substantial question of law. In exercise of the powers under this section, the findings of fact of the first appellate court are found to have been disturbed. It has to be kept in mind that the right of appeal is neither a natural nor an inherent right attached to the litigation. Being a substantive statutory right, it has to be regulated in accordance with law in force at the relevant time. The conditions mentioned in the section must be strictly fulfilled before a second appeal can be maintained and no court has the power to add to or enlarge those grounds. The second appeal cannot be decided on merely equitable grounds. The concurrent findings of facts, howsoever erroneous, cannot be disturbed by the high court in exercise of the powers under this section. The substantial question of law has to be distinguished from a substantial question of fact.[733]

Where the findings arrived at by the first appellate court affirming the judgment of the trial court was found by the high court as neither cryptic nor based on non-consideration of arguments advanced by parties, it was held by the Supreme Court that the approach of the high court was in compliance of the code and as such the judgment was not liable to be set aside.[734]

Where a plea was never raised in the lower courts nor such matter arose for consideration in the suit or in the appeal and neither any evidence was recorded on this aspect of the matter, nor were the courts called upon to record a finding on that question, in such a legal and factual position, the Supreme Court found no justification for the high court to interfere in appeal and modify the decree of the courts below on a question which did not arise for its consideration.[735]

Where the question formulated by the high court were neither questions of law nor substantial questions of law, it was held by the Supreme Court that the high court went into a dangerous area of appreciation of evidence on the basis of non-existent substantial questions of law. It was further held that in the absence of pleadings, the high court gravely erred in finding out an entirely new case on the basis of un-pleaded facts and non-existent rights. Hence the judgment of the high court was set aside.[736]

In an appeal filed by the Food Corporation of India against the order passed against it for alleged disobedience of interim direction by high court to deposit rent in court, the high court disposed the appeal summarily on the assumption that the appellant was trying to challenge only the order of interim direction in appeal against the alleged disobedience. It was held by the Supreme Court that the high court did not even bother to refer to the facts and merits and did not ensure that its process were not misused and abused by the respondent. As such the order of the high court was set aside.[737]

Where the high court proceeded on totally untenable premises and recorded findings which were contrary to materials on record, the directions issued by the high court was held to be indefensible and liable to be set aside.[738]

[s 100.26] Court Fee — Interest Accrued up to Decree to be Included Going by section 52 of the Court Fees and Suits Valuation Act, 1958, the court fee payable in any appeal shall be the same as the fee that would be payable in the court of first instance on the subject matter of the appeal. Explanation (3) to section 52 says that in claims which include the award of interest subsequent to the institution of the suit, the interest accrued during the pendency of the suit till the date of the decree shall be deemed to be part of the subject-matter of appeal except where such interest is relinquished. The instant second appeal is obviously directed against the decree of the lower appellate court under which, as on the date of that decree, the appellant is obliged to pay interest from date of the trial court decree till date of the appellate court decree also.[739] was dead and against a party who was also dead was obviously a nullity as the second appeal stood abated.[740]

However, failure to bring the legal representatives of a deceased would not be fatal to the suit in all circumstances. Thus, where judgment was delivered in a mortgage suit after the death of one of the mortgages, it was held by the Supreme Court that setting aside the entire judgment for not bringing the entire body of legal heirs and legal representatives of the deceased on record would be too technical view when some of the legal heirs of the deceased were already on record.[741]

It was further held in the above case that the suit for redemption cannot be said to be not maintainable because of non-impleadment of married daughters of the deceased mortgagee, when one of the daughters was already dead and the other was neither in occupation of the suit premises nor resided with the mortgagee at the time of his death. More so when two sons of the mortgagee were already on record and representing the estate.[742]

[s 100.28] Recalling of Judgment in Second Appeal by High Court on Technical Ground and Later on Confirming it — Validity

The high court allowed second appeal by an order made on 9 March 1985 and the judgment and decree passed by the first appellate court was set aside and it was held that the appellant, as a co-owner of the suit land, is entitled to the relief claimed for recovery of possession over the entire suit land. Subsequently, the order made on 9 March 1995 allowing the second appeal was recalled on the technical objection of non impleading of legal representatives of one of the parties and the appeal was posted for fresh hearing. On 17 November 1997, the high court finally disposed of the appeal after referring to the judgment dated 9 March 1995 by stating that it concurs with the earlier order, but gave certain additional reasons.[743]

The order of high court did not find favour with the Supreme Court, which was of the view that if all the parties had not been present who could have been impleaded, then the judgment rendered thereto will not be one which was decided in the presence of all the parties. Therefore, when the earlier order dated 9 March 1995 was recalled, the entire judgment stood upset, and it is no longer available for the learned judge either to concur or accept that reasoning.[744]

[s 100.29] Substitution of Opinion of First Appellate Court by Second Appellate Court

The high court cannot substitute its own opinion for that of the first appellate court unless it finds that the conclusions drawn by the lower court were erroneous being (1) contrary to the mandatory provisions of applicable law, or (2) contrary to the law as pronounced by the Supreme Court; or (3) based upon inadmissible evidence or no evidence.[745]

In a suit for specific performance of contract of sale, which was decreed by the trial court and the first appellate court, interference by the high court in second appeal without analysing evidence and without giving reasons for holding view contrary to those of the courts below. If the trial court had opportunity to observe the demeanour of witnesses, this cannot be a ground to hold that the first appellate court had pre-conceived notion.[746]

[s 100.30] First Appellate Court — Not Countering Reasoning of Trial Court — Effect

In several judgments,[747] it has been held that the first appellate court, which, even though a court of fact, has to counter the reasoning recorded by the trial court for disagreeing with its findings. If the first appellate court has not specifically countered the reasoning of the trial court while coming to a different conclusion, that alone cannot be a ground for acceptance of the second appeal. No doubt, the high court is not supposed to go into the question of fact, but in a situation like this where the first appellate court has failed to discharge its duty of countering the reasoning of the trial court, the high court, while exercising its power as second appellate court, can look into and reappraise the entire evidence with a view to satisfying itself whether the trial court's reasoning justified its finding or whether the first appellate court was right in coming to a conclusion different from that of the trial court.[748]

[s 100.31] Order of Lower Appellate Court Admitting/ Rejecting Additional Evidence

The order of the lower appellate court admitting/rejecting additional evidence can be questioned in an appeal from the appellate decree. The high court ordinarily would not interfere with the discretion of the lower appellate court in admitting or refusing to admit the additional evidence unless such court has not exercised its discretion in a judicial manner or in accordance with law.[749] But finding of the first appellate court rejecting the application for additional evidence is not binding in second appeal.[750]

The Privy Council in Parsotim Thakur v Lal Mohar Thakur,[751] while observing that the provisions of section 107 as elucidated by O XLI, rule 27 are clearly not intended to allow litigant, who has been unsuccessful in the lower court, to patch up the weak parts of his case and fill up omissions in the court of appeal, has observed as follows:

> Under cl. (1)(b) it is, only where the Appellate Court 'requires' it, (i.e., finds it needful) that additional evidence can be admitted. It may be required to enable the court to pronounce judgment or for any other substantial cause, but in either case it must be the Court that requires it. This is the plain grammatical reading of the sub-clause. The legitimate occasion for the exercise of this discretion is not whenever before the appeal is heard a party applies to adduce fresh evidence, but when on examining the evidence as it stands some inherent lacuna or defect becomes apparent.

A constitution Bench of the Supreme Court in Venkataramaiah's case,[752] while reiterating the above-mentioned observation of the privy council, pointed out that the appellate court has the power to allow additional evidence not only if it requires such evidence "to enable it to pronounce judgment" but also for "any other substantial cause".

In North Eastern Railway Administration's case,[753] it has been observed as follows:

> There may well be cases where even though the court finds that it is able to pronounce judgment on the state of the record as it is, and so, it cannot strictly say that it requires additional evidence 'to enable it to pronounce judgment,' it still considers that in the interest of justice something which remains obscure should be filled up so that it can pronounce its judgment in a more satisfactory manner. Thus, the question whether looking into the documents, bought to be filed as additional evidence, would be necessary to pronounce judgment in a more satisfactory manner, has to be considered by the court at the time of hearing of the appeal on merits.

When an application for acceptance of additional evidence under O XLI, rule 27 of the code is filed in appeal, the high court is duty bound to dispose of the application one way or the other. Thus, where a second appeal was disposed of while the petition under O XLI, rule 27 CPC remained pending, the case was remitted to high court for deciding the application first and then the appeal in accordance with law.[754]

[s 100.32] Order of First Appellate Court Appointing Local Commissioner for Effecting Partition — Validity

In a suit for partition, the appeal was filed at the instance of the appellant when the trial court dismissed the suit of the appellant (then plaintiff). But the lower appellate court decreed the suit with the directions that the local commissioner appointed by the trial court shall suggest mode of partition and that the possession of the parties shall not be disturbed unless it is essential for effecting the partition. The aforesaid directions given by the learned lower appellate court is not without jurisdiction, and the appellant cannot make grievance against the aforesaid directions and hence, second appeal is dismissed.[755]

[s 100.33] Scrutiny of Evidence

While scrutiny of evidence does not stand out to be totally prohibited in the matter of exercise of jurisdiction in the second appeal and that would, in our view, be too broad a proposition and too rigid an interpretation of law not worthy of acceptance. But, that does not also clothe the superior courts with jurisdiction to intervene and interfere in any and every matter. It is only in very exceptional cases and on extreme perversity that the authority to examine the same in extenso stands permissible — it is a rarity rather than a regularity and thus in fine it can thus be safely concluded that while there is no prohibition as such, but the power to scrutiny can only be bad in very exceptional circumstances and upon proper circumspection. This is, however, without expression of any opinion pertaining to section 100 of the CPC.[756]

Though their Lordships in Jai Singh's case[757] indicated that the said view is without expression of any opinion pertaining to section 100 of the CPC, but a series of decision of the Supreme Court indicated that the power of judicial scrutiny is to be exercised in case of perversity or in appropriate cases where it is found that the statutory mandate was not followed. In view of such cases, it was also viewed that findings based on surmises and conjectures or perverse findings not based on legally acceptable evidence cannot have any impunity from interference in the hands of the appellate authority. Considering all these aspects, it is concluded that the finding of the first appellate court deserves interference.[758]

[s 100.34] Proof of Execution and Cancellation of Will

Where the Will has been proved as duly executed, the fact of registration of the Will has been proved as the joint sub-registrar had issued a certificate that the witnesses have appended their signature in his presence and the thumb impression by the testator was also taken in his presence, these are findings of facts of the courts below and do not raise any substantial question of law for interference under section 100 of the CPC.[759] Where a pure finding of fact had been recorded by the courts below where it had been held that the execution of the will had not been proved, as neither its scribe nor its attesting witness has been examined and the Will was surrounded by suspicious circumstances and was unnatural. These findings recorded by the courts below regarding validity of Will are pure findings of fact, calling for no interference in second appeal.[760] The plea of execution of gift deed giving entire property to a party after cancelling prior execution of will in favour of another person having been examined by the courts below and finding of fact arrived at on the basis of evidence that no undue influence was played upon donor/testator by the defendant and the gift deed was valid, cannot be interfered in second appeal.[761] The question whether a Will can be believed or not is not a question of law. The high court will not re-appraise the evidence to ascertain whether Will should be believed or not.[762] But when the trial court has recorded a specific finding that execution of the Will which is a registered document has been proved by calling up attesting witnesses and the testator of the Will was in sound mental condition to execute the Will and the Will was cancelled simply on the ground that there was unequal disposition by the testator of the will, the cancellation of will is improper and it gives rise to substantial question of law warranting interference in second appeal.[763]

[s 100.35] Inadmissibility of Question of Facts

The language used in the amended section specifically incorporates the words as "substantial question of law" which is indicative of the legislative intention. It must be clearly understood that the legislative intention was very clear that the legislature never wanted second appeal to become "third trial on facts" or "one more dice in the gamble".[764] The basic law pertaining to second appeal as reflected by under mentioned case-law[765] is that if no substantial question of law would have emerged, the findings of the first appellate court or concurrent findings of the courts below on the question of fact cannot be interfered with in second appeal. Where in the case of alleged oral partition, where the plaintiff claimed that he had purchased the suit property from one son as it fell to his share, and the defendant claimed that he purchased same property from another son as it fell to his share, such dispute had to be decided on basis of evidence on record. Finding of fact recorded by appellate court that plaintiff failed to prove his claim being pure finding of fact based on evidence on record should not be interfered with in second appeal.[766]

The Supreme Court has held that where the questions framed by the high court in second appeal under section 100 were essentially questions of fact and the second appeal did not involve any substantial questions of law, the high court was incorrect in remanding the case to the trial court for de novo trial in all the civil suits. It was further held that section 100 empowers the high court to decide the second appeal only on the questions framed. In other words, the jurisdiction of the high court to decide the second appeal is confined only to questions framed. When the high court did not frame any question on the question of remand, to the trial court a fortiori it had no jurisdiction to deal with such question much less to answer in the respondent's favour. The high court, it was held, further failed to see that if the first appellate court could decide the appeal on the merits without there being any objection raised for remanding of the case to the trial court, the high court should have decided the appeal on the merits and instead raised the issue of remand of its own and passed order to that effect.[767]

The finding of first appellate court regarding the form of adoption in dispute is a finding of fact which cannot be interfered in second appeal.[768]

The trial court and the first appellate court have noted that the plaintiff has not been able to produce any deed of title directly lending support to his claim for title and at the same time, the defendant too has no proof of his title, much less even an insignia of title. Being a civil case, the plaintiff cannot be expected to prove his title beyond any reasonable doubt;

a high degree of probability lending assurance of the availability of title with him would be enough to shift the onus on the defendant and if the defendant does not succeed in shifting back the onus, the plaintiff's burden of proof can safely be deemed to have been discharged. In the opinion of the two courts below, the plaintiff had succeeded in shifting the onus on the defendant and, therefore, the burden of proof which lay on the plaintiff had stood discharged. The high court, in exercise of its limited jurisdiction under section 100 of CPC cannot enter into the evaluation of evidence afresh. Thus, the interference with a pure and simple finding of fact based on appreciation of oral and documentary evidence, by the high court, would not be proper.[769]

Thus, the quantity of the extent of requirement in a petition for bona fide need and necessity has been held to be a question of fact not vulnerable in second appeal.[770] The findings about the mere wish or desire as opposed to need or requirement of the landlord, besides the findings about the comparative hardship, a finding of questions of fact and the high court under section 100 of the CPC in view of Mattu Lal v Radhe Lal,[771] could not have interfered with such findings.[772] The high court was not justified in second appeal under section 100, to interfere with the findings of facts unless there were facts established to hold that the alternative accommodation acquired after the decree of eviction in favour of the appellant was reasonably suitable.[773] In a suit for declaration of easement of right of passage, the concurrent finding by the trial court and the lower appellate court was that the plaintiff failed to establish prescriptive easement or easement of necessarily or easement by immemorial user. Such a finding is a finding of a fact and requires no interference in second appeal.[774]

Similarly, where on the face of clear pleadings and the evidence on record, the high court reached a conclusion that there was no pleadings and evidence regarding dispossession, therefore, the Supreme Court set aside the order of the high court in accepting the second appeal on the ground that there was no pleading and evidence regarding dispossession and as such, suit for possession was incompetent.[775]

Where the high court wrongly framed an issue whether appellant had purchased the property and on appreciation of evidence reversing findings of facts recorded by the first appellate court, it was held that the high court's interference with the findings of the first appellate court, which is the final court of facts, were unwarranted.[776] The views of the trial court were based on the misreading of the oral evidence. The lower appellate court drew logical conclusion from circumstantial evidence and upset the findings of the trial court. The interference drawn by the lower appellate court thereof, cannot be said to be merely based on conjectures and surmises. Such findings by the lower appellate court are wholly findings of fact and cannot be interfered with by the high court in exercise of its limited jurisdiction under section 100.[777]

In a suit for declaration of title and confirmation of possession on the basis of sale deed executed by Karta of Joint Hindu Family, it was held by the Orissa High Court that whether there is legal necessity to support an alienation is a question of fact and the courts below having concurrently held that there was legal necessity in the family, there is no scope for the high court in second appeal to interfere with the finding particularly when there is no perversity in the approach of the courts below.[778]

A plea by the appellant that they are the tenant in the disputed property is a question of fact, thus, they are debarred in a second appeal challenging the findings of the two courts below on the factum of tenancy. This was the view of the Supreme Court in Raja Durga Singh of Solan v Tholu.[779]

In a matter relating to the execution of a will, the high court ignored two important suspicious circumstances, those being:

(i) the legatee took active part in the execution of the Will; and

(ii) no provision was made in the Will for the two widows of the testator, when one of whom, the appellant, was not even related to the legatee

The pious wish expressed by the deceased that it was expected of the legatee to look after the welfare of the appellant was of no consequence. Had these two suspicious circumstances been kept in mind by the high court that the finding of fact disturbed by the high court would not have occasioned in the totality of circumstances. Thus, the decision of the high court was upset.[780]

The concurrent finding of fact that out of the two sale deeds executed in respect of a property, one is earlier in time and is genuine and valid. The findings are based on oral and documentary evidence. Such a finding was not open to any challenge in second appeal.[781] The concurrent finding as to the factum of adoption not having been proved, was not such a one, which could not be arrived at in any view of the matter. This finding, therefore, was unassailable in second appeal even under section 100 as it stood before 1976, and what was then a restricted area for the second appellate court has now become almost a prohibited area or no entry area under section 100 as amended in 1976.[782] The findings of facts regarding misrepresentation and fraud cannot be interfered with in second appeal.[783]

The entitlement of the plaintiff to receive damages from the defendants being an issue of fact as concluded by both the courts, has not been shown to be in any manner illegal or perverse. Hence, the said findings by both the courts below have to be upheld and the high court should not interfere with the finding of the facts.[784]

The findings on the questions of execution or entering into an agreement to sell, dated 18 June 1975 and that of possession are pure and simple concurrent findings of facts and it is well-settled that while exercising section 100 of CPC, the high court is not entitled to interfere with the findings of facts, however grossly erroneous it may be, except in cases where it may be said to be vitiated by substantial error of law.[785] by the original owner on the same day the power of attorney was executed. Admittedly, the original owner died after two years from the date of the alleged sale letter.

It was held by the Jharkhand High Court that the concurrent finding of fact that the defendants have not perfected their title by adverse possession.[786]

MY Eqbal, J explained the point in the following words:

> 21 There is no pleading of the defendants/appellants that sale letter was executed on the same day but after execution of registered power of attorney. Here interesting question that comes to my mind is that if Mangal Khan agreed to sell the house property in favour of Most. Rajni then there was no occasion for executing registered power of attorney instead of executing a registered sale deed. Be that as it may, admittedly Mangal Khan died after two years from the date of alleged sale letter that is 02.09.1970. No evidence has been adduced by the defendants either orally or documentary to show that after the execution of sale letter any attempt was made by Most. Rajni to persuade Mangal Khan to execute a sale deed so long as he was alive. Even after the death of Mangal Khan his heirs and legal representatives were never informed by Most. Rajni about her continuation in possession on the basis of alleged transfer by virtue of a sale letter. Not a single chit of paper has been filed by the defendants/appellants to show that they were claiming hostile title in the suit property.[787]

In view of the admission in the title deed obtained by the respondent himself and a concurrent finding recorded by the courts below that the appellant has been in possession, the injunction shall follow. Under these circumstances, the trial court and the appellant court have rightly granted the perpetual injunction. The high court is, therefore, not right in reversing that finding.[788]

Where in a suit for declaration that plaintiff was adopted son, an entry in admission register was put forth in evidence and while rejecting such evidence, a finding, in fact, was given by lower court that the attestator identity was indicated in a different ink, it being a factual finding, not falling into category of perverse conclusion, there would be no scope for interfering with the conclusion.[789]

After considering the entire evidence on record, the court below have given a finding that the marriage between the plaintiff and defendant no 1 had taken place in the year 1968 and the marriage between defendant no 1 and defendant no 2 had taken place in the year 1978. This is the concurrent finding of the fact which has become final, which could not be subjected to the judicial scrutiny in second appeal.[790]

The appellate court considered the evidence elaborately and came to the conclusion that the court cannot direct the husband to return it, since there is no evidence as to the fact that the jewels were in the possession and custody of the husband when the wife left the husband's house. This is purely a question of fact and in a second appeal the high court is expected only to consider substantial questions of law and since the final fact finding court has found, on facts proved in the case, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the jewels it is unjustified on the part of the high court to interfere with that part of the judgment.[791]

and take into consideration all the documents placed before the trial court. In such a situation, the high court was justified in interfering of the finding of the first appellate court.[792]

In an Orissa case, the first contentions related to a question of fact and the appellate court as the final court of the fact having recorded the findings that the plain paper sale deed covers the suit land and such finding being not unreasonable, it is not permissible for the appellant to contend in the second appeal that the suit land is not covered by the plain paper sale deed.[793] Where the trial court and the first appellate courts on the facts found that the sale certificate which was the only piece of evidence relied on by the plaintiff, did not clearly connect the property covered by the certificate with the suit premises, the high court is not justified in interfering with such findings of facts in second appeal.[794]

The conclusions about limitation is a finding of fact and it is not open for interference in the second appeal.[795]

Where both the courts below, upon consideration of the evidence on record, have arrived at the concurrent finding that the plaintiff, an illiterate lady, executed the disputed deed of sale with necessary mental act of understanding the nature of the transaction. Such finding of fact cannot be interfered with in second appeal unless it is wholly absorbed or materially vitiated by some consideration of evidence to the contrary.[796]

Once an appeal had been admitted on the substantial question of law, there was no question of saddling it with any other subsequent conditions.[797]

No documentary evidence of title was available to prove that the suit lands belong to the deity of the temple of the other village A and the mere fact that one of the co-trustees belongs to a village A, was no ground to interfere with the findings that the land belongs to the temple of the village M, in which they were situated. In this view, the findings recorded by the courts below on the question of ownership of the said land to be perverse and on that basis treated as if there was an error of law.[798]

The vendee proved the ingredients of good management and the concurrent finding of the trial court and the first appellate court was that the impugned sale was an act of good management and it was essentially a finding of fact. The high court was, therefore, in error in setting aside the concurrent finding of fact in the fact and circumstance of the case.[799] In the face of the findings recorded by the trial court as also by the lower appellate court on the question of execution of sale deed by the second defendant in favour of the plaintiff, with the further finding that it was a valid sale deed which properly conveyed the title of the property in question to the plaintiff, it was not expected of the high court to set aside those findings merely on the ground that the circumstances which had already been considered by the lower courts appeared to suggest some other conclusions from proved fact.[800] The first appellate court was a court of facts and it had every right to view the facts from its own angle giving good reasons for its opinion. Simply because the trial court had described a particular document as a manipulated one, the first appellate court was not estopped from reopening that matter.

Nothing was placed before the high court to infer any illegality in the approach of the courts below. Hence, there is no ground for interference in second appeal.[801]

In Baldev,[802] the Supreme Court has held that a second appeal does not completely bar determination of questions of fact, but must adhere to the "discipline" of only considering questions of law of substantial importance.

The high court rightly held that the finding of subletting or parting with possession of the premises in dispute was vitiated in law as it was primarily based on inadmissible evidence. Having found the finding vitiated, it was open to the high court to re-examine and re-appreciate the evidence on record.[803] From this point of view, the high court considered the various figures and entries in the originals in which such erasures and entries are alleged to have been made by the employee and therefore, the non-supply of these documents has caused prejudice. Having examined the findings arrived at by the high court, it cannot be said that the high court has committed any error which warrants interference under Article 136 of the Constitution.[804]

As discussed above, the high court, in its jurisdiction under section 100 is only to consider the question of law and not interfere with the findings of facts arrived at by the courts below. At times, questions which are suggested as substantial questions of law turn out to be only question of facts which cannot be interfered with by the high court under normal circumstances. However, it is settled law that the high court can interfere in second appeal when finding of the lower appellate court is based on misconception or not supported by acceptable evidence.[805]

The position is well settled that when the judgment of the final court of fact is based on misinterpretation of documentary evidence or on consideration of inadmissible evidence or ignoring material evidence, the high court, in second appeal, is entitled to interfere with the judgment. The position is also well settled that admission of parties or their witnesses are relevant pieces of evidence and should be given due weightage by courts. A finding of fact ignoring such admissions or concessions is vitiated in law and can be interfered with by the high court in second appeal.[806]

Though the scope for interference with concurrent findings of fact while exercising jurisdiction under section 100, CPC is very limited, and re-appreciation of evidence is not permissible where the trial court and/or the first appellate court misdirected themselves in appreciating the question of law or placed the onus on the wrong party, certainly there is a scope for interference under section 100, after formulating a substantial question of law.[807]

> While it is true that in a second appeal a finding of fact even if erroneous will generally not be disturbed but where it is found that the findings stands vitiated on wrong test and on the basis of assumption and conjectures and resultantly there is an element of perversity involved therein, the High Court will be within its jurisdiction to deal with > the issue. This is, however, only in the event such a fact is brought to light by the High Court explicitly and the judgment should also be categorical as to the issue of perversity vis-à-vis the concept of justice. Needless to say however, that perversity itself is a substantial question worth adjudication—what is required is a categorical finding on the part of the High Court as to perversity. The requirements stand specified in Section 103 and nothing short of it will bring it within the ambit of Section 100 since the issue of perversity will also come within the ambit of substantial question of law as noticed above. The legality of finding of fact cannot be termed to be a question of law.[808]

When both the lower courts have concurrently erred in not appreciating the oral and documentary evidence properly, the high court is at liberty to re-appreciate the evidence and record its own conclusion for reversing the orders passed by the lower court.[809]

In a second appeal where there were concurrent finding of facts by the lower courts, the interference by the high court was held to be justified by the Supreme Court when there was error as to the onus of proof.[810] HS Bedi, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> The High Court has also rightly observed that there was no presumption that the property owned by the members of the Joint Hindu Family could a fortiori be deemed to be of the same character and to prove such a status it had to be established by the propounder that a nucleus of Joint Hindu Family income was available and that the said property had been purchased from the said nucleus and that the burden to prove such a situation lay on the party, who so asserted it.[811]

In the above decision, the Supreme Court quoted with approval from its earlier decision in DS Lakshmaiah v L Balasubramanyam,[812] wherein it has been observed as under:

> 18. The legal principle, therefore, is that there is no presumption of a property being joint family property only on account of existence of a joint Hindu Family. The one who asserts has to prove that the property is a joint family property. If, however, the person so asserting proves that there was nucleus with which the joint family property could be acquired, there would be presumption of the property being joint and the onus would shift on the person who claims it to be self-acquired property to prove that he purchased the property with his own funds and not out of joint family nucleus that was available.

Pasayat, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench, observed as follows in Hero Vinoth's case:[813]

> It is now well settled that an inference of fact from a document is a question of fact. But the legal effect of the terms or a term of a document is a question of law. Construction of a document involving the application of a principle of law, is a question of law. Therefore, when there is a misconstruction of a document or wrong application of a principle of law while interpreting a document, it is open to interference under section 100, CPC. If a document creating an easement by grant is construed as an 'easement of necessity' thereby materially affecting the decision in the case, certainly it gives rise to a substantial question of law.

Under Section 100 of the Code, the power of the high court to interfere with the findings of fact is limited, but it may not be limited in a case where the finding of fact had been arrived at upon taking into consideration inadmissible evidence and based on presumptions which could not have been raised.[814]

An appeal under section 100, CPC, can be entertained by the high court only on a substantial question of law. There can be no quarrel with this legal proposition. The scope of powers of high court under section 100, CPC is a matter of settled law. If the finding of the subordinate court on facts are contrary to evidence on record and are perverse, such finding can be set aside by the high court in appeal under section 100. The high court cannot shut its eyes to perverse findings of the courts below. In the present case, the findings of fact arrived at by the lower appellate court were contrary to evidence on record and, therefore perverse, and the high court was fully justified in setting aside the same.[815]

On the question of interference in second appeal in cases of concurrent findings of fact, the Supreme Court has observed as follows:

> 17. The general rule is that High Court will not interfere with concurrent findings of the Courts below. But it is not an absolute rule. Some of the well recognised exceptions are where (i) the courts below have ignored material evidence or acted on no evidence; (ii) the courts have drawn wrong inferences from proved facts by applying the law erroneously; or (iii) the courts have wrongly cast the burden of proof. When we refer to 'decision based on no evidence', it not only refers to cases where there is a total dearth of evidence, but also refer to any case, where the evidence, taken as a whole, is not reasonably capable of supporting the finding.[816]

> 9. It has been noted time and again that without insisting for the statement of such a substantial question of law in the memorandum of appeal and formulating the same at the time of admission, the High Courts have been issuing notices and generally deciding the second appeals without adhering to the procedure prescribed under section 100 of the Code. It has further been found in a number of cases that no efforts are made to distinguish between a question of law and a substantial question of law. In exercise of powers under this section in several cases, the findings of fact of the first Appellate Court are found to have been disturbed. It has to be kept in mind that the right of appeal is neither a natural nor an inherent right attached to the litigation. Being a substantive statutory right, it has to be regulated in accordance with law in force at the relevant time. The conditions mentioned in the section must be strictly fulfilled before a second appeal can be maintained and no court has the power to add or to enlarge those grounds. The second appeal cannot be decided on merely equitable grounds.

Bona fide requirement, on a first look, appears to be question of fact. But in recording a finding on the question, the court has to bear in mind the statutory mandate incorporated in section 12(1),[818] if it is found that the court has not applied the statutory provisions to the evidence on record in its proper perspective then the finding regarding bona fide requirement would cease to be a mere finding of fact, for such erroneous finding illegally arrived at would vitiate the entire judgment. In such a case, the high court cannot be faulted for interfering with the finding in exercise of its second appellate jurisdiction under section 100 of the CPC.[819]

When the second appellate judge was able to indicate and highlight the serious infirmities and illegalities committed by the learned trial judge as well as the first appellate judge, and the necessity for his interference to prevent total miscarriage of justice, with convincing reasons, the findings recorded by the trial court as well as the first appellate court were shown to be not only vitiated due to perversity of reasoning but also due to surmises and misreading of the materials on record. On a careful and critical scanning through the judgment in the second appeal, it could not be said that any findings of fact concurrently recorded were mechanically interfered with without justification or by transgressing the limitations on the exercise of jurisdiction under section 100, CPC, the reasons assigned by the learned judge in the high court for the conclusions arrived at did not suffer from any infirmity, warranting Supreme Court interference in appeal.[820]

When an admission by the defendant tenant in the reply notice in regard to the plaintiff's title and the description of the plaintiff as "owner" of the property signed by the defendant were not considered by the first appellate court while holding that the plaintiff had not proved his title, the high court interfered with the finding on the ground of non-consideration of vital evidence and Supreme Court affirmed the said decision.[821] That was upheld in Jagdish Singh v Nathu Singh[822] with reference to a second appeal in 1978, disposed of on 5 April 1991, Venkatachaliah, J (as he then was) held:

> Where the findings by the Court of facts is vitiated by non-consideration of relevant evidence or by an essentially erroneous approach to the matter, the High Court is not precluded from recording proper findings". Again in Sundra Naicka Vediyar v Ramaswami Ayyar[823] it was held that where certain vital documents for deciding the question of possession were ignored, such as a compromise, an order of revenue Court relying on oral evidence was unjustified. In yet another case in Mehrunissa v Visham Kumari,[824] arising out of Second appeal of 1988 decided on 15-1-1996, it was held by Venkataswami J that a finding arrived at by ignoring the second notice issued by the landlady and without noticing that the suit was not based on earlier notices, was vitiated and the High Court could interfere with such a finding. The second situation in which interference with findings of fact is permissible is where a finding has been arrived at by the Appellate Court by placing reliance on inadmissible evidence which if it was omitted, an opposite conclusion was possible. In Sri Chand Gupta v Gulzar Singh,[825] it was held that the High Court was right in interfering in Second Appeal, as has been held by Hon'ble Supreme Court.[826]

If the high court in second appeal finds that the conclusions of the trial court regarding the genuineness of agreements for sale are based upon inadmissible evidence, or arrived at without evidence, the high court is certainly entitled to set aside the findings of fact recorded by the trial court and the first appellate court.[827]

However, where there is no material to show that the conclusions arrived at by the first appellate court was based on inadmissible evidence or that the findings arrived at are perverse, it is impermissible for high court to interfere in the findings of fact. Thus, in a suit relating to cancellation of sale deed, there was evidence to show that the sale deed was executed by the transferor when he was suffering from alcoholic psychosis and there was medical evidence to prove the fact and the sale deed also showed that valuable land was sold for a paltry amount. Under these circumstances the Supreme Court restored the findings of the first appellate court.[828]

It has been held by the Calcutta High Court that under section 100 of the Code the power of the Court while exercising the jurisdiction under second appeal is limited and the court will not disturb the concurrent finding of facts as a general principle of law but there are exceptions to that principle, namely, where both the Courts below failed to appreciate the oral and documentary evidence properly to reach their findings, which goes to the root of the matter. In the above case the high court placed reliance on the decision of the Apex Court in Ramlal v Phagua,[829] wherein the trial court and the first appellate court wrongly addressed the issue by not considering the evidence properly. The high court in that case interfered with the concurrent finding of fact by re-appreciating the evidence and the Supreme Court affirmed the view taken by the high court.[830]

In a case before the Supreme Court, there was divergence of views among Judges of the Bench on the point whether the facts of the case called for interference on the findings of fact. In that case, the plaintiff was allotted plot by corporation for setting up industry on the condition of starting production within 2 years. On the failure of the plaintiff, the Corporation resumed possession of the plot. The plea of the plaintiff that construction was impossible because of HT Pole on the plot which was agreed to be removed by the Corporation was accepted by the lower courts and confirmed by the high court. While Tarun Chatterjee, J, was of the view that the plaintiff's plea needs to be accepted, Balasubramanyan, J, held the finding of fact was perverse. Ultimately the matter was directed to be referred to larger Bench.[831]

No evidence is forthcoming from the either side as to whether use of the passage in question was discontinued even before the plaintiffs came into possession or before the defendants had acquired their plots of land. The fact mentioned in the 30 years old document as to the right of user in a piece of land shall be presumed to be correct in this case.[832]

Interference with the finding of fact arrived at by the first appellate court, as the final court of fact, is barred under section 100 CPC, but when such finding is based upon non-appreciation of the conduct of the parties in proper perspective and misapplication of the principles of law in declaring the deed void and collusive when such deed is very vital, constituting the foundation of title, the high court can interfere in second appeal under section 100 CPC.[833]

It can be said that non-consideration of material aspects which are absolutely necessary for coming to a decision on a particular point, is no doubt a substantial question of law which would depend upon facts and circumstances of every case.[834]

There is no second opinion that concurrent findings shall be subjected to interference if the same is vitiated due to perversity of the reasoning and also due to surmises and misreading of the materials available on record.[835]

Where the finding by lower courts as to the facts of the case were not based on evidence, it was held liable to be set aside.[836]

Where the parties have placed their case before the courts and adduced evidence documentary as well as oral in their support and the first appellate court perversely sets aside the trial court's judgment, in the second appeal, the evidence could be re-assessed and nothing prevents courts from doing so.[837]

Where the findings of the first appellate court were based upon certain facts which were not called upon to be decided or were not the subject-matter of the suit and such findings were also based on imagination and surmises and not based on legally acceptable evidence, such findings were held not entitled to be sustained.[838]

Nature of construction, though a pure question of fact, non-application of test prescribed in statute for reaching the conclusion, renders finding perverse and liable to be set aside in appeal under section 100, CPC.[839]

In a case from Tamil Nadu, the Supreme Court held that relief cannot be granted to a non-appellant party to a suit. In a suit for declaration of title, decree was passed against the State Government, but the State did not file appeal against the decree. It was held that the decree cannot be interfered with in appeal filed by a private co-defendant.[840]

HS Bedi, J, speaking for the Bench in the above case, explained it as follows:

> In paragraph 16 of the judgment that we have quoted above, the High Court was cognizant of the fact that it was perhaps over stepping its jurisdiction in the matter but chose to circumvent the requirement of law in the belief that it was justified in doing so as the plaintiff-appellant was attempting to swallow Government property. We are of the opinion, however, that the State Government had accepted the judgment of the trial court as no appeal had been filed by it. We accordingly allow the appeal set aside the judgments of the first Appellate Court and the High Court dated 21st November, 1988 and 10th January 2001 respectively and restore the judgment of the trial court.[841]

Where the law has laid down in clear terms the types of alterations of conversions which would constitute a material alteration and which alone could serve as the basis for an action under section 256 of the Cantonment Act, it is incumbent on the courts in the process of justifying the action proposed against the builder under the relevant provision of the Act to refer to those tests. The findings of the courts below stand vitiated because of non-application of the tests prescribed in law for arriving at a conclusion as to whether the basis for taking action under section 256 of the Act was available to the authorities under the statute. Where, on account of failure on the part of the courts below in applying the tests laid down in law while arriving at a finding of fact, the findings so recorded by them are rendered perverse, the question whether such finding of fact recorded by them without reference to the statutory tests is sustainable in law would itself be a question of law and a substantial one at that.[842]

in averments in plaint, on these facts, the finding of fact recorded by lower courts that the plaintiff had been in possession and enjoyment of land by adverse possession against interest of government was found erroneous in second appeal.[843]

Where, separate possession of room was given by father-in-law to his daughter-in-law after her marriage with his son, but the possession was continued by daughter-in-law even when her relations with her husband were strained, and even after death of her husband, her possession was thus hostile and open to true owner. The observation of the trial court that possession of daughter-in-law cannot be adverse against her father-in-law is erroneous. Further, the finding by the lower court that her possession would be adverse after death of her husband is also erroneous. It was held by the high court that possession of the daughter-in-law on room was adverse against the owner.[844]

On the question of adopting proper approach by court in relation to second appeals under section 100 of the Code, a three-Judge Bench of the Supreme Court has observed as follows:

> It is not within the domain of the High Court to investigate the grounds on which the findings were arrived at, by the last court of fact, being the first Appellate Court. It is true that the lower Appellate Court should not ordinarily reject witnesses accepted by the trial court in respect of credibility but even where it has rejected accepted by the trial court, the same is no ground for interference in Second Appeal when it is found that the Appellate Court has given satisfactory reasons for doing so. In a case where from a given set of circumstances two inferences of fact are possible, one drawn by the lower Appellate Court will not be interfered by the High Court in Second Appeal. Adopting any other approach is not permissible.[845]

Finding of fact arrived at without consideration of the entire pros and cons of the case can be interfered with by the high court in second appeal. The subordinate judge, who decided the suit recorded the evidence. He had thus occasion to have a look at the demeanour of the witnesses and form his own impressions about their truthfulness or otherwise. The additional district judge should have gone after the weight of evidence. He should not have picked up one sentence from here and one sentence from there in the statements of the witnesses and then recorded a finding of fact. He should have gone through the statements of the witnesses in their entirety and then formed his own impressions about the probabilities or improbabilities of each other's version. Appreciation of evidence in a manner that it leads to miscarriage of justice would be an error of law, which the high court has the duty to correct at the appellate stage.[846]

Where, sale of immovable property took place and evidence of independent witnesses established that vendor received balance consideration, the trial court gave the findings accordingly. The first appellate court placed reliance upon statement of the handwriting expert but failed to consider evidence of independent witnesses and therefore, reversed the finding of the trial court. The finding of the first appellate court being unsustainable is liable to be set aside in second appeal.[847]

Where, in fact it appears that the lower appellate court, while deciding the appeal did not care to even have a perfunctory glance at the record, which was available, in view of this, the finding of fact recorded by the lower appellate court, would have to be held to be not based on any evidence. Had the lower appellate court considered the evidence on the record, a different conclusion would have been reached. When a finding of fact is recorded on the basis of no evidence, the same would give rise to a substantial question of law as envisaged under section 100, CPC.[848]

There are two situations in which interference with findings of fact is permissible. The first one is when material or relevant evidence is not considered which, if considered would have led to an opposite conclusion. This principle has been laid down in a series of judgments of the Supreme Court in relation to section 100, CPC, after the 1976 amendment.[849]

The court (the first appellate court) is under a duty to examine the entire relevant evidence on record and if it refuses to consider important evidence having direct bearing on the disputed issue and the error which arises as of a magnitude that it gives birth to a substantial question of law, the high court is fully authorised to set aside the finding. This is the situation in the present case.[850]

In a suit for specific performance of agreement to sell property filed by prospective vendee, the trial court dismissed the suit since execution of agreement was not proved. In the appeal, the appellate court reversed the trial court's decision. The appellate court arrived at the finding without any evidence to sustain it and on gross misappreciation of evidence, therefore, the high court is entitled to set it aside in order to do justice.[851]

Finding of fact arrived at by the courts below on no evidence or on gross misappreciation of evidence can be interfered with in second appeal by the high court, because it will be also a substantial question of law whether a court of fact is entitled to return a finding of fact which is not sustainable at all on the evidence on record and whether such a finding shall be binding on the high court in second appeal. Finding of fact arrived at concurrently by the two courts below, if works havoc to the cause of justice, cannot be allowed to be sustained.[852]

The Allahabad High Court, while explaining what constitutes a void agreement, said that the plaintiff-vendor stated that the sale deed in question was got executed by the defendant, his nephew, by misrepresenting it to be a document of security indemnifying the defendant from repayment of the government dues. The element of fraud and misrepresentation was obvious in pleadings itself. The facts were misrepresented to the plaintiff by the defendant and taking plaintiff into his confidence and dominating him by his position as such, he got the fraudulent deed of sale executed. It renders deed as voidable document. The appellate court, while tracking these issues had interpreted the document to be a deed of gift without going into merits of evidence and attending circumstances. The judgment of appellate court had directly and substantially affected the right of parties and it has been rightly interpreted as substantial question of law. The judgment of the appellate court was set aside and the sale deed cancelled.[853]

According to the provisions of section 100 of the CPC, in second appeal, the high court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the finding of the first appellate court without formulating substantial question of law and cannot set aside the findings of the first appellate court on re-appreciation of the oral as well as documentary evidence available on record, unless the court finds that the findings of fact recorded by the first appellate court were perversely based on misreading of evidence or based on no evidence.[854]

Thus, the position of law is very clear that as a rule, the high court has no jurisdiction to entertain a second appeal on the ground of an erroneous finding of fact, however, gross or inexcusable the error may seem to be, or as a rule in second appeal, finding of fact should not be disturbed, but if, they are based on no evidence or in disregard of evidence or on inadmissible evidence or against the basic principles of law or on the face of it there appears error of law or procedure or when there is a complete variance between pleadings and proof, such findings can be disturbed.[855]

[s 100.37] Finding of Fact can be Interfered in Letters Patent Appeal

Of course, it is not open for the high court to interfere with the concurrent findings of the two courts sitting in second appeal. However, the Supreme Court in Asha Devi v Dukhi Sao,[856] has held that it will be open for the Letters Patent Bench to review and reverse the concurrent findings of fact entered by the two courts. It was further held that the Letters Patent Appeal from the judgment of a learned single judge in a first appeal, is not to be treated on a par with a second appeal preferred under section 100, CPC, and therefore, it cannot be held that the Letters Patent Appeal can only lie on a question of law and not otherwise. In Andalammal v Rajeswari Vedachalam,[857] it was held that the Letters Patent Bench has got powers to review even the concurrent findings of fact and the whole case is left open before the court.[858]

[s 100.38] Substantial Question of Law: Meaning of

The existence of a substantial is the sine qua non for the exercise of the jurisdiction under the amended provisions of section 100, CPC.[859]

There is a clear distinction between substantial question of law and question of law. Misconstruction of legal document or settled principle of law give rise to question of law. Following inferences can be considered as substantial question of law:

1. A debatable question of law which affects the rights of the parties and is not settled by the express provisions of the law or binding precedent.
2. A question of law which is settled by the provisions of law or binding precedent but has been decided contrary to such legal settled principle.

The high court can interfere with the concurrent findings of the courts below under section 100 if material evidence has not been taken into consideration, or there is an erroneous application of law on the facts of the case or the impugned orders wrongly cast the burden of proof or the evidence taken as a whole does not support the findings of the court.[860]

The jurisdiction of the high court is now confined to entertain only such appeals as involve a substantial question of law specifically set out in the memorandum of appeal and formulated by the high ccourt. In so formulating, the section does not require the high court to set out reasons for doing so. Dealing with that expression contained in Article 133(1) of the Constitution, the Supreme Court in Sir Chunilal Mehta & Sons Ltd v The Century Spinning & Mfg Co,[861] where the question involved was one as regards the interpretation of a managing agency agreement defined the expression "substantial question of law" to mean one which is of general public importance or which directly and substantially affects the rights of the parties and which has not been finally settled by the Supreme Court, the Privy Council or the Federal Court,[862] or which is not free from difficulty or which calls for alternative views. In holding that the appeal involved a substantial question of law, the Supreme Court observed that the question involved was one of construction of the agreement which was not only one of law but that it was neither simple nor free from doubt and was therefore a substantial question of law. Similarly, the High Court of Madras has taken the view that where there is a point of law which is fairly arguable and where there is room for difference of opinion on it or where the court has thought it necessary to deal with that question at some length and discuss alternative views, the question would be a substantial question of law.[863] The view taken by the Bombay High Court in an earlier case that a question of interpretation of a decree, though a complicated one, is not a substantial question of law, was expressly dissented from in Sir Chunilal Mehta's case and is therefore not a correct view.[864] But once the Supreme Court has settled a question of principle, its application to the facts of a case is not a substantial question of law.[865] The words "substantial question of law" do not necessarily mean that the question of law involved must be of general importance. The condition is satisfied if there is a substantial question of law between the parties.[866] Misconstruing of evidence and acting without evidence is a substantial question of law between the parties.[867] The amended provision to section 100 provides that an appeal will lie to the high court by the appellate decree of the subordinate court only if the high court is satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law. Thus, according to the amended provision, the question of law could not be ground for interference in the second appeal. The question of law should be a substantial question of law. The expression "substantial question of law" cannot be put in straightjacket. It depends upon each of the case whether the substantial question of law arises in the case or not.[868] The substantial question of law has to be distinguished from substantial question of fact. It is not within the domain of the high court to investigate the grounds on which the findings were arrived at, by the last court of fact, being the first appellate court. The lower appellate court should not ordinarily reject witnesses accepted by the trial court, in respect of credibility but even where it has rejected, the witnesses accepted by the trial court, the same is not ground for interference in the second appeal where it is found that the appellate court has given satisfactory reasons for doing so.

RV Raveendran, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench in the undernoted case,[869] has explained the meaning of "substantial question of law" in the following words:

> 9.1. Second appeals would lie in cases which involve a substantial question of law. The word 'substantial' prefixed to 'question of law' does not refer to the stakes involved in the case, nor intended to refer only to questions of law of general importance, but refers to impact or effect of the question of law on the decision in the lis between the parties. 'Substantial questions of law' means not only substantial questions of law of general importance, but also substantial question of law arising in a case as between the parties. In the context of section 100, CPC, any question of law which affects the final decision in a case is a substantial question of law as between the parties. A question of law which arises incidentally or collaterally, having no bearing in the final outcome, will not be a substantial question of law.

Explaining the point more explicitly, the Supreme Court went on to observe further as follows:

> Where there is a clear enunciation of law and the lower court has followed or rightly applied such clear enunciation of law, obviously the case will not be considered as giving rise to a substantial question of law, even if the question of law may be one of general importance. On the other hand, if there is a clear enunciation of law by this court (or by the concerned High Court), but the lower court had ignored or misinterpreted or misapplied the same, and correct application of the law as declared or enunciated by this court (or the concerned High Court) would have led to a different decision, the appeal would involve a substantial question of law as between the parties. Even where there is an enunciation of law by this court (or the concerned High Court) and the same has been followed by the lower court, it the appellant is able to persuade the High Court that the enunciated legal position needs reconsideration, alteration, modification or clarification or that there is a need to resolve an apparent conflict between two view points, it can be said that a substantial question of law arises for consideration. There cannot, therefore, be a strait-jacket definition as to when a substantial question of law arises in a case. Be that as it may.[870]

If the question of law termed as substantial question, stands already decided by a larger bench of the high court concerned or by the Privy Council or by the Federal Court or by the Supreme Court, merely wrong application on the facts of the case would not be termed to be a substantial question of law. Where a point of law has not been pleaded or is found to be arising between the parties in the absence of any factual format, a litigant should not be allowed to raise that question as a substantial question of law in second appeal. The mere appreciation of fact, the documentary evidence or the meaning of entries and the contents of the document cannot be held to be raising a substantial question of law. But where it is found that the first appellate court has assumed jurisdiction which did not vest, the same can be adjudicated upon in the second appeal, treating it as a substantial question of law. Where the first appellate court is shown to have exercised its discretion in a judicial manner, it cannot be termed to be an error either of law or of procedure requiring interference in second appeal.[871] > when thus the courts below misread and misinterpreted a document of title read with the plan for the identification of the suit lands whereupon the plaintiffs themselves relied upon, a substantial question of law arose for determination of the High Court in between the parties to the suit.

Relying on several decisions of the Supreme Court, it was held by the Madhya Pradesh High Court as follows:

> 16. The word 'substantial question of law' has not been defined in the Code of Civil Procedure but the said expression has been used in the constitution. The proper test for determining whether a question of law raised in the case is substantial would be whether it is of general public importance or whether it directly and substantially affects the right of the parties and if so whether it is either an open question in the sense that it is not finally settled by the Supreme Court or by Privy Council or by Federal Court or is not free from difficulty or calls for discussion of alternative views. If the question is settled by the highest court or the general principles to be applied in determining the question are well settled and there is a mere question of applying those principles or that the plea raised is palpably absurd the question would not be a substantial question of law.[873]

In para 17 of the above judgment, the high court has enumerated basic ingredients constituting the substantial question of law although it has been stated that the list is not exhaustive. Similarly in para 18 some instances are enumerated which cannot be said to be a substantial question of law.[874]

It has been held by the Supreme Court that when there is misconstruction of document or wrong application of a principle of law in construing a document, it gives rise to a question of law.[875] It is a settled principle of law that the court has to formulate the substantial question of law while dealing with an appeal under section 100 CPC. The court ought to have formulated substantial question of law and proceeded with the arguments thereafter. A mere mention about the question having been formulated in the memorandum of appeal is not enough.[876]

It has been held that where a concrete finding was arrived at by the first appellate court after appreciating evidence on record that the relationship between the plaintiff and defendant as landlord and tenant existed and ground for eviction was a bona fide need of landlord for his personal use the interference by the high court under section 100 as the second appellate court was incorrect.[877]

In another case the Supreme Court has held that consideration of irrelevant facts and non-consideration of relevant fact would give rise to a substantial question of law. Also, reversal of a finding of fact arrived at by the first appellate court ignoring vital documents may also lead to a substantial question of law.[878]

The jurisdiction of the high court in terms of section 100 of the code is limited. It can interfere with the concurrent findings of two courts if any substantial question of law arises for its consideration. Where a lady a sale deed executed by her as being vitiated by misrepresentation, under influence, fraud and collusion on the part of her brother, it was held by the Supreme Court that whether the respondent despite the fact that he was the brother of the appellant was in a dominating position is essentially a question of fact per se it does not give rise, to a substantial question of law.[879]

Under section 100, the high court has the jurisdiction to interfere only when a substantial question of law is involved and even then, it is expected that such a question shall be so framed although the court is not bound by that question as the proviso indicates. There may be some other substantial questions of law which may need decision and which can be so decided.[880]

The question concerning the sub-letting, assigning or parting with possession of the premised premises by the tenant father to his son (both living together in the same premises) and the nature of presumption that arises, are substantial questions of law, regarding which a second appeal to the high court may lie.[881]

The question, whether nationalised banks, obliged to charge interest as specified rate in accordance with the circulars and directives periodically issued by the Reserve Bank of India under the provisions of the Banking Regulation Act, 1949, can be taken out of the provisions of the Usurious Loans Act, 1918 is a question of law. Where such question is involved in a suit filed before court of small causes by a nationalised bank against an agriculturist, it being a question of law, appeal against the decree of the small causes would be maintainable.[882]

When the courts below had not taken into consideration the effect of all the documents such construction of documents being a question of law was open to be executed before the high court in the second appeal.[883] The Patna High Court relying upon a judgment of the Supreme Court in K Chelliah Servai v M Muthu Sami Servai,[884] held the plea about the limitation is a mixed question of fact and law. That need not be raised for the first time in the second appeal without there being a factual foundation including pleading and evidence.[885] The question whether the Respondent is in possession of open land or not is a pure question of fact and not of law much less a substantial question of law.[886]

The findings recorded regarding the appellant being not in adverse possession of the suit property are findings of fact concurrently recorded by the court below after due appreciation of evidence, therefore, on this ground also the appeal of the appellant must fail as there is no question of law much less a substantial question of law which calls for interference.[887]

After the amendment of 1976 a second appeal can be filed only if a substantial question of law is involved in the case. The memorandum of appeal must precisely state the substantial question of law involved and the high court is obliged to satisfy itself regarding the existence of such a question.[888] As to what is a substantial question of law, Dr. Pasayat, J, speaking for the Bench of the Supreme Court in the above case, observed as follows:

> 11. To be 'substantial' a question of law must be debatable, not previously settled by law of the land or a binding precedent, and must have a material bearing on the decision of the case, if answered either way, insofar as the rights of the parties before it are concerned. To be a question of law 'involving in the case there must be first a foundation for it laid in the pleadings and the question should emerge from the sustainable findings of fact arrived at by court of facts and it must be necessary to decide that question of law for a just and proper decision of the case.
> An entirely new point raised for the first time before the High Court is not a question involved in the case unless it goes to the root of the matter. It will, therefore, depend on > the facts and circumstances of each case whether a question of law is a substantial one and involved in the case, or not; the paramount overall consideration being the need for striking a judicious balance between the indispensable obligation to do justice at all stages and impelling necessity of avoiding prolongation in the life of any lis.[889]

After setting aside the findings of fact the court had either to remand the matter to the first appellate court for a rehearing of the first appeal and decision in accordance with law after taking into consideration the entire relevant evidence on the records, or in the alternative, to decide the case finally in accordance with the provisions of section 103(b) of the CPC.[890]

If the courts below, fail in their duty to appreciate evidence and do not advert to vital evidence, be it oral or documentary, the same would lead to the conclusion that they have committed errors on substantial questions of law.[891] Finding by first appellate court that when horoscope is available, the fact that a different date is indicated in school record is of no consequence is improper. Since first appellate court acted on irrelevant material i.e., horoscope, and left out of consideration material that was relevant, i.e., school record, the matter involves question of law. Thus, second appeal cannot be dismissed on ground that there was no substantial question of law involved.[892]

Where a suit for eviction was dismissed by the lower appellate court on the ground of not being instituted before a particular date and the high court found that the ground to be not relevant to the issue of bona fide, it was held that the high court rightly interfered under section 100 of the CPC.[893]

Second appeal was against decree in a suit for specific performance. Plea that suit was barred by section 16 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, was raised for the first time in second appeal. It was held that the plea, being in respect of a question of law, may be allowed to be raised.[894] The first appellate court came to a finding of possession in favour of the defendant (reversing the decree obtained by the plaintiff in the trial court) merely by drawing an interference from an unregistered Hukamnama executed in defendant's favour by the Muthawalli. It was held that it was substantial error of law, justifying interference in second appeal.[895]

Revenue records are not documents of title. The question of interpretation of a document which is not a document of title, is not a question of law.[896] The construction of a basic document of title or of a document which is the foundation of the rights of parties, necessarily raises a question of law.[897] The plaintiff, an illiterate woman who had been a widow for 30 years was persuaded by her three daughters to execute a deed in respect of all her property. Plaintiff (according to her version, wished to give the properties to them after her death, but was made to sign a deed of gift inter vivos by fraud. She sued to get the deed set aside, on the ground of fraud. She failed on the facts in the trial court, but succeeded in the first appellate court, which accepted the plaintiff's factual version. The first appellate court, while setting aside the deed on the ground of fraud, also held that as attestation (which is required in the case of a deed of gift under Transfer of Property Act, 1882), had not been proved, the deed did not confer any rights on the donee. In second appeal, the defendant (donee) argued that as the gift deed was void and could be ignored, the first apellate court committed an illegality in setting it aside. It was held that the first appellate court had not committed any manifest error in cancelling the gift deed.[898] In a second appeal against decree in suit for specific performance, a plea that the suit was barred by section 16 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, was allowed to be raised for the first time, as it was a question of law.[899] Where the lower courts recorded a concurrent finding that the holding was vested in the Gaon Sabha and settled with the defendants, the case cannot be remanded on the ground that the question of possession was not decided by the lower courts.[900]

In an appeal arising out of a suit for specific performance of agreement for sale, the question whether the plaintiff was willing and ready to perform his part of the contract cannot be said to be a question of law. It was held by the Supreme Court that substantial question of law should be formulated relying on or on the basis of findings of fact arrived at by the trial court and the first appellate court.[901]

In interfering with the award of the district judge under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, the high court adopted hyper-technical approach and upset the valuation without taking into consideration the aforesaid evidence on record. In such circumstances, the high court was not justified in interfering with the assessment of the market value of the vacant land made by the district court.[902]

[s 100.39] Point in Law, Proposition of Law and Substantial Question of Law

A point of law which admits of no two opinions may be a proposition of law but cannot be a substantial question of law. To be "substantial" a question of law must be debatable, not previously settled by law of the land or a binding precedent, and must have a material bearing on the decision of the case, if answered either way, in so far as the rights of the parties before it are concerned. To be a question of law 'involving in the case' there must be first a foundation for it laid in the pleadings and the question should emerge from the sustainable findings of fact arrived at by court of facts and it must be necessary to decide that question of law for a just and proper decision of the case. An entirely new point raised for the first time before the high court is not a question involved in the case unless it goes to the root of the matter. It will, therefore, depend on the facts and circumstance of each case whether a question of law is a substantial one and involved in the case, or not; the paramount overall consideration being the need for striking a judicious balance between the indispensable obligation to do justice at all stages and impelling necessity of avoiding prolongation in the life of any list.[903]

The first appellate court did not discharge the duty cast on it as a court of first appeal, the high court having noticed failure on the part of the appellant in not discharging the statutory obligation cast on him by sub-section (3) of section 100 of the CPC, on account of the substantial question of law involved in the appeal having not been stated, much less precisely, in the memorandum of second appeal. Ordinarily, an opportunity to frame such question should have been afforded to the appellant unless the deficiency was brought to the notice of the appellant previously by the high court registry or the court and yet the appellant had persisted in his default.[904]

As per settled law, the scope of exercise of the jurisdiction by the high court in second appeal under section 100 is limited to the substantial questions of law framed at the time of admission of the appeal or additional substantial questions of law framed at a later date after recording reasons for the same. It was observed in Santosh Hazari's case[905] that a point of law which admits of no two opinions may be a proposition of law but cannot be a substantial question of law. To be a "substantial" question of law, it must be debatable, not previously settled by law of the land or a binding precedent and answer to the same will have a material bearing as to the rights of the parties before the court. As to what would be the question of law "involving in the case", it was observed that to be a question of law 'involving in the case' there must be first a foundation for it laid in the pleadings and the question should emerge from the sustainable findings of fact arrived at by the court of facts and it must be necessary to decide that question of law for a just and proper decision between the parties.[906]

What is a substantial question of law would certainly depend upon facts and circumstances of every case and if a question of law had been settled by the highest court of the country, that question, however important and difficult it may have been regarded in the past and however large may be its effect on any of the parties, would not be regarded as substantial question of law.[907]

Merely because of appreciation of evidence another law is also possible, would not empower the high court to assume jurisdiction by terming the questions as substantial questions of law, the learned district judge has exercised his discretion as a first appellate court in a judicial manner.[908]

test for The proper test for determining whether a question of law raised in the case is substantial would, be whether it is of general public importance or whether it directly and substantially affects the rights of the parties and if so whether it is either an open question in the sense that it is not finally settled by the Supreme Court or by the Privy Council or by the Federal Court or is not free from difficulty of calls for discussion of alternative views. If the question is settled by the highest court or the general principles to be applied in determining the question are well settled and there is a mere question of applying those principles or that the plea raised is palpably absurd the question would not be a substantial question of law.[909]

If the question of law termed as a substantial question stands already decided by a larger bench of the high court concerned or by the Privy Council or by the Federal Court or by the Supreme Court, merely its wrong application on the facts of the case would not be termed to be a substantial question of law. Where a point of law has not been pleaded or is found to be arising between the parties in the absence of any factual format, a litigant should not be allowed to raise that question as a substantial question of law in second appeal. The mere appreciation of the facts, the documentary evidence or the meaning of entries and the contents of the document cannot be held to be raising a substantial question of law. But where it is found that the first appellate court has assumed jurisdiction which did not vest in it, the same can be adjudicated in the second appeal, treating it as a substantial question of law. Where the first appellate court is shown to have exercised its discretion in a judicial manner, it cannot be termed to be an error either of law or of procedure requiring interference.[910]

Whether the trial court should not have exercised its jurisdiction differently is not a question of law justifying interference.[911]

[s 100.41] Substantial Question of Law — Sine Qua Non for Exercise of Jurisdiction

The reading of section 100 makes it abundantly clear that if the appeal is entertained without framing the substantial question of law, then it would be illegal and would amount to failure or abdication of the duty cast on the court. In a number of judgments, it has been held by Supreme Court that the existence of the substantial question of law is the sine qua non for the exercise of jurisdiction under section 100 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[912]

Jurisdiction of the high court under section 100, CPC is limited to a substantial question of law framed at the time of admission of the appeal or at a subsequent stage if the high court is satisfied that such a question of law arises from the facts found by the courts below.[913]

A second appeal is entertainable only on substantial question of law. A judgment passed without formulation of such question is patently illegal. It was opined by RM Lodha, J, as under[914]:

> 11. In our view, the very jurisdiction of the High Court in hearing a second appeal is founded on the formulation of a substantial question of law. The judgment of the High Court is rendered patently illegal, if a second appeal is heard and judgment and decree appealed against is reversed without formulating a substantial question of law. The second appellate jurisdiction of the High Court under Section 100 is not akin to the appellate jurisdiction under Section 96 of the Code; it is restricted to such substantial question or questions of law that may arise from the judgment and decree appealed against. As a matter of law, a second appeal is entertainable by the High Court only upon its satisfaction that a substantial question of law is involved in the matter and its formulation thereof. Section 100 of the Code provides that the second appeal shall be heard on the question so formulated. It is, however, open to the High Court to reframe substantial question of law or frame substantial question of law afresh or hold that no substantial question of law is involved at the time of hearing the second appeal but reversal of the judgment and decree passed in appeal by a court subordinate to it in exercise of jurisdiction under Section 100 of the Code is impermissible without formulating substantial question of law and a decision on such question.
> 12. This Court has been bringing to the notice of the High Courts the constraints of Section 100 of the Code and the mandate of the law contained in Section 101 that no second appeal shall lie except on the ground mentioned in Section 100, yet it appears > that the fundamental legal position concerning jurisdiction of the High Court in second appeal is ignored and overlooked time and again. The present appeal is unfortunately one of such matters where the High Court interfered with the judgment and decree of the first appellate court in total disregard of the above legal position.

It is obvious and clear that unless and until a substantial question of law is shown to have been involved in the second appeal, there would not arise any question of interference by the second appellate court against the order of the first appellate court and the judgment and decree recorded thereof. Simply because some part of the procedural law has not been specifically or precisely observed or fulfilled, this, ipso facto, would not lead to a justification for interference in exercise of powers in second appeal in terms of the provision of section 100 of the CPC.[915]

[s 100.42] Sub-section (3) — Pleading of Substantial Question of Law in Appeal

It is expected of the appellant to frame substantial question of law in the memorandum of appeal. Sub-section (3) of section 100, CPC states that: "In an appeal under this section, the memorandum of appeal shall precisely state the substantial question of law involved in the appeal".[916]

[s 100.43] Sub-section (4) — Formulation of Substantial Question of Law — Earlier View

The failure of the court to formulate the "substantial question of law" (while admitting the appeal) does not mean that the appeal cannot be heard. Such failure is an omission by court. Litigants cannot be penalised for it.[917]

[s 100.44] Sub-section (4) — Formulation of Substantial Question of Law — Current Position

After 1976 Amendment, the scope of section 100 has been drastically curtailed and narrowed down. The high courts would have jurisdiction of interfering under section 100, CPC, only in a case where substantial questions of law are involved and those questions have been clearly formulated in the memorandum of appeal.[918]

It is trite law that under section 100 of the CPC, a high court can entertain a second appeal only if it is satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law. Sub-section (4) of section 100 provides that where the high court is satisfied that a substantial question of law is involved in any case, it shall formulate that question. Sub-section (5) stipulates that the appeal shall be heard on the question so formulated and the respondent shall, at the hearing of the appeal, be allowed to argue that the case does not involve such question. The mandatory requirements of this provision of law have been totally flouted by the high court. The high court has not indicated in the long judgment as to which was the substantial question of law, if any, considered, nor has it formulated the substantial question of law on which the decision in the second appeal was being given. The high court has proceeded as if it were deciding a first appeal against a decree in original proceedings. On this ground alone, the judgment is liable to be interfered with in second appeal.[919] The setting aside of concurrent findings of the courts below in second appeal without formulating substantial question of law is not proper.[920] If a perusal of the impugned judgment passed by the high court does not show that any substantial question of law has been formulated or that the second appeal was heard on the question, if any, so formulated, the judgment in second appeal cannot be maintained and so, is liable to be set aside.[921]

Where the high court had simply re-appreciated the evidence on record and allowed the second appeal and remanded the matter to the trial court without ascertaining a question of law (not even a substantial question of law), it was held by the Supreme Court that the high court cannot assume the jurisdiction by avoiding formulation of a substantial question of law.[922]

The following observation of the Supreme Court deserves particular attention in Basayya Mathad's case[923]:

> This Court, in a series of decisions, has held that allowing a second appeal without framing substantial question of law is clearly contrary to the mandate of Section 100, CPC vide:

> In view of the settled legal position and of the fact that the High Court has not adhered to the same, failed to formulate substantial question of law thereby committed an error in allowing the second appeal. On this ground, the judgement and order of the learned Judge in R.S.A. 105 of 1997 is liable to be set aside.

It is abundantly clear from the analysis of section 100 that if the appeal is entertained without framing the substantial questions of law, then it would be illegal and would amount to failure or abdication of the duty cast on the court. The existence of substantial questions of law is the sine qua non for the exercise of jurisdiction under section 100 of the CPC.[924]

It has been observed by Supreme Court in several decisions that the high court must conform to the requirements laid down in sub-section (4) of section 100 CPC, formulation of such questions of law gives proper direction in which arguments have to be advanced by the parties. The facts and the questions of law are also appreciated in correct perspective.[925]

Bare perusal of section 100 makes it clear that the high court cannot proceed to hear a second appeal without formulating the substantial question of law involved in the appeal.[926]

If perusal of the impugned judgment passed by the high court does not show that any substantial question of law has been formulated or that the second appeal was heard on the question if any, so formulated, the judgment cannot be maintained by the Supreme Court.[927]

In Arsad Sheikh v Bani Prosanna Kundu,[928] a judgment passed by the high court in second appeal was challenged before the Supreme Court on the ground that the high court did not frame a substantial question of law at the time of admission of the second appeal but instead formulated a question only in the impugned judgment after the arguments had been concluded. The Supreme Court, however, unconvinced, held that the omission of the court in formulating the substantial question of law while admitting the appeal does not preclude the same from being heard as litigants should not be penalised for an omission of the court. It was further held that in a second appeal, substantial question of law can be formulated at the initial stage and in some exceptional cases, at a later point of time. Even at the stage of arguments, such substantial question of law can be formulated subject to a condition that the opposite party is put on notice and given a fair or proper opportunity to meet out the point. It has also been laid down that the judgment of the high court can only be set aside on the ground of non-compliance with sub-section (4) of section 100 if some prejudice has been caused to the appellants by not formulating such a substantial question of law.

The stipulation under section 100 of the CPC as to the need to formulate a substantial question of law and the failure to do so vitiate the adjudication itself.[929] If the parties were not informed of the substantial questions of law, if formulated, that arose for consideration as required under section 100, so that they could address on such a substantial question of law, this is a serious informative being contrary to requirement of section 100 of CPC.[930] The Supreme Court has taken the view in several cases that in second appeals, substantial question or questions of law must arise for consideration and the appeals are to be heard on the substantial questions of law so formulated.[931] It is not permissible for the high court to reverse the judgment of the lower appellate court without formulating a substantial question of law.[932] Merely because the high court could reach a different conclusion, would not give rise to a substantial question of law.[933]

In UOI v Ibrahim Uddin[934] which was relied upon in MB Ramesh,[935] the Supreme Court after referring to various previous judgments, observed that a second appeal can be entertained even on question of fact, provided that the hich Court is satisfied that the findings of the courts below stood vitiated by non-consideration of relevant evidence or by showing the erroneous approach to the matter therefore, perverse. It must be noted that the Supreme Court in several cases[936] has consistently held that the formulation of substantial question of law is sine qua non for the exercise of jurisdiction under section 100. Section 100 does not permit any departure from the rule.

[s 100.45] Sub-section (4) — Formulating Points for Consideration Instead of Substantial Question of Law — Permissibility

Where, in second appeal, the substantial question of law was not framed and the high court did not frame substantial question of law. However, for formulated points which arose for its consideration in second appeal were decided, the interference by the high court in second appeal, without framing substantial question of law, would be improper.[937]

When the question of law formulated as substantial question of law in the instant case cannot, in any way, be termed to be a question of law much less as substantial question of law. The question formulated in fact is a question of fact. Merely because of appreciation of evidence another view is also possible, would not clothe the high court to assume the jurisdiction by terming the question as substantial question of law.[938]

Where, the substantial question of law was not formulated by the high court in second appeal pertaining to suit for specific performance of contract, the only question framed was whether agreement can be executed even after increase or decrease in land, covered after consolidation, finding of the high court in second appeal on the question framed and on the finding of the fact as recorded by first appellate court was held improper.[939]

[s 100.46] Sub-section (4) — Formulation of Substantial Question of Law at Later Stage

If at the time of hearing, another substantial question of law comes into picture, the court can frame it, but for that there are some limitations. The first limitation is that the question to be framed must be as substantial question of law. The proviso presupposes that the court shall indicate in its order the substantial question of law which it proposed to decide even if such substantial question of law was not earlier formulated by it. Thus, the existence of a "substantial question of law" is sine qua non for the exercise of the jurisdiction under the amended provisions of section 100. The second limitation is that such a substantial question of law can be formulated at the initial stage and in some exceptional cases, at a later point of time even at the time of argument stage, such substantial question of law can be formulated provided the opposite party should be put on notice thereon and should be given a fair or proper opportunity to meet out the point.[940]

Where, substantial question of law was not formulated at the time of admission of appeal but after about 11 months of admission of appeal, and when counsel for appellants and respondents were heard at length on each of the substantial questions of law, no party thus suffered any prejudice by formulation of substantial question of law subsequent to admission of appeal and therefore, second appeal was not liable to be dismissed on that ground.[941]

The Supreme Court has held that the judgment of the high court should only be set aside on the ground of non-compliance of section 100 (4) of the Code if come prejudice is shown to have been caused to the affected party by not formulating the substantial question of law.[942] It has been observed in the case as follows:

> In our Opinion, this Court should not take an over technical view of the matter to declare that every judgment of the High Court in Second Appeal would be illegal and void, merely because no substantial question of law was formulated by the High Court. Such an over technical view would only result in remitting the matter of the High Court for a fresh decision, and thereafter the matter may again come up before us in appeal. The judiciary is already over-burdened with heavy arrears and we should not take a view which would add to the arrears.[943]

The proviso to sub-section (5) of section 100 is applicable only when any substantial question of law has already been formulated and it empowers the high court to hear, for reasons to be recorded, the appeal on any other substantial question of law. The expression "on any other substantial question of law" clearly shows that there must be some substantial question of law already formulated and then only another substantial question of law which was not formulated earlier can be taken up by the high court for reasons to be recorded, if it is of the view that the case involves such question.[944]

When the second appeal has been admitted for hearing, any other substantial question of law which is involved can be raised at the time of hearing. Keeping in view the provision of law in the proviso to sub-section (5) of section 100, CPC, hardly there can be any dispute on that contention. But the same has to be accepted with a rider that in such a circumstance the court has to be satisfied that the case involves such a question of law which needs consideration and adjudication, even if not formulated as a substantial question of law at the stage of hearing under O XLI, rule 11, CPC.[945]

Thus, where the judgment of the high court did not show that any substantial question of law has been formulated or that the second appeal was heard on the question, if any, so formulated, the judgment of high court cannot be sustained.[946]

Where the high court did not deal with the substantial question of law formulated at the time of admission, but proceed to frame new or additional substantial questions of law as a subsequent stage without assigning any reason, it was held that the order was not proper.[947]

The jurisdiction of the high court to entertain a second appeal under section 100 of the CPC after the 1976 amendment, is confined only to such appeals as involve a substantial question of law, specifically set out in the memorandum of appeal and formulated by the high court. The proviso presupposes that the court shall indicate in its order the substantial question of law which it proposes to decide even if such substantial question of law was not earlier formulated by it. The existence of a "substantial question of law" is thus, the sine qua non for the exercise of the jurisdiction under the amended provisions of section 100 of the CPC.[948] It is not every question of law that could be permitted to be raised in second appeal. The parameters within which a new legal plea could be permitted to be raised, are specifically stated in sub-section 5 of section 100 of the CPC. Under the proviso, the court should be "satisfied" that the case involves a "substantial question of law" and not a mere "question of law". The reason for permitting the substantial question of law to be raised, should be "recorded" by the court. Further,

(i) it is the duty cast upon the high court to formulate the substantial question of law involved in the case even at the initial stage; and

(ii) that in (exceptional) cases, at a later point of time, when the court exercises its jurisdiction under the proviso to sub-section (5) of section 100 of the CPC in formulating the substantial question of law, the opposite party should be put on notice thereon and should be given a fair or proper opportunity to meet the point. Proceeding to hear the appeal without formulating the substantial question of law involved in the appeal is illegal and is an abnegation or abdication of the duty cast on court; and even after the formulation of the substantial question of law, if a fair or proper opportunity is not afforded to the opposite side, it will amount to denial of natural justice. The above parameters within which the high court has to exercise its jurisdiction under section 100 of the CPC should always be borne in mind.[949]

Where, after hearing the parties, the court is of the view that the substantial questions formulated at the time of admission of the second appeal requires slight modification, it was held by the Madhya Pradesh High Court that it was permissible in order to bring out the controversy on the forefront in view of the provisions of sub-section (5) of section 100 of the CPC.[950]

Where the order of the high court shows that no substantial question of law was formulated or that the second appeal was heard on the question, if any, so formulated, it was held by the Supreme Court that the judgment cannot be maintained. In this respect the proviso to sub-section (5) of section 100 is applicable only when any substantial question of law has already been formulated and it empowers the high court to hear, for reasons to be recorded, the appeal on any other substantial question of law. The expression "on any other substantial question of law" clearly shows that there must be some substantial question of law already formulated.[951]

The Supreme Court has held that an order admitting a second appeal is neither a final order nor an interlocutory/interim order. It does not amount to a judgment, decree, determination, sentence or even "order" in the traditional sense. It does not decide any issue but merely entertains an appeal for hearing.[952]

Explaining the application of sub-section (5) of section 100 CPC, Raveendran, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> 3. Sub-section (5) of section 100 CPC provides that a second appeal shall be heard on the substantial questions of law formulated by the court. It also provides that the respondent, at the hearing of the second appeal, can argue that the case does not involve such questions. Thus the substantial questions of law formulated by the High Court are not final, and it is open to the petitioner herein (who is respondent in the pending appeal) to demonstrate during hearing that no substantial question of law arose for consideration in the case and that the second appeal should be dismissed.[953]

[s 100.48] Core Issue

The main issue around which the entire case evolves is: whether the agreement dated 5 July 1976 was a licence or a tenancy. This issue was there before the trial court and the agreement was held to be a licence. It was there also before the lower appellate court but it was not adjudicated upon. When the core issue is not adjudicated upon, it results in a substantial question of law under section 100.[954]

[s 100.49] Construction of Document is Substantial Question of Law

The second appellate court has categorically stated that there is a substantial question of law between the parties inasmuch as the construction of the documents and which the claim to property is made is a substantial question of law. The construction of documents would be a substantial question of law is now a well settled proposition. This proposition has been settled as far back as the judgment of the Privy Council.[955] It has since been reaffirmed by Supreme Court in the case of Kochukakkada Aboobacker v Attam Kasim,[956] and the case of Neelu Narayani v Lakshmanan.[957] In the light of the aforesaid judicial decision, it can be safely held that the question of construction of such documents itself is a substantial question of law.[958]

The construction of a document by the court deciding the issues between the parties raises a substantial question of law.[959]

[s 100.50] Interpretation of Document — When Question of Fact and When Question of Laws

It is now well settled that an inference of fact from a document is a question of fact. But the legal effect of the terms or a term of a document is a question of law. Construction of a document involving the application of a principle of law, is a question of law. Therefore, when there is a misconstruction of a document or wrong application of a principle of law while interpreting a document, it is open to interference under section 100, CPC. If a document creating an easement by grant is construed as an easement of necessity thereby materially affecting the decision in the case, certainly it gives rise to a substantial question of law.[960]

[s 100.51] Two Views

Where the appellate court, which is final court of fact, has accepted the interpretation which is quite plausible and acceptable, sitting in second appeal, the said judgment should not be interfered with where the interpretation of the lower appellate court is one of the two possible interpretation.[961]

Merely because the high court in second appeal could reach a different conclusion, would not give rise to a substantial question of law.[962] Merely because of appreciation of evidence another view is also possible would not empower high court to assume the jurisdiction by terming the question as substantial question of law.[963]

While deciding a second appeal, it is not open to the court to re-appreciate or re-assess the evidence. Jurisdiction of court in Second Appeal is confined to substantial question of law only and, as such, the finding of fact is not open to challenge. It is well settled that where two views are possible from the available evidence it is not open to the second appellate court to set aside a finding because the other view would be more appealing.[964] It is now well settled that concurrent findings of fact of trial court and first appellate court cannot be interfered with by the high court in exercise of its jurisdiction under section 100 of CPC. Re-appreciation of evidence can be done by the first appellate court while exercising the power under section 96 of the CPC. If the first appellate court has weighed each evidence adduced before reaching to a conclusion, and there is no cogent inference of suspicious circumstance, the high court is barred to interfere with the concurrent findings.[965]

[s 100.52] Mixed Question of Law and Fact

Normally, the second appellate court should not intrude into the question of facts. Though this is a basic principle of law, there is or cannot be any rigid rule in this respect. In deciding a second appeal in proper prospective, the second appellate court may have to enter into the questions of fact.[966] Similarly, mixed questions of fact and law cannot be permitted to be raised for the first time in second appeal.[967] It is not the practice of the Supreme Court to permit a mixed question of law and fact to be raised for the first time before it.[968] The reason given was that whereas in determining a question of fact no application of any principle of law was involved in finding either the basic facts or in arriving at the ultimate conclusion, in the case of a mixed question of fact and law the ultimate conclusion has to be drawn by applying principles of law to the basic findings.[969] Accordingly, where the lower appellate court found that the plaintiff and his predecessors were not Hindu sanyasis and therefore were incompetent to assume the office of the mahant for the reason that they had not performed the requisite ceremonies and had not uttered the required mantra, the factual part of the finding, that is, the non-performance of the ceremony and the omission to utter the mantra was a finding of fact, but the ultimate conclusion therefrom was a question of law.[970] Thus, the question whether possession is adverse or not is often one of simple fact, but it may also be a conclusion of law or a mixed question of law and fact. Where the question of adverse possession is one of simple fact, no second appeal will lie; but a second appeal will lie from a finding as to adverse possession when such finding is a mixed question of law and fact depending upon the proper legal conclusion to be drawn from the findings as to simple facts.[971] The finding on question of readiness and willingness to perform contract is mixed question of law and fact, if the findings of fact recorded by courts below was that the plaintiff had failed to establish that he was ready and willing to perform his part of contract, the setting aside of this finding by second appellate court without reappreciating evidence is impermissible.[972] Where the question in a suit was whether the defendant was bound by a mortgage executed by his mother, and it was held that he was, their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the findings was substantially one of law, and that it was, therefore, open to question in second appeal. In the course of their judgment their Lordships said:

> The facts found (by the lower Appellate Court) need not be questioned. Even if, findings of facts by courts below are wrong or grossly inexcusable, held, that by itself would not entitle the High Court to interfere under s 100 in absence of clear error of law.[973] It is the soundness of the conclusions from them that is in question, and this is a matter of law.[974]

As stated by their Lordships of the Privy Council in another case, the proper legal effect of a proved fact is essentially a question of law, and high court is, therefore, entitled to interfere in second appeal.[975]

Discussing the true scope of the above observation, the Supreme Court has pointed out in Sri Meenakshi Mills Ltd v CIT,[976] that there is a distinction between a pure question of fact and a mixed question of law and fact and that the observation aforesaid had reference to the latter and not the former and went on to state:

> In between the domains occupied respectively by questions of fact and of law, there is a large area in which both these questions run into each other, forming so to say, enclaves within each other. The questions that arise for determination in that area are known as mixed questions of law and fact. These questions involve first the ascertainment of facts on the evidence adduced and. then a determination of the rights of the parties on an application of the appropriate principles of law to the facts ascertained. To take an example, the question is whether the defendant has acquired title to the suit property by adverse possession. It is found on the facts that the land is a vacant site, that the defendant is the owner of the adjacent residential house and that he has been drying grains and cloth and throwing rubbish on the plot. The further question that has to be determined is whether the above facts are sufficient to constitute adverse possession in law. Is the user continuous or fugitive? Is it as of right or permissive in character? Thus, for deciding whether the defendant has acquired title by adverse possession, the Court has firstly to find on an appreciation of the evidence what the facts are so far it is a question of fact. It has then to apply the principles of law regarding acquisition of title by adverse possession, and decide whether on the fact established by the evidence, the requirements of law are satisfied. That is a question of law. The ultimate finding on the issue must, therefore be an inference to be drawn from the facts found, on the application of the proper principles of law, and it will be correct to say in such cases that an inference from facts is a question of law. In this respect, mixed questions of law and fact differ from pure questions of fact in which the final determination equally with the finding or ascertainment of basic facts does not involve the application of the proper principles of law. The proposition that an inference from facts is one of law will be correct in its application to mixed questions of law and fact but not to pure questions of fact.

and summing up the result of the authorities, the court stated:

(1) When the point for determination. is a pure question of law such as construction of a statute or document of title, the decision of the Tribunal is open to reference to the court under Section 66(1).

(2) When the point for determination is a mixed question of law and fact, while the finding of the Tribunal on the facts found is final, its decision as to the legal effect of those findings is a question of law which can be reviewed by the court.

(3) A finding on a question of fact is open to attack under Section 66(1) as erroneous in law when there is no evidence to support it or if it is perverse.

(4) When the finding is one of fact, the fact that it is itself an inference from other basic facts will not alter its character as one of fact.

Now to refer to the decisions wherein the question as to what are mixed questions of law and fact has been considered; the question whether a transfer was made with intent to defeat creditors within the meaning of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882,[977] or whether the plaintiff has made out his title to the property in suit[978] or whether a railway company took as much care of the goods delivered to the company as a man of ordinary prudence would under similar circumstances take of his own goods within the meaning of sections 151 and 152 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872,[979] or whether the plaintiff is entitled to the easement claimed by him,[980] or whether property is ancestral or self-acquired,[981] or whether a tenancy is permanent,[982] or whether a shet-sanadi service inam is kadim or jadid,[983] were held to be questions of law, and a second appeal will lie to the high court. It has been held by the High Court of Calcutta that where from a certain set of facts a court infers a lost grant, the process is one of inference of fact, and not of legal conclusion, and that it is not a ground for a second appeal.[984] The Allahabad High Court holds that negligence is a mixed question of law and fact, and that a second appeal lies if it is shown that the court has approached the question from a wrong stand-point, or that the evidence is such that there was no option but to draw the converse conclusion or that the finding is vitiated by so some other legal defect.[985] But the better opinion is that it is a pure question of fact.[986]

It has been held by the Supreme Court that whether the dedication of a temple is to the public or is private is a mixed question of law and fact,[987] and also the question as to whether a property is ancestral or not,[988] or whether, when a raiyat purchased the interest of the proprietor, there is a merger of the two interests.[989]

In a suit for permanent injunction, the questions of law formulated by the high court in second appeal were not pure questions of law, but mixed questions of law and fact, such as whether there was oral gift and whether the alleged oral gift was valid. There were no averments in the plaint in respect of any gift, oral or otherwise or about its validity. Therefore the defendant had no opportunity of denying the same in the written statement and consequently there was no issue in respect of them. It was held by the Supreme Court that no amount of evidence or arguments can be looked into in absence of pleadings and issues. The questions which could not be considered in the suit, could not also have been considered in the second appeal.[990]

> 27. We are therefore of the view that the High Court exceeded its jurisdiction under section 100 CPC, firstly in re-examining questions of fact, secondly by going into the questions which were not pleaded and which were not the subject matter of any issue, thirdly by formulating questions of law which did not arise in the second appeal, and lastly, by interfering with the well reasoned judgment of the first Appellate Court which held that the plaintiffs ought to have filed a suit for declaration.[991]

reached an inference contrary to and/or based on misreading of evidence on record, such errors can certainly be corrected by the high court in the second appeal.[993] The question whether a female had acquired the right under section 14 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 and as such she became full owner hence, could not be divested of that right is a question of fact which would require evidence to be decided.[994] When the courts below had rejected and disbelieved the evidence on the ground that the propounder had not properly discharged his duty, it is the duty of the high court to consider whether the reasons given by the courts below were sustainable in law.[995]

It has been held in some cases that the question whether the relationship of landlord and tenant subsists between the plaintiff and the defendant is a mixed question[996] but in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in Raja Durga Singh v Tholu,[997] the correctness of these decisions is open to question. It has been held in Bhagat Singh v Nikka,[998] that the question whether a decree was obtained by fraud is one of law, as that is a matter of inference from facts. But a number of decisions[999] have laid down that fraud is a question of fact and this, it is submitted, is the better view. It has been held in Bhattacharjee v Sentinel Assurance Co,[1000] that waiver is a mixed question of law and fact but the weight of judicial opinion is against this view.[1001] Whether a patta requires to be registered has been held to be a mixed question,[1002] as also whether on the facts proved, a partner could be said to have abandoned his interest in the firm or whether a partnership could be held to have been dissolved.[1003]

Thus, when a custom of lineal primogeniture in an impartible raj was pleaded, the Privy Council observed that the high court was right in considering the question as merely a question of fact.[1006] In another case, the existence of a custom excluding females from inheritance was said by the Privy Council to be a question of fact.[1007] A step-brother alleged a family custom in derogation of the Mitakshara by which he was entitled to an equal share with a brother of the whole blood and the judicial committee observed that no evidence was forthcoming of any instance in which the custom was followed and that the question involved was one of fact only.[1008] Again, the existence of a custom by which a tenant was relieved of rent of land allowed to lie fallow, was said by the Privy Council to be one of fact.[1009] A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court has explained that these cases are consistent, for while the prevalence of a practice is a question of fact, yet the question whether the practice is legally binding is a question of law.[1010] Accordingly, the same high court has held that a finding that a custom, which would displace the operation of the personal law governing a Hindu widow's right to succession has not been established, is a finding of fact and cannot be reviewed in a second appeal.[1011] In Palaniappa v Devasikamony,[1012] the Privy Council said that the judge must first find what are the things actually done in alleged pursuance of the custom and then decide whether these facts satisfy the requirements of law. The first is a question of fact and the second is a question of law. Thus, in a case where a mirasdar's right under an alleged local custom was in question, the Madras High Court held that findings as to what things were actually done in alleged pursuance of the custom were questions of fact with which the high court could not interfere; but the inference as to the existence and the decision as to the validity of the custom were matters of law subject to revision by the high court in second appeal.[1013] The Madras High Court made the same distinction in a case where the question was whether a holding was transferable by a local custom;[1014] and so have the Allahabad[1015] and Bombay[1016] High Courts. In two cases, the Allahabad High Court has said that it will interfere if the lower appellate court has acted upon illegal evidence or evidence legally insufficient,[1017] but this refers to the legal requirements necessary to establish a valid custom.[1018] In another case, where a custom of Dharadhura was alleged in cases of alluvion and diluvion the Allahabad High Court held that a wrong construction of wajib-ul-arz coupled with a wrong inference from certain facts constituted an error of law which justified interference in second appeal.[1019]

[s 100.55] Refusal by Court of First Appeal to Extend Time for Filing Appeal

Where an application is made to a court of first appeal to admit an appeal from the original decree after the expiration of the period of limitation, that court has the power, on sufficient cause being shown, to admit the appeal. If the lower appellate court refuses to admit the appeal, holding in the exercise of its discretion that there was no sufficient cause for not presenting the appeal within the prescribed time, there is no ground for a second appeal. The principle is that where a court has exercised its discretion in a sound and reasonable way, the high court has no power to interfere in second appeal. But if the lower appellate court does not exercise its discretion at all, or exercises it capriciously and arbitrarily, or without proper legal material to support its decision, a second appeal will lie under clause (a) of the section.[1021] In a matter decided by the Delhi High Court, the question about the maintainability about a second appeal arose in view of the fact that there was a delay of 385 days in filing of an appeal by a public authority. A legal branch of the public authority was conscious of the period of limitation and accordingly intimated the necessity of the decision of filing the appeal being taken on priority basis. The officials, instead of filing the appeal, decided to await the decision of other cases. In such a situation, the authority is not only negligent but appearing to be lease, bothered about law of land; accordingly, the delay was not condoned and appeal was dismissed.[1022] By reason of the dismissal of the appeal, the appellant stands relegated to the position as was the original suit.[1023]

[s 100.56] Dismissal of First Appeal as Barred by Limitation—Revision and not Second Appeal is Remedy

The Supreme Court, in Kalavati v Durga Prasad,[1024] has observed with approval the decision in Karasondos Dharamsey v Gangabai,[1025] holding that an order of the high court refusing to admit an appeal after the period of limitation expired would not be a decree passed on appeal by the high court and held that it is only where the appeal is heard and judgment delivered thereafter, the judgment can be said to be a judgment of affirmance and if appeal is not entertained on the preliminary ground that it was not maintainable or for any other reason, the decision cannot be said to be decision in appeal. This judgment of three judges of the Supreme Court was followed by a Division Bench of Karnataka High Court in Kanji Moorarji v SV Hegde,[1026] by holding that dismissal of appeal on the ground that it had abated against respondent, would not be a decision in appeal affirming the decree of the trial court and would not be decree passed in appeal and hence, no second appeal would lie and revision was maintainable. Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Mamuda Khateen v Beniyan Bibi,[1027] held that order rejecting time barred memorandum of appeal consequent upon refusal to condone delay is not a decree nor an appealable order, however, such order is revisable. Same view has been taken by Madhya Pradesh High Court in Ajit Singh v V Bhagwan,[1028] Rajasthan High Court in Chhelaram v Manak,[1029] Orissa High Court in Ainthu v Sitaram.[1030] However, Full Bench of the Kerala High Court took a contrary view in Thambi v Mathew.[1031]

A high court cannot dismiss a second appeal on merit where the appellant is unrepresented on the date fixed for hearing.[1032]

The question as to whether dismissal of appeal consequent upon dismissal of application for condonation of delay would amount to decree has been specifically considered and decided by the Supreme Court in Ratansingh v Vijay Singh,[1033] wherein after referring to "decree" as defined in section 2(2) CPC in para 10, the Supreme Court has observed as follows in para 11 and it would answer the question to be determined in this reference:

> In order that decision of a Court should become a decree there must be an adjudication in a suit and such adjudication must have determined the rights of the parties with regard to all or any of the matters in controversy in the suit and such determination must be of a conclusive nature. If those parameters are to be applied then rejection of application for condonation of delay will not amount to a decree. Consequently, dismissal of an appeal as time barred is also not a decree. We are aware that some decisions of the High Courts have taken the view that even rejecting an appeal on the ground that it was presented out of time is a decree within the meaning of the said definition. We are also aware of the contrary decisions rendered by High Courts on the same point. Dealing with some of those decisions a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court (SP Mitra, CJ, SABYASACHI MUKHERJEE, J. (as he then was and SK Datta, J) has held in Mamuda Khateen v Beniyan Bibi,[1034] that "if the application under Section 5 of the Limitation Act was rejected the resultant order cannot be decree and the order rejecting the memorandum of appeal is merely an incidental order." The reasoning of the Full Bench was that when an appeal is barred by Limitation, the appeal cannot be admitted at all until the application under Section 5 of the Limitation Act is allowed and until then the appeal petition, even if filed, will remain in limbo. If the application is dismissed the appeal petition becomes otiose. The order rejecting the memorandum of appeal in such circumstances is merely an incidental order. We have no doubt that the decisions rendered by the High Courts holding the contrary view do not lay down the correct principle of law.

In view of the above decision of the Supreme Court, the question for reference is answered by holding that an order rejecting the memorandum of appeal following rejection of application for condonation of delay in filing the appeal under section 5 of the Limitation Act, 1963, would not be a decree passed in appeal and hence, second appeal would not lie under section 100 CPC and order would be revisable under section 115 CPC. When once it is held that order dismissing appeal as barred by time, is not a decree, the question of drawing a decree under O XLI, rule 35 would not arise and mere drawing of decree in the prescribed form would not make such an order a decree and any decree drawn pursuant to such an order is immaterial and would not debar the aggrieved party to file revision.[1035]

In view of the decision of the Supreme Court in Ratansingh's case as stated above, rejection of an application for condonation of delay will not amount to a decree and consequently, dismissal of an appeal as time barred is also not a decree. The answer to the question is that no second appeal lies and the order would be revisable.[1036]

The court was required to ascertain whether to set aside ex-parte decree, the time spent in the proceedings can be regarded as "sufficient cause" within the meaning of section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908 so as to condone the delay in preferring an appeal against the ex-parte decree on merits? The court in regard to this question said that there cannot be strait-jacket formula to say that "the remedies provided simultaneous cannot be converted into consecutive remedies". Court said that it would depend on the facts and circumstances of the case and only where it is found out that the defendant has used dilatory tactics or where there is lack of bona fide then only the court may decline to condone the delay in filing the first appeal.[1037]

The expression "sufficient cause" used in section 5 of the Limitation Act, 1963 enable the courts to apply the law in a meaningful manner which serves the ends of justice. There are no hard and fast rules laid down for deciding the applications for condonation of delay and over the years courts approach has been liberal so that substantive rights of the parties are not defeated. Court in the instant case considered "sufficient cause" as to the time spent in pursuing the application to set aside ex-parte order and condoned the delay in filing the first appeal.[1038]

[s 100.57] Dismissal of Appeal for Default

Though a second appeal may lie from an appellate decree passed ex parte, no second appeal lies from an order dismissing an appeal for default. Such an order is not a decree.[1039]

[s 100.58] New Case in Second Appeal

An appellant should not be allowed to set up a new case in second appeal,[1040] nor should he be allowed to raise a new issue not supported by the evidence on the record.[1041] An appellant would also not be allowed to amend the plaint to convert for the first time in a second appeal, his suit for redemption of a mortgage and possession of the mortgaged property into one for possession based on paramount title.[1042]

In a suit for declaration of title, the plea under the Easement Act had not been set up by the defendant, nor there was any foundation and material in the written statement as well as oral evidence. The new plea of adverse possession cannot be considered by the high court sitting in second appeal jurisdiction to grant any relief to defendant.[1043]

> It is also a settled law that plea of adverse possession is not sustainable when an alternative plea for retention of possession by operation of section 53-A of Transfer of Property Act is made as a first plea by a plea of part performance of contract on basis of argument (sic). Adverse possession plea being totally inconsistent with the second plea of retention of possession by operation of section 53-A of Transfer of Property Act.[1044]

In a suit for declaration of title and injunction where no plea as to easementary rights were raised, making out a new case and conversion of the suit into one for enforcement of easementary rights and grant of injunction by the high court was held to be improper by the Supreme Court.[1045] Commenting on the manner in which the high court dealt with the second appeal, Raveendran, J, speaking for the Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> 16. The observation of the High Court that when a plaintiff sets forth the facts and makes a prayer for a particular relief in the suit, he is merely suggesting what the relief should be, and that it is for the court, as a matter of law, to decide upon the relief that should be granted, is not sound. Such an observation may be appropriate with reference to a writ proceeding. It may even be appropriate in a civil suit while proposing to grant a relief, a lesser or smaller version of what is claimed. But the said observation is misconceived if it is meant to hold that a civil court may grant any relief it deems fit, ignoring the prayer. It is fundamental that in a civil suit, relief to be granted can be only with reference to the prayers made in the pleadings.[1046]

[s 100.59] New Plea/Objection as to Question of Fact in Second Appeal

An appellant will not be allowed to set up, for the first time in second appeal, a plea not taken by him in the lower court.[1047]

Plea of bona fide purchaser in good faith from ostensible owner[1048] cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal.[1049] In a second appeal, a plea was raised that in view of clause 18 of the insurance contract, the dispute between the parties ought to have been referred to arbitrator, instead of filing a suit. The contention was rejected by the court on the ground that this plea was not raised by the respondent in the written statement. No issue was also framed by the trial court. In such a situation, the respondent shall not be allowed to raise the question of maintainability of the suit at the appellate stage. The question as to want of jurisdiction or maintainability of the suit should be raised at the earliest point of time.[1050] The objection as to the maintainability of the suit in view of section 47 of the CPC was not urged before the lower court, nor was it urged in the memorandum of appeal. The high court, in second appeal, cannot consider the objection.[1051] The issue of benami was not raised before the courts below, hence the high court did not permit this issue to be raised for the first time in second appeal.[1052]

As to the plea of limitation, see notes to O XLI, rule 2, "Leave of court: Limitation," which refer to first appeals, apply also to second appeals.[1053] An objection was raised that no notice under O XXI, rule 66(2) of the CPC, was issued to the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor. It was held to be question of fact and such an objection having not been raised before the executing court, it cannot be permitted to be raised for the first time in second appeal.[1054] When the plea, whether the price agreed to is or has been adequate in respect of a sale deed was not raised before the courts below, nor any issue had been pressed to the effect that the sale consideration was too inadequate to entitle the plaintiff for decree claimed, it is not open to the appellants to raise this issue in second appeal.[1055]

A plea that the licensee raised permanent construction on the property by incurring expenditure and therefore the license became irrevocable cannot permitted to be raised for the first time in second appeal as this plea was not taken in the written statement.[1056] A dispute about validity of marriage cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal.[1057] When the defendant himself has not taken the plea regarding repayment of loan in his written statement, there was no justification for the high court in second appeal to make non-disclosure by the plaintiff as a ground to set aside the decree a specified performance of an agreement to sell.[1058]

Similarly, the Kerala High Court rejected the plea for awarding the value of improvements under Kerala Act, 1958 where such a plea was not taken in the lower appellate court, though the Act had come into operation while the appeal before that court was pending.[1059]

The Privy Council, in a later case, refused to allow a new point to be raised before it, without any pleadings and evidence on it.[1060] The Supreme Court has, likewise, declined to hear a new question of fact raised before it.[1061] A custom, neither pleaded nor sought to be established by evidence cannot be set up for the first time in second appeal;[1062] nor a new case of agency, when the plea of partnership had failed;[1063] nor a new plea that a suit is not maintainable as the partnership which was the foundation of the claim was unregistered as required by section 69 of the Partnership Act, 1932[1064] nor a new plea as to the invalidity of registration of a document.[1065]

Novation under section 62 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 requires a clear plea issue, and evidence. Such a question cannot be raised or accepted under section 100 of the CPC, for the first time in second appeal.[1066] Since no issue was framed to the effect that the plaintiff was not a money-lender within the meaning of Rajasthan Money Lending Act, 1963 by the trial court when other issues were framed and in the absence of which the appellant was not entitled to raise this objection in second appeal before the high court.[1067] A submission was sought to be raised in a second appeal whether the bill of exchange were inadmissible as they were not stamped. This issue was not allowed to be raised by the high court on the ground that no such stand has been taken at any stage by the respondent ante or post lite or in the pleadings.[1068]

There being no issue between the parties regarding the title of plot no 605, the appellants cannot be permitted to raise a new plea and go against their pleadings.[1069] Plea taken for first time by defendant in second appeal that plaintiff had only pleaded customary right and had not pleaded easementary right was found not tenable.[1070] Plea of non-framing of issue cannot be raised for the first time at the stage of second appeal.[1071] When the plea that the sale deed is in valid is not pressed before the trial court nor before the first appellate court, it amounts to waiver of the plea and the same cannot be allowed to be raised in second appeal.[1072] Pleading as to part performance of contract cannot be taken for the first time in second appeal.[1073] Plea of adverse possession or non-framing of issue cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal.[1074] Plea of the party that he became the owner of the suit land by lapse of time when not raised before, cannot be allowed to be raised in second appeal.[1075] The plea that the respondent himself is not sure of his actual or formal possession, when was not raised before the courts below cannot for the first time be raised in second appeal.[1076] Plea of tenancy cannot be taken for the first time in the second appeal if not taken earlier.[1077] Nor the plea that plaintiffs had filed earlier suit which was decided in favour of the defendants on the same pleas as in the present suit can be taken for the first time in second appeal.[1078] When in the objection petition to the execution of decree the objection did not set up case to determine his share, the said ground could not be raised in second appeal after 30 years.[1079] Plea as to declaration of title cannot be allowed to be raised as substantial question of law for first time in second appeal.[1080]

[s 100.60] New Plea/Objection as to Mixed Question of Facts and Law in Second Appeal

When the question is one of mixed law and fact, the high court will not entertain it for the first time in second appeal.[1081]

A new plea was raised for the first time before the high court, whether mortgagee became a deemed tenant by operation of section 2A of Bombay Tenancy Act. Since it was a mixed question of law and fact requiring investigation of fact, the high court did not permit it to be raised for the first time in second appeal.[1082]

The question of application of section 4 of the Partition Act is a mixed question of fact and law and cannot be permitted to be raised in second appeal.[1083]

[s 100.61] New Plea as to Question of Law in Second Appeal is Permissible

The Privy Council quoted, with approval in an appeal from Rangoon,[1085] the following passage from a judgment of Lord Watson in Connecticut Fire Insurance Co v Kavanagh:[1086]

> When a question of law is raised for the first time in a Court of last resort upon the construction of a document or upon facts either admitted or proved beyond controversy, it is not only competent but expedient in the interests of justice to entertain the plea.

Thus, an objection to jurisdiction may be taken for the first time in second appeal, if it is patent on the face of the record,[1087] except, it is submitted, in those cases which fall within section 21 above. Similarly, the plea of res judicata may be taken for the first time in second appeal provided it can be decided upon the record before the court.[1088] A new plea was allowed to be raised for the first time in second appeal where if the plea was not allowed the appellant will not be able to raise these points in any subsequent suit in as much as raising of these new pleas will be barred by the principle of constructive res judicata.[1089] A change in the law which has come into force after the decision of the lower appellate court and which has been given retrospective effect, also will be allowed to be raised for the first time in the second appeal.[1090] The question whether the rights and interest of the mortgagor should extinguish on coming into force of MB Abolition of Jagirs Act, 1951 was raised for the first time in the second appeal. The point was allowed to be raised as it is a pure question of law patent on record based on admitted facts. Such a pure question of law can be raised for the first time in second appeal.[1091] So also the plea of want of notice in an ejectment suit,[1092] or vice versa termination of tenancy by valid notice where the fact of notice is not denied, nor any issue is demanded by the defendant,[1093] the high court permitted the respondent to raise the plea about the notice being invalid on the basis of section 110 of Transfer of Property Act, 1882 for the first time in second appeal. Having regard to the facts of the case, the Supreme Court was of the view that high court was in error in non-suiting the appellant on this ground,[1094] or a plea of lis pendens,[1095] for a judicial pronouncement available only at the time of the hearing of the second appeal.[1096]

The high court will entertain, in second appeal, a point of law although it has not been raised in any of the lower courts, provided the point of law arises on the findings of the lower court or on the issues as framed and on the evidence already recorded. In a second appeal, it is not open to the high court to go into questions which are neither pleaded nor raised nor dealt with by the trial court and the lower appellate court.[1097] Thus, where the lower appellate court awarded to the plaintiff, a third share of the property in suit on the ground that remoter gotraja sapindas inherited per stripes and the defendant preferred a second appeal to the high court on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to any share at all, the defendant was allowed to contend at the hearing of the second appeal that the plaintiff was not entitled in any event to more than a sixth share as remoter gotraja sapindas inherited per capita and not per stirpes.[1098] The Supreme Court has also laid down that a pure question of law can be raised for the first time in appeal.[1099]

But if the objection is one which goes to the very root of the case, it may be taken for the first time in second appeal.[1100]

[s 100.62] New Plea as to Question of Law in Second Appeal—When not Permissible

A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court has held that a point of law not taken in the lower appellate court cannot be raised in second appeal unless it is a point involving res judicata, jurisdiction, or a point the decision of which is necessary to prevent further litigation, and then only if the question does not necessitate the taking of further evidence.[1101] A plea that a suit is barred by section 47, will not be entertained if raised for the first time in second appeal.[1102]

Nor can a point of law be taken for the first time in second appeal if it sets up a new right differing in kind from that asserted throughout the trial, and not merely in decree. Thus, where the right claimed by one of the defendants was treated as one of maintenance only in the courts below, she was not allowed to contend in second appeal that, besides maintenance, she was entitled to a half share in the property.[1103]

But while the court will be acting within its powers in permitting a question of law to be raised for the first time in appeal, it is not bound to do so, and may, in its discretion, decline to do so, if that would operate unfairly on the other side.[1104] But the high court will not entertain a point of law raised for the first time in second appeal, if the point cannot be

[s 100.63] Interim Order in Second Appeal—No Interference in Article 136

The interim order passed in pending second appeal need not be interfered with in exercise of discretionary jurisdiction under Article 136 of the Constitution.[1107]

The Supreme Court has held that no interim order/interim relief can be granted unless second appeal is duly admitted upon formulation of substantial question of law.[1108]

[s 100.64] Appeal Against Interlocutary Order

The Delhi High Court, following Uttar Pradesh Cooperative Federation Ltd v Sunder Brothers,[1109] held:

> In dealing with the matter raised before it at the appellate stage the Appellate Court would normally not be justified in interfering with the exercise of the discretion under appeal solely on the ground that if it had considered the matter at the trial stage it may have come to a contrary conclusion. If the discretion has been exercised by the trial Court reasonably and in a judicial manner's the fact that the Appellate Court would have taken a different view may not justify interference with the trial court has acted unreasonably or capriciously or has ignored relevant facts then it would certainly be open to the Appellate Court to interfere with the trial court's exercise of discretion. The principle is well established.[1110] When once the discretion has been exercised in a particular way by the trial court, it is not open to the Appellate Court to interfere lightly unless it is shown that the discretion has been exercised arbitrarily or against judicial principles.[1111] The question of title that has been gone into by the Consolidation Authorities was without jurisdiction and it is a nullity, therefore, the decree granted by the courts below are clearly illegal. The consolidation proceedings. The decree of perpetual injunction is illegal. It does warrant interference by the High Court as the foundation on which the decree was granted is knocked off its bottom. Though the grant of injunction is discretionary, the same must be exercised on settled principles of law to advance the cause of justice. It is subject to correction by the Appellate Court.[1112]

[s 100.66] Long Delay in Delivery of Judgment—Effect

The Supreme Court in Bhagwandas Fatechand Daswani v HPA International,[1114] dealing with the contention that the long delay in delivery of judgment is sufficient to set aside the judgment under appeal without going into this broad question, set aside the judgment under appeal on the ground of delay in delivery of judgment without expressing any opinion on the merits of the case and remitted the case to the high court for deciding the appeal afresh on merits. While doing so the Supreme Court had observed:

> However, it is correct to this extent that a long delay in delivery of judgment gives rise to unnecessary speculations in the minds of parties to a case. Moreover, the appellants whose appeals have been dismissed by the High Court may have the apprehension that the arguments raised at the Bar have not been reflected or appreciated while dictating the judgment—nearly after, five years. We, therefore, on this short question, set aside the judgment under appeal.

In a subsequent decision where the arguments in second appeal were heard in November 1990 and the high court pronounced judgment on 7 May 1993, the Supreme Court set aside the said judgment of the high court due to long delay in disposal of second appeal after hearing arguments.[1115]

[s 100.67] Liberty to Mention After Pronouncement of Judgment

Liberty to mention cannot be used as a means to achieve an advantage which is not otherwise available in law—a question which stands finally decided cannot be reopened, and the court does not have any further jurisdiction after the signature been appended on the judgment by oral mention. The issue stands concluded as soon as the judgment is pronounced and the same is signed. Be it noted however, that the words "liberty to mention" have been, as a matter of fact, a phraseology, which did come through judicial process without any definite legal sanction for the purpose of clarification, if needed, but not otherwise. It is a legal process which has been evolved for convenience and for shortening the litigation so that the parties are not dragged into further and further course of litigation, that the submissions that the court has no jurisdiction to reopen the issue on the ground of availability of the legal phraseology of liberty to mention cannot be brushed aside. As noticed herein before, the insertion of the above noted legal phraseology is to obliterate any confusion or any difficulty being experienced in the matter—it does not give the right anew to the party to agitate the matter further nor does it confer jurisdiction on the court itself to further probe the correctness of the decision arrived at: review of a judgment cannot be had on the basis of this liberty. The circumstances, under which review can be had is provided under O XLVII of the CPC. In any event, law is well settled on this, that the power to review is not any inherent power and it must be conferred by law either specifically or by necessary implication.[1116]

[s 100.69] Dismissal of Appeal in Absence of Counsel

It cannot be gain said that an advocate has no right to remain absent from the court when the case of his client comes up for hearing. He is duty bound to attend the case in Court or to make an alternative arrangement. Non-appearance in court without "sufficient cause" cannot be excused. However, when a party engages an advocate, who is expected to appear at the time of hearing but fails to appear, normally, a party should not suffer on account of default or non-appearance of the advocate.[1119] Thus, in a case, where the high court heard the matter and reserved orders but on a subsequent date noticed that a substantial question of law has not been framed, it was held by the Supreme Court in the above case that hearing the appeal after framing the new substantial question of law in the absence of the appellant's advocate should have been avoided by the high court by adjourning the matter. It was further held that once an appeal is admitted and is placed for hearing i.e. hearing on merits, it can be dismissed for default but cannot be decided on merits in absence of appellant or his advocate.[1120]

The Supreme Court quoted with approval a passage from its earlier decision in Rafiq v Munshi Lal,[1121] Wherein it has been observed as follows:

> The disturbing feature of the case is that under our present adversary legal system where the parties generally appear through advocates, the obligation of the parties is to select his advocate, brief him, pay the fees demanded by him and then trust the learned advocate to do the rest of the things. The party may be a villager or may belong to a rural area and may have no knowledge of the Court's procedure. After engaging lawyer, the party may remain supremely confident that the lawyer will look after his interest. At the time of the hearing of the appeal, the personal appearance of the party is not only not required but hardly useful. Therefore, the party heaving done everything in his power to effectively participate in the proceedings can rest assured that he has neither to go to High Court to inquire as to what is happening in the High Court with regard to his appeal nor is he to act as a watchdog of the advocate that the latter appears in the matter when it is listed.

The Supreme Court in the above case further went on to sound a word of caution:

> The problem that agitates us is whether it is proper that the party should suffer for the inaction, deliberate omission, or misdemeanour of his agent. The answer obviously is in the negative. May be that the learned advocate absented himself deliberately or intentionally. We have no material for ascertaining that aspect of the matter. We say nothing more on that aspect of the matter,. However, we cannot be a party to an innocent party suffering injustice merely because his chosen advocate defaulted.[1122]

[s 100.71] State Amendments

The following sub-clause was inserted in clause (a) by the Travancore Cochin Act, 17 of 1951:

(d) The finding of the lower Appellate Court on any question of fact material to the right decision of the case on the materials being in conflict with the finding of the Court of the first instance on such question.

This clause was repealed and re-enacted by Kerala Act, 13 of 1957.

The provisions of the two U.P. Acts relevant to section 100, particularly in relation to Letters Patent Appeals are extracted below.

U.P. High Court (Abolition of Letters Patent Appeals) Act, 1962 (U.P. Act No. 14 of 1962)

Prefatory Note—Statement of Objects and Reasons.—1. Before 1962, an appeal could be filed under the Letters Patent before a Division Bench of the high court against every judgment of a single Judge. By the Uttar Pradesh High Court (Abolition of Letters Patent Appeals) Act, 1962, it was provided that no appeal would be filed in the high court against the judgment of one judge of the high court given in exercise of his appellate jurisdiction in respect of decrees and orders of subordinate civil courts.

2. Therefore, in 1962, it was provided in the aforesaid Act that no appeal would be filed in the high court against the judgment of one judge of the high court in respect of cases decided by the Board of Revenue under the U.P. Land Reforms Act, 1901 or the U.P. Tenancy Act, 1939 or the Uttar Pradesh Zamindari Abolition and Land Reforms Act, 1950 or by the Director of Consolidation under the Uttar Pradesh Consolidation of Holdings Act, 1953.

3. With a view to reducing the arrears in the high court, it was considered necessary to make a similar provision in regard to decision of one Judge of the high court in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by Article 226 or 227 of the Constitution, in respect of appellate or revisory decisions of a district judge, additional district judge, civil judge or additional civil judge under any Uttar Pradesh Act.

4. As the State Legislature was not in session, the Uttar Pradesh High Court (Abolition of Letters Patent Appeal Amendment) Ordinance, 1975 was promulgated for this purpose.

1. Short title and commencement.—(1) This Act may be called the Uttar Pradesh High Court (Abolition of Letters Patent Appeals) Act, 1962, (2) It shall come into force at once.[1123]

2. Definition of High Court.—In this Act, "High Court" means the High Court of Judicature at Allahabad as constituted by the U.P. High Court's (Amalgamation) Order, 1948.

3. Abolition of appeals, from the judgment or order of one Judge of the High Court made in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction.—(1) No appeal, arising from a suit or proceeding instituted to commence, whether prior or subsequent to the enforcement of this Act, shall lie to the High Court from a judgment or order of one Judge of the High Court, made in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, in respect of a decree or order made by a Court subject to the superintendence of High Court, anything to the contrary contained in clause 10 of the Letters Patent of Her Majesty, dated the 17th March, 1866, read with clause 17 of the U.P. High Court's (Amalgamation) Order, 1948, or in any other law notwithstanding.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), all appeals pending before the High Court on the date immediately preceding the date of enforcement of this Act shall continue to lie and be heard and disposed of as hereto before, as if this Act had not been brought into force.

1123. The Act received the assent of the President on 7 November 1962 and the English translation of the Act was published in the U.P. Gazette, Extra, dated 13 November 1962.

The Uttar Pradesh Civil Laws (Reforms and Amendment) Act, 1976

Transitory Provisions

"36. Disposal of pending civil cases.—A civil suit, or proceeding in which the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 applies, pending on the date of commencement of this Act shall be disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the said Code as amended by this Act.

33. [1125]Abolition of appeals from the judgment or order of one Judge of the High Court made in the exercise of writ jurisdiction in certain cases.—

(1) No appeal, arising from a superior proceeding instituted or commenced whether prior or subsequent to the commencement of this section shall lie to the High Court from a judgment or order of one Judge of the High Court, made in the exercise of jurisdiction conferred by Article 226 or Article 227 of the Constitution in respect of judgment, decree or order made or purported to be made by the Board of Revenue under the United Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1901 or the U.P. [s 100A.1] Scope

This section is new, its object being to minimise delay in the finality of decisions.

Section 100A deals with two types of cases which are decided by a single judge of the high court. One is where the single judge hears an appeal from an appellate decree or order. The question of there being any further appeal in such a case cannot and should not be contemplated. Where, however, an appeal is filed before the high court against the decree of a trial court, a question may arise whether any further appeal should be permitted or not. Even at present depending upon the value of the case, the appeal from the original decree is either heard by a single judge or by a Division Bench of the high court. Where the regular first appeal so filed is heard by a Division Bench, the question of there being an intra-court appeal does not arise. It is only in cases where the value is not substantial, that the rules of the high court may provide for the regular first appeal to be heard by a single judge. In such a case to give a further right of appeal where the amount involved is nominal to a Division Bench will really be increasing the workload unnecessarily. No prejudice would be caused to the litigants by not providing for intra-court appeal, even where the value involved is large. In such a case, the high court bye-rules, can provide that the Division Bench will hear the regular first appeal. No fault can, thus, be found with the amended provision section 100A.[1128]

The newly incorporated section 100-A of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC) in clear and specific terms prohibits further appeal against the decree and judgment or order of a learned single judge to a Division Bench notwithstanding anything contained in the Letters Patent. The Letters Patent which provides for further appeal to a Division Bench remains intact, but the right to prefer a further appeal is taken away even in respect of the matters arising under the special enactments or other instruments having the force of law—be it against an original or appellate decree or order heard and decided by a single judge.[1129]

1127. Section 100A [as substituted by section 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999)] substituted by Act 22 of 2002, section 4 (w.e.f. 1-7-2002). Earlier section 100A was inserted by Act 104 of 1976, section 38 (w.e.f. 1-2-1977).

While deciding the maintainability of Letters Patent Appeal before a Division Bench against the judgment of a Single Judge, the Supreme Court noticed an apparent contradiction in section 100-A as amended in 2002. While in one part of section 100-A it is stated, "where any appeal from an original or appellate decree or order is heard and decided by a Single Judge of a High Court" (emphasis supplied), in the following part it is stated, "no further appeal shall lie from the judgment and decree of such Single Judge". Thus while one part of section 100-A refers to an order, which would include even an interlocutory order, the latter part of the section mentions judgment and decree. Attributing the said apparent contradiction to bad drafting, it was observed by the Supreme Court that not much can be made out of it once the purpose of section 100-A is understood. Therefore, to resolve this conflict, the Supreme Court adopted a purposive interpretation. The whole purpose of introducing section 100-A was to reduce the number of appeals as the public in India was being harassed by the numerous appeals provided in the statute. Looking at the matter from that point of view, it was held that in such a situation, an LPA was not maintainable because if it is held to be maintainable then it would result in two appeals against an interlocutory order of the district judge, first to the learned Single Judge and then to the Division Bench of the high court, but against a final judgment of the district judge there can be only one appeal. This would be strange, and against the very purpose of section 100-A, that is, to curtail the number of appeals.[1130]

[s 100A.2] Unamended Section 100A.—[1131]Section 100A—No further appeal in certain cases

Notwithstanding anything contained in any Letters Patent for any high court or in any other instrument having the force of law or in any other law for the time being in force, where any appeal from an appellate decree or order is heard and decided by a single Judge of a high court, no further appeal shall lie from the judgment, decision or order of such single Judge in such appeal or from any decree passed in such appeal.

[s 100A.3] Changes in this Section

Section 100A of the CPC was inserted by the Amendment Act of 1976 with effect from 1 February 1977 in order to bar a "third" appeal before the Division Bench of the high court against the decision of a single judge in the second appeal. It was only recently by the Amendment Acts of 1999 and 2002, that section 100A has been amended to bar even a "second" appeal against the judgment or order of a single judge of the high court, in cases where such appeal is decided by the single judge on or after 1 July 2002.[1132] Section 100A was also amended earlier by the Act of 1999, however before the same could be enforced, it was substituted by the Amending Act of 2002. The reasons for amending the Act of 1999 by that of 2002 were two-fold. The first being the recommendation of the Law Commission and the second being the objections raised by the Bar Council of India.

The Amending Act of 1999 provided that notwithstanding anything contained in any Letters Patents for any high court or in any other instrument having the force of law or in any other law for the time being in force, no further appeal shall lie from the judgment, decision or order of single judge of high courts, where any appeal from an original or appellate decree or order is heard and decided. Further, the appeal shall also not lie where any writ, direction or order is issued or made on an application under Article 226 or Article 227 of the Constitution of India.

By virtue of the Amendment Act of 1999, the Letters Patent Appeal against the judgment and decree of a single judge made in an appeal preferred under section 96 of the Code as well as the Letters Patent Appeal preferred against the judgment and order of a single judge in an application made under Article 226 or Article 227 of the Constitution was sought to be done away with altogether.

The Law Commission in its 163rd report was of the opinion that so far as the proposal to abolish Letters Patent Appeal against the judgment and order, whether interim or final of a single judge made on an application under Article 226 or Article 227 is concerned, it is neither advisable nor desirable. Many of the writ petitions disposed of by single judges in various high courts involve substantial stakes and have serious consequences both for the state as well as the citizens. Very often, the writ petition is an original proceeding. At any rate, it is an original proceeding in a civil court, that is, the high court. There ought to be at least one appeal against the order made by the single judge on application preferred under Article 226. The proposed move is not in public interest because in many cases the public interest may suffer if such a proposal is given effect to. The Law Commission accordingly recommended against the move to abolish the Letters Patent Appeal against the judgment and orders made by a single judge on an application made under Article 226 or Article 227, wherever it is available at present.

Keeping in view the recommendation of the Law Commission of India and objections of Bar Council of India, the provisions pertaining to appeal against the order of the single judge of the high court with regard to applications under Article 226 or Article 227 were deleted in the Amending Act of 2002. The amending act of 2002 brought in, additionally, the appeal from an original decree (that is under section 96 of the Code) within its ambit, which was not covered in section 100A, prior to the amendments brought in by the Amending Acts of 1999 and 2002. This addition signifies that the first appeal to the high court, against the order of the trial court, cannot be appealed against in Letters Patent Appeal.

It is submitted that Letters Patent Appeal against the interim/interlocutory orders made by a single judge in first appeal should be done away with, though the Letters Patent Appeal against the final judgment/decree should be retained in a restricted fashion. It would have been desirable if the appeal was permitted against the final order of a single judge on the lines of section 100 of the Code. It must be appreciated that not many Letters Patent Appeal are filed against the judgment and decrees of a single judge in first appeals and the even among those filed, a majority are dismissed at the stage of admission itself. Be that as it may, the restrictions of the Letters Patent Appeal to substantial questions of law alone would not only reduce and restrict the number of such appeals but also would drastically cut out the admission rate of such appeals.

The question which arises for consideration is whether the substituted section 100A should be construed in such a manner as to hold that the Letters Patent Appeals which are pending are not maintainable. It is well settled that the right of appeal is a substantive right and there is a prohibition against raising a presumption of retrospectivity that substantive rights are intended to be taken away by retrospective effect of a legislation. A perusal of section 100A as substituted by 1999 Act would show that no Letters Patent Appeal was to lie from the original or appellate decree or order of a single judge where any writ, order or direction is issued under Articles 226 or 227 of the Constitution. Clause (g) of sub-section (2) of section 32 protected those Letters Patent Appeals which have already been admitted and were pending for decision. Such Letters Patent Appeals were to be decided as if section 100A of 1999 Act was not enacted. In other words, in 1999, the legislature in its wisdom preferred to save both types of pending Letters Patent Appeals which were admitted before the enforcement of 1999 Act on the assumption that section 100-A of 1999 Act substituting section 100A had never come into force.

A perusal of section 4 of the 2002 Act shows that clause (b) of section 100A substituted by section 10 of 1999 Act prohibiting the remedy of appeal from the writ, order or direction issued or made by a learned single judge on an application under Article 226 or 227 of the Constitution was omitted. It has been made explicit by section 4 of 2002 Act that any writ, order or direction issued by a single judge of the high court under Article 226 or 227 of the Constitution can be challenged before the Letters Patent Bench and such an appeal would be competent. It has further been made clear by section 15 that clause (g) of sub-section (2) of section 32 of 1999 Act would stand omitted. Therefore, the intent of the legislature has become absolutely clear that no appeal could be maintained from an original or appellate decree or order passed by a learned single judge. It is further evident from 1999 Act and 2002 Act that legislature did not intend to operate substituted section 100A of 2002 Act retrospectively. It is absolutely misconceived to infer legislative intendment from clause (g) of sub-section (2) of section 32 of the 1999 Act that only those appeals were intended to be protected which were directed against the order passed by a learned single judge on a petition filed under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution, on the ground that no such protection was accorded to the appeals arising from the judgment and decree passed by the learned single judge in an appeal from an original or appellate decree or order. Such a legislative intendment could have possibly been inferred had clause (g) of sub-section (2) of section 32 of 1999 Act continued to apply and was kept alive. However, the aforementioned provision itself has been omitted by sub-clause (i) of clause (b) of section 15 of 2002 Act. Both 1999 Act as well as 2002 Act have been enacted by notification of the same date i.e., 6 June 2002 and enforced with effect from 1 July 2002. The legislature, by omitting those clauses, has made its intention explicit.[1133]

Section 100-A of the Code, as substituted by the Amendment Act of 2002 will not have retrospective effect so as to bring within its fold even appeals preferred prior to coming into force of the said amendment with effect from 1 July 2002. Thus, a Letters Patent Appeal, which was filed prior to the coming into force of the said amendment would be maintainable.[1134]

Where an intra-court Special Appeal was filed prior to the 2002 amendment, the Court would have jurisdiction to decide the Special Appeal on merits, notwithstanding the bar contained in s100-A. The use of expression "heard and decided by Single Judge of High Court" in section 100-A suggests that only those appeals which are heard and decided by Single Judge on and after 1 July 2002 would be hit by the bar contained in s100-A.[1135] the appeal arises was initiated prior to 1 July 2002. Provisions of section 100-A of CPC, would prevail over section 5 (ii) of the Kerala Act.[1136]

Where the Letters Patent Appeals against the order passed by the high court were filed much after the coming into effect of the amendment of 2002, it was held that the appeals were not maintainable.[1137] AK Ganguly, CJ (as he then was) explained the proposition in the following words:

> 19. But the legal position in the present appeals is totally different. It is an accepted legal position in view of the propositions formulated in Garikapati[1138] that a right of appeal, even though a vested one, can be taken away by law and it can affect, depending on the statutory mandate, appeals to be filed from suits which are pending when the law has come. The question whether it will affect such a right of appeal depends, as noted above, on the statutory provision in question. The statutory provision in this case, namely Section 100A, as introduced by 2002 amendment of the code has been set out herein above and it starts with a non-obstante clause.
> 20. The purpose of a non-obstante clause is to give the enacting part of the statute an overriding effect in the case of a conflict with the laws mentioned in the non-obstante clause. This amounts to expressing a legislative intent that in spite of the enactment mentioned in the non-obstante clause, the law enacted following it will have full operation and the provisions mentioned in the non-obstante clause will not be an impediment.[1139]

A Division Bench of the Rajasthan High Court has held that intra-court appeal, filed against the judgment of Single Judge of the high court passed in exercise of appellate powers, in view of the provisions enacted in section 100A of the Code, is not maintainable.[1140]

It is further advantageous to point out that mere existence of a right to appeal on the date of repeal of a statute cannot be considered a vested right or an accrued right. An available right would become vested right only when it is exercised, otherwise, it would continue to embryological rights. Therefore, the Letters Patent Appeals which have already been filed before 1 July 2002 are the only appeals which are intended to be protected. The Letters Patent Appeals which are to be filed on or after 1 July 2002 would not be maintainable because the bar created by section 100A of 2002 Act would become operational. In other words, section 100A of 2002 Act would not affect the accrued right of appeal vested in a suitor who has actually filed the appeal before 1 July 2002, but those who are yet to file the appeal on or after 1 July 2002, would not be entitled to maintain the same.[1141]

The legislature has provided for a specific exclusion. It must be stated that now by virtue of section 100A, no Letters Patent Appeal would be maintainable. However, it is an admitted position that the law which would prevail would be the law at the relevant time. If at the relevant time neither section 100A nor section 104(2) barred a Letters Patent Appeal, the pending Letters Patent appeal is maintainable, which is filed prior to 1 July 2002 before amendment to CPC.[1142]

[s 100A.5] Constitutional Validity

No fault can be found with the amended provision of section 100A. The provisions of Code of Civil Procedure Amendment Acts 1999 and 2002 are not in any way ultra vires the Constitution and the provisions by which the amendments have been made do not contain any constitutional infirmity.[1143]

BN Kirpal, CJI, speaking for the three—Judge Bench in the above judgment, observed as follows:

> 15. Section 100-A deals with two types of cases which are decided by a single Judge. One is where the single Judge hears an appeal from an appellate decree or order. The question of there being any further appeal in such a case cannot and should not be contemplated. Where, however, an appeal is filed before the High Court against the decree of a trial Court, a question may arise whether any further appeal should be permitted or not. Even at present depending upon the value of the case, the appeal from the original decree is either heard by a single Judge or by a Division Bench of the High Court. Where the regular first appeal so filed is heard by a Division Bench, the question of there being an intra-Court appeal does not arise. It is only in cases where the value is not substantial that the rules of the High Court may provide for the regular first appeal to be heard by a single Judge. In such a case to give a further right of appeal where the amount involved is nominal to a Division Bench will really be increasing the workload unnecessarily. We do not find that any prejudice would be caused to the litigants by not providing for intra-Court appeal, even where the value involved is large. In such a case, the High Court by Rules, can provide that the Division Bench will hear the regular first appeal. No fault can, thus be found with the amended provision Section 100-A.[1144]

[s 100A.6] Malimath Committee

It clearly emerges that right of appeal is a substantive right. The vested right of appeal can be taken away only by a subsequent enactment, if it so provides expressly or by necessary intendment and not otherwise. Thus, while examining the retrospectivity, it is advisable to know the object behind introducing of provision in the statute. The Justice Malimath Committee examined the issue of further appeal against the judgment of the single judge exercising the first appellate jurisdiction. Committee recommended for suitable amendment of section 100A of the CPC with a view to provide that further appeal in this regard shall not lie. The Committee also recommended for suitable enactment by Parliament for abolition of appeal to Division Bench against the decision and order rendered by the single judge of the high court in a proceeding under Article 226 or 227 of the Constitution of India. However, by Amendment Act of 2002, appeals to Division Bench under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India have been restored. Section 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 has abolished the appeal against the judgment of single judge of the high court in all cases.[1145]

(1) The Satish Chandra Committee has in Chapter IX of its report elaborately considered various aspects bearing upon Letters Patent Appeals and Appeals provided by the various instruments constituting the respective High Courts under the judgments of Single Judges to a Bench of two Judges of the High Court. The following recommendations were made by the committee in the light of such consideration:

Appeals Against Judgments of Single Judges in Exercise of the Ordinary Appellate Jurisdiction

(i) Where the First Appeal is decided by a Single Judge of the High Court in exercise of the appellate jurisdiction, a further appeal against such decision to a Division Bench of the High Court should be abolished by suitable amending section 100A of the Code of Civil Procedure;

(ii) Central or State Legislation should be enacted in pari materia with the provisions of the Uttar Pradesh High Court (Abolition of Letters Appeals) Act, 1962 as amended up-to-date which provides for the abolition of appeals to a Division Bench from the judgment or order of a Single Judge of the High Court made in exercise of the appellate jurisdiction in a matter arising from a suit or proceeding instituted or commenced under certain specified local law; and

(iii) Legislation should be enacted to abolish Letter Patent Appeals against the judgment of a Single Judge of the High Court in a writ petition directed against an appellate or revisional forum below. [Para 2.1]

(2) We have also examined the matter in great depth keeping in view, inter alia, the observations and recommendations made in the said report. As we are broadly in agreement with the recommendations and the reasons in support thereof, it is not necessary to burden this report by reiterating the same. [Para 2.2]

(3) No Further Appeal Against Decrees of Single Judge exercising even the first appellate jurisdiction, we endorse the recommendation of the Satish Chandra Committee that the following sub-section (2) be added to section 100A of the Code of Civil Procedure:

100A (2). Notwithstanding anything contained in any Letters Patent of any High Court or in any other instrument having the force of law or in any other law for the time being in force, where any first appeal has been decided by a Single Judge of a High Court, no further appeal shall lie from the judgment, decision or order of such single Judge in such appeal or from any decree passed in such appeal.

(4) Abolition of Appeals Against judgment of Single Judge of the High Court made under specific local laws in exercise of the appellate jurisdiction in matter arising from a suit or proceeding instituted or commenced under specified local laws, we agree with the recommendation made is in that regard by Satish Chandra Committee and are also of the view that suitable legislation should be enacted by the appropriate legislature in that behalf.

No Appeal Against Judgment of Single Judge in Writ Jurisdiction.

(1) In so far as abolition of appeals from judgment or order of a Single Judge of the High Court made in exercise of the Writ jurisdiction under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution is concerned, we are of the opinion that no appeal should be permitted at all against the decision or order of a single Judge of the High Court rendered in any such proceeding to a Division Bench of the High Court. A Large portion of the litigation in the High Court these days consists of Writ Petitions under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution. Many of such cases are simple in nature and do not involve any points of importance of difficulty. By and large, they do not involve questions having an effect or impact beyond the parameters of the case. These case can, therefore, be safely left to be finally decided by a Single Judge. To allow a further appeal in such category of cases would not only add to the burden of arrears since such appeal would entail the attention of the High Court twice over, once before a Single Judge and thereafter before a division Bench. [Para 2.5]

Hearing of Specified Writ Matters by Division Bench—Discretion to Refer to Larger Bench.

(1) We are, however, conscious of the fact that there may be certain categories of Writ Cases which having regard to the importance and complexity of the questions therein involved may require consideration at the hands of a Division Bench, particularly when finality as the stage of the High Court is sought to be achieved. This problem could be solved either by providing an appeal against such decisions or by ensuring that such cases are heard by a Division Bench. Providing an appeal, as we have already pointed out, would result in protraction of litigation and add to the burden of arrears. There are other ways in which hearing of cases involving important questions can be secured before a Division Bench. [Para 2.6]

(2) As pointed out in the Satish Chandra Committee Report, under the Rules of all the High Courts, if a Judge sitting singly takes the view that a case before him is one which should be heard by a Division Bench, the case is directed by the Chief Justice to be heard by such a Bench. This may be done by the Single Judge, either in exercise of his own discretion or on the application of either of the parties, if the importance or the difficulty of the case justifies such a course. Normally, the Single Judge would not refuse such an application, if he is satisfied that the case is of sufficient importance to be dealt with by two Judges. Thus, cases of complexity or importance, notwithstanding the abolition of Letter Patent Appeals, can still be heard by a Division Bench. If the Rules of any High Court do not contain such a provision, similar provision should be incorporated. [Para 2.7]

(3) Besides, certain categories of cases, may be identified which deserve to be heard by a Division Bench. The identification of such cases should be left to the discretion of each High Court which may make suitable provision in that regard in its Rules and Orders. In the rules and Orders framed by some of the High Courts like Bombay and Gujarat, a specific categorisation of cases under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution to be heard by a Single Judge or a Division Bench, as the case may be, is found to have been made. There is no reason why such a practice or procedure cannot be adopted in other High Courts. We are, however, of the view that case like application for issue of Writ of Habeas Corpus and issue of appropriate Writs in externment and deportation cases, cases arising under Fiscal Acts, Labour Legislation and Public Interest Litigations, deserve to be heard by a Division Bench [Para 2.8]

(4) We find, however, that in some of the States a provision has been made by legislation requiring that petitions under Articles 226 and/or 227 of the Constitution should be heard by a Single Judge or by a Division Bench, as the case may be. In the face of such a legislation, the High Court in those States cannot frame Rules and Orders, prescribing the respective jurisdiction of the Single Judge and the Division Bench in regard to different categories of writ cases. [Para 2.9]

Enactment of Law Recommended

(1) Against the aforesaid background, we are of the opinion that for achieving uniformity throughout the country, Parliament should enact a law providing for:

  (i) abolition of an appeal to a Division Bench against the decision of order rendered by a Single Judge of the High Court in a proceeding under Article 226 or 227 of the Constitution; and

  (ii) conferment of power on the High Court in the matter of deciding which category of cases under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution should be heard by a Single Judge or a Division Bench, as the case may be. [Para 2.10]

(2) The law to be enacted by the Parliament may be in the following terms:

(i) Notwithstanding anything contained in any Letters Patent of any High Court or in any other instrument having the force of law, where any decision or order has been rendered in a proceeding under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India by a Single Judge of a High Court, no further appeal shall lie from such decision, judgment or order to a Division Bench of High Court.

(ii) Notwithstanding anything contained in any law for the time being in force, the High Court may by its own Rules or Orders specify the categories of cases under Article 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India which shall be heard by a Single Judge or a Division Bench, as the case may be. [Para 2.11]

[s 100A.7] Right to appeal—Five propositions

A Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court, after referring to a large number of earlier judgments of the Supreme Court, Privy Council and various high courts, has formulated the following five propositions:

(i) That the legal pursuit of a remedy, suit, appeal and second appeal are really but steps in a series of proceedings all connected by an intrinsic unity and are to be regarded as one legal proceeding.

(ii) The right of appeal is not a mere matter of procedure but is a substantive right.

(iii) The institution of the suit carries with it the implication that all rights of appeal then in force are preserved to the parties thereto till the rest of the career of the suit.

(iv) The right of appeal is a vested right and such a right to enter the superior Court accrues to the litigant and exists as on and from the date the lis commences and although it may be actually exercised when the adverse judgment is pronounced such right is to be governed by the law prevailing at the date of the institution of the suit or proceeding and not by the law that prevails at the date of its decision or at the date of the filing of the appeal.

(v) This vested right of appeal can be taken away only by a subsequent enactment, if it so provides expressly or by necessary intendment and not otherwise.[1146]

[s 100A.8] Specific exclusion of Letters Patent Appeal

It is to be seen that when the legislature wanted to exclude a Letters Patent Appeal it specifically did so. The words used in section 100A are not by way of abundant caution. By the Amendment Acts of 1976 and 2002, a specific exclusion is provided, as the legislature knew that in the absence of such words, a Letters Patent Appeal would not be barred. The legislature was aware that it had incorporated the saving clause in section 104(1) and incorporated section 4 in the CPC. Thus now a specific exclusion was provided, after 2002 in section 100A.[1147]

Variava, J, speaking for the majority view in the above noted judgment of the Constitution Bench, explained the specific exclusion of Letters Patent appeals in the following words:

> It is thus to be seen that when the Legislature wanted to exclude a Letters Patent Appeal it specifically did so. The words used in Section 100A are not by way of abundant caution. By the Amendment Acts of 1976 and 2002 a specific exclusion is provided as the Legislature knew that in the absence of such words a Letters Patent Appeal would not be barred. The > Legislature was aware that it had incorporated the saving clause in Section 104(1) and incorporated Section 4 in the CPC. Thus now a specific exclusion was provided.[1148]

After quoting section 100A as it stands after the Amendment of 2002, it was observed as follows:

> To be noted that here again the Legislature has provided for a specific exclusion. It must be stated that now by a virtue of Section 100A no Letters Patent Appeal would be maintainable. However, it is an admitted position that the law which would prevail would be the law at the relevant time. At the relevant time neither Section 100A not Section 104(2) barred a Letters Patent Appeal.[1149]

In Kamal Kumar Dutta's case[1150], it was observed by the Supreme Court as follows;

> So far as the general proposition of law is concerned that the appeal is a vested right there is no quarrel with the proposition but it is clarified that such right can be taken away by a subsequent enactment either expressly or by necessary intendment. The Parliament while amending Section 100A of the Code of Civil Procedure, by amending Act 22 of 2002 with effect from 1-7-2002, took away the Letters Patent power of the High Court in the Matter of appeal against an order learned Single Judge to the Division Bench. ...

A Full Bench of the Orissa High Court has held that section 100-A of the Code starts with a non-obstante clause. The purpose of such clause is to give the enacting part of an overriding effect in the case of a conflict with the laws mentioned with the non obstante clause. The legislative intent is thus very clear and there would be no impediment.[1151]

It has been observed by the Full Bench in the above case, as follows:

> 45. We have already noticed that the newly incorporated s 100-A, CPC in clear and specific terms prohibits further appeal against the decree and judgment or order of a learned single Judge to a Division Bench notwithstanding anything contained in the Letters Patent. The Letters Patent which provides for further appeal to a Division Bench remains intact, but the right to prefer a further appeal is taken away even in respect of the matters arising under the special enactments or other instruments having the force of law—be it against original/appellate decree or order heard and decided by a learned single Judge.[1152]

It would be pertinent to refer to a decision of the Supreme Court in Vinita Khanolkar's case.[1153] In that case a Single Judge of the Bombay High Court had passed an order under sub-section (1) of section 6 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963. When an appeal against the said order was filed before the Division Bench, a preliminary objection was taken on the point of maintainability of the said appeal in view of sub-section (3) of section 6 of the Act which barred an appeal or revision against any order passed under section 6 of the Act. The Division Bench dismissed the appeal as not maintainable.

In appeal, the Supreme Court held the appeal before the Division Bench as maintainable holding that a statutory enactment like the Specific Relief Act cannot exclude the powers of the high court which flows from the paramount charter under which it functions.[1154] Majumdar, J and Venkataswami, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench, observed as follows:

> Now it is well settled that any statutory provision barring an appeal or revision cannot cut across the constitutional power of a High Court. Even the power flowing from the > paramount charter under which the High Court functions would not get excluded unless the statutory enactment concerned expressly excludes appeals under letters patent. No such bar is discernible from Section 6 (3) of the Act. It could not be seriously contended by learned counsel for the respondents that if clause 15 of the Letters Patent is invoked then the order would be appealable. Consequently, in our view, on the clear language of clause 15 of the Letters Patent which is applicable to Bombay High Court, the said appeal was maintainable as the order under appeal was passed by the learned Single Judge of the High Court exercising original jurisdiction of the court. Only on that short ground the appeal is required to be allowed.[1155]

A Full Bench of the Bombay High Court[1156] was seized of the question that whether an appeal under the provisions of clause 15 of the Letters Patent, against an order passed by the learned Single Judge of the Bombay High Court in a civil suit in an application filed in that civil suit because of the provisions of section 8 of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, is maintainable or not ? It was held that an appeal against an order in an application under section 8 is not maintainable under clause 15 of the Letters Patent on principle and also on authority.

[s 100A.9] "No further appeal shall lie" and "heard and decide"

The net result of Amendment Acts of 1999 and 2002 is that where an appeal from original or appellate decree where order is heard and decided by single judge of the high court, no further appeal shall lie to the Division Bench of high court. In the amending Act, the words "no further appeal shall lie" is of great significance. It clearly means that no further appeal shall be entertained in respect of appeal filed after the cut off date. Looking to the object of introducing the provision, any other interpretation would be anathema to the provision. Reading the words "heard and decided" and the words "no further appeal shall lie" conjointly, clearly indicates that vested right of appeal has been taken away by the legislature from the cut off date i.e., 1 July 2002. It is in consonance with the intention of the legislature to curtail the second appeal in the third court. The legislature, in its wisdom, has considered the right of appeal to a singular one. Thus, the legislature has expressly stated that no further appeal shall lie after the appeal has been heard and decided against the judgment and decree of original court. Thus, we are of the view that the substitution of section 100A of the CPC does not permit the Division Bench to entertain special appeal against the judgment and decree of the learned single judge rendered in first appeal after the cut off date i.e., 1 July 2002.[1157]

[s 100A.10] Special Enactments

The right of appeal available under the Letters Patent is taken away by section 100A of the CPC, even in respect of the matters arising under the special enactments or other instruments having the force of law.[1158]

B Sudarshan Reddy, J (as he then was), speaking for the Full Bench of the high court, observed as follows:

> Letters Patent. The Letters Patent which provides for further appeal to a Division Bench remains intact, but the right to prefer a further appeal is taken away even in respect of the matters arising under the special enactments or other instruments having the force of law—be it against the original or appellate decree or order heard and decided by a single Judge.[1159]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court in the above decision placed reliance on a Supreme Court judgment in Sharda Devi v State of Bihar.[1160] Wherein it has been observed as follows:

> 9. A Letters Patent is the charter under which the High Court is established. The powers given to a High Court under the Letters Patent are akin to the constitutional powers of a High Court. Thus where a Letters Patent grants to the High Court a power of Appeal against a judgment of a single Judge, the right to entertain the appeal would not get excluded unless the concerned statutory enactment excludes an appeal under the Letters Patent.

However, the Supreme Court which was considering a case under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, held in that case that section 54 of the said Act does not exclude an appeal under the Letters Patent.

A Division Bench of the Rajasthan High Court held that an order passed by a single judge in appeal under section 173 of the Motor Vehicles Act is a judgment and as such no further appeal under Letters Patent lies to Division Bench of the same high court in view of section 100-A of the Code.[1161] RM Lodha, J (as he then was), speaking for the Division Bench of the high court observed as follows:

> Even if it be assumed that the Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Tribunal is not a Court as the term is ordinarily understood, it is beyond doubt that such Tribunal has all the trapping of a Court. Though the Tribunals occupy a special position of their own under the scheme of the Courts and Tribunals and special matters and questions are entrusted to them for their decision yet they share with the Courts one common characteristic viz.; both the Courts as well as Tribunals are constituted by the State and are invested with judicial functions as distinguished from purely administrative or executive functions. It is the State's inherent judicial power which is discharged by the Courts and Tribunals. If the Company Law Board constituted under the Companies Act in its adjudicatory powers has the trappings of a Court and an appeal under Section 10F of the Companies Act from its order to the single Judge is not amendable to further appeal (Letters Patent) to the same Court because of Section 100A of the Code of Civil Procedure, a fortiori, an order passed by the Single Judge in appeal under Section 173 of the Motor Vehicles Act from the order/award of the Motor Accident Claims Tribunal shall not be subject to intra-Court appeal in view of the bar created by section 100A of the Code of Civil Procedure effective from 1st July, 2002.[1162]

It has been held by the Supreme Court that, as there is no provision in section 10-F of the Companies Act, 1956 akin to the provision of section 100 of the CPC, therefore the failure of the high court to frame a substantial question of law in proceedings under the Companies Act to hear the appeal before it cannot invalidate the order so passed.[1163]

The intention of the legislature is to abolish an intra-court appeal to the bench of two judges of the very same high court from a decision rendered by a single judge, since a litigant who files an appeal against the decree and judgment of the civil court is denied the opportunity of filing a further appeal. No prejudice will be caused to a litigant who files an appeal under a special statute also by taking away the right of intra-court appeals to a bench of two judges.[1164]

In ITC Ltd v State of Karnataka,[1165] the Supreme Court held as follows:

> Where however, the Central and the State legislation cover the same field then the Central legislation would prevail. It is also well settled that where two Acts, one passed by Parliament and the other by a State Legislature, collide and there is no question of harmonising them, then the Central legislation must prevail.

In Kulwant Kaur v Gurdial Singh Mann,[1166] the Supreme Court held as follows:

> Special or local laws would remain functional only as long as there is no specific provision to the contrary legislated by Parliament- The moment such law comes into conflict with Central legislation it becomes inapplicable and is deemed to be repealed.

It was further held:

> Incorporation of the Civil Procedure Code (Amendment) Act in the statute-book is by virtue of conferment of power under Entry 13, List III of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution. The Constitution is the parent document and is supreme which has a binding effect on all and by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution, parliamentary supremacy in regard to the adaptation of laws if within the area of operation as provided under List I or List III is recognised.

In view of the principles discussed above, it is clear that the provisions contained in section 100A of the CPC will prevail over the provisions contained in section 5(ii) of the Kerala High Court Act regarding a further appeal to a bench of two judges from the decision of a single judge. A decision rendered by single judge is to be treated as a decree, judgment or order passed by the single judge under section 3(13) (b) of the Kerala High Court Act and not as one rendered under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 or Motor Vehicles Act, 1988. There is no justification in limiting the applicability to section 100A to the appeals filed under the provisions of the CPC alone.[1167]

Undisputedly, section 100A of the CPC is a piece of legislation enacted by the competent legislature, i.e., the Parliament. The non obstante clause contained in section 100A of the CPC, as amended by 2002 Act, has the effect of taking away the right of appeal which may earlier be available either under the Letters Patent or any provision of law, including the CPC. The use of the expression "in any Letters Patent for any high court or in any other instrument having the force of law or in any other law for the time being in force" in section 100A is clearly indicative of the legislature's intention to bar Letters Patent Appeal against the judgment rendered by a single bench in an appeal arising from an original or appellate decree or order. The language of section 100A does not suggest that the exclusion of the right of appeal available under the letters patent is confined only to the matters arising under the CPC and not other enactments. Therefore, full effect deserves to be given to the legislative intendment enshrined in the non obstante clause contained in section 100A and it must be held that an appellate judgment rendered by the single bench in matters arising out of the CPC, as also other enactments, is expressly barred with effect from 1 July 2002.[1168]

A full Bench of the Kerala High Court has held that Letters Patent Appeals against judgment/decree/order passed by a single Judge of high court are not maintainable. Orders passed under O XLIII, rule 1 of the Code are to be construed as judgment or decree and cannot be assailed in Letters Patent Appeal.[1169] AS Naidu, J, speaking for the Full Bench, observed as follows:

> 45. We have already noticed that the newly incorporated s 100-A, CPC in clear and specific terms prohibits further appeal against the decree and judgment or order of a learned single Judge to a Division Bench notwithstanding anything contained in the Letters Patent. The Letters Patent which provides for further appeal to a Division Bench remains intact, but the right to prefer a further appeal is taken away even in respect of the matters arising under the special enactments or other instruments having the force of law—be it against original/appellate decree or order heard and decided by a learned single Judge. It has to be kept in mind that the special statute only provide for an appeal to the High Court. It has not made any provision for filing appeal to a Division Bench against the judgment or decree or order of a learned single Judge.[1170]

However, in writ petitions the matter stands at a different footing. In a writ application filed under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution, if any order/judgment/decree is passed in exercise of jurisdiction under Article 226, a writ appeal will lie, whereas no writ appeal will lie against judgment/order/decree passed by a single Judge exercising powers of superintendence under Article 227 of the Constitution.[1171]

An interesting question as to the maintainability of letters patent appeal arose for consideration before the Supreme Court in LIC v Nandini J Shah[1172]. In this case, an order passed by the estate officer under sections 5 and 7 of the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorised Occupants) Act, 1971 was challenged before the appellate officer under section 9 of the said Act. As per section 9, it is pertinent to note, the "appellate officer" shall be the district judge of the district, where the public premises in question is situated or such other judicial officer in that district with not less than 10 years' experience designated by the district judge for the purpose. The appellate officer upheld the order passed by the estate officer. The orders passed by the eviction officer and the appellate officer both came to be challenged before the single judge of the High Court of Bombay in a writ petition filed under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India. The said writ petition got dismissed. The said order of dismissal was challenged in a letters patent appeal filed before the Division Bench. The LIC raised the preliminary objections on maintainability of letters patent appeal. The Division Bench rejected the said preliminary objection and also allowed the appeal on merit. The decision of the Division Bench came be assailed before the Supreme Court on both counts. As regards the maintainability of letters patent appeal against the order of the single judge, it was contended that section 9, when read with sections 3, 8 and 10 of the Act, made it amply clear that jurisdiction exercised by the appellate officer (the designated judicial officer) under section 9 of the Act was in his capacity as a civil court and not as persona designata. Thus, the petition under Article 227 is the only provision under which such orders can be challenged. Even though the petition filed before single judge was labeled as one under both Articles 226 and 227, looking at the nature of it, it is clear that such a petition could have been filed and entertained only under Article 227 of the Constitution. The appellant referred to plethora of judgments to substantiate its contentions. Based on the same, it was submitted that the letters patent appeal was not maintainable against the order passed by the single judge in exercise of supervisory jurisdiction under Article 227. The Division Bench committed manifest error in entertaining it. The respondents on the other hand contended that the district judge or his designate exercises power under section 9 only as persona designata and not as a civil court and, thus, the Division Bench has not committed any error in entertaining the letters patent appeal. The Apex Court rejected the contention of the respondents and held, relying on principles laid down in earlier cases, that the appellate officer referred to in section 9 of the Act acts in his capacity as a pre-existing judicial authority. S/he, thus, acts as a court and not as a persona designata. The order passed under section 9 of the Act is an order of the subordinate court, which can be challenged by invoking the supervisory jurisdiction of the high court under Article 227 of the Constitution. The Apex Court also reiterated that order passed by the single judge in exercise of supervisory jurisdiction under Article 227 of the Constitution cannot be assailed in a letters patent appeal.

Section 173 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988 provides for an appeal against an award made by the Motor Accident Claims Tribunal under section 166 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1973. Section 54 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 provides for an appeal against the award of the reference court. Section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 provides for an appeal against an order made by the Commissioner. Similar provisions are available in other enactments for an appeal against an award or order passed by the competent authority or court. As per the high court rules, all such appeals are heard by single bench. There is no provision in these enactments under which an appeal can be preferred against the judgment rendered by the single bench in a matter arising out of an award or order made by the competent authority or court. Such appeal could be filed only under clause 15 of the Letters Patent. However, by virtue of the non obstante clause contained in section 100A, with reference to Letters Patent and all other statutory enactments, no appeal can now be maintained under clause 15 of the Letters Patent against the judgment rendered by a single bench in an appeal arising out of these enactments.[1173]

The high court is under a legal obligation, while hearing an appeal under section 173 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988, to decide all issues arising in a case both on law as well as facts after appreciating the entire evidence. The appeal under the aforesaid provision is essentially in the nature of first appeal under section 96, CPC, therefore, the high court shall dispose of the said appeal as required under O XX, rule 4 (2) read with O XLI, rule 31, CPC. The judgment passed, while disposing of such appeal, shall contain a "concise statement of the case, points for determination, decision thereon and the reasons."[1174]

A Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court has held that in the case of an order passed by a single Judge of the high court in appellate proceedings under rule 164 of the company (Court) Rules, 1959, further appeal against the said order under section 483 of the Companies Act, 1956 as also Letters Patent appeal would be barred. It was held that the words "any other law for the time being in force", used in section 100-A also covers appeal under section 483 of the Companies Act.[1175] It was observed as under:

> In view of the foregoing discussions, it is clear that even if under Section 483, there was no condition prohibiting an appeal against an order of the learned single Judge passed in Section 37(3) of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996, prohibits filing of second appeal against the appellate order passed under that Act. The expression "second appeal" has been held by the Gujarat High Court to include Letters Patent appeal. Consequently Letters Patent appeal against judgment of single judge in first appeal arising out of a proceeding under the Arbitration Act would not be maintainable.[1177]

[s 100A.11] Special Law and General Law

The question is whether section 100A inserted by Amendment Act, 1976 bars any appeal before the Division Bench under section 109(5) of the Trade and Merchandise Act, 1958 (Trade and Merchandise Act) (Now repealed by the Trade Marks Act, 1999). Apart from the fact that sub-section (8) of section 109, Trade and Merchandise Act makes the provisions of the CPC applicable to appeals under the Trade and Merchandise Act expressly "subject to the provisions of the Trade and Merchandise Act and the rules made thereunder", the Trade and Merchandise Act is a special law on the subject of trademarks whereas the CPC is a general rule of procedure. Section 97 of the Trade and Merchandise Act merely confers powers of a civil court on the Registrar of Trade Marks for the purpose of receiving evidence and for other procedural matters, but there is no indication in any provision of the Trade and Merchandise Act to make appeals under it, dependent upon their availability under the CPC. Once it is held that the Trade and Merchandise Act is a special law and CPC is a general law, the settled legal position is that a prior particular or special law is not readily held to be repealed by a later general enactment. The particular or special law deals only with a particular subject and, therefore, the reconciliation is normally possible between a prior particular Act and a later general Act, and so the particular Act is construed as an exception or qualification of the general Act.[1178]

In Nicolle v Nicolle,[1179] Lord Philimore laid down the following principles:

> It is a sound principle of all jurisprudence that a prior particular law is not easily to be held to be abrogated by a posterior law, expressed in general terms and by the apparent generality of its language applicable to and covering a number of cases, of which the particular law is but one. This, as a matter of jurisprudence, as understood in England, has been laid down in a great number of cases, whether the prior law be an express statute, or be the underlying common or customary law of the country. Where general words in a later Act are capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending it to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation, that earlier and special legislation is not to be held indirectly repealed, altered, or derogated from merely by force of such general words, without any indication of a particular intention to do so.

The above principle came to be applied by the Supreme Court in Paradip Port Trust v Their Workmen.[1180]

Section 36(4) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 provides that a party cannot be represented by a legal practitioner before a labour court or tribunal except with the consent of the other parties and with the leave of the labour court or tribunal. Section 30 of the Advocates

Act, 1961 provides that every advocate shall be entitled as of right to practise in all courts and before any tribunal. There is, therefore, an apparent conflict between the two provisions. The Supreme Court applied the aforesaid principle and held that the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 is a special statute dealing with the industrial disputes and, therefore, the prohibition contained in section 36(4) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 is not done away with by section 30 of the Advocates Act, 1961.

Thus expression "notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force" in section 100A, CPC does not take away the substantive right of appeal before the Division Bench of the high court where such right is conferred by a special law conferring an express right of such appeal against the decision of a single Judge in exercise of his appellate jurisdiction over the decision of a tribunal or a quasi-judicial authority.[1181]

In the decision of the Supreme Court in Municipal Corp of Brihanmumbai v State Bank of India,[1182] against the assessment order passed by the municipal corporation, an appeal lies before the Small Causes Court under section 217 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act. Against the decision of the Small Causes Court in such appeal, an appeal lies to the high court under section 218D of the Act. The question arose whether a further appeal could lie against the decision of a single judge in an appeal under section 218D(1) of the Act before the Division Bench of the high court under the Letters Patent. The Bombay High Court held that such an appeal before the Division Bench was barred by section 100-A of the CPC. Confirming the said decision, the Supreme Court observed as under:

> It is obvious that the appeal filed by the respondent under Section 218-D of the Act was a second appeal against the appellate order made by the Addl. Chief Judge, Small Causes Court. Under the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, no further appeal has been provided against the judgment of a learned single Judge of the High Court deciding the second appeal under Section 218-D of the Act against an appellate order of the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court passed under Section 217(1) of the Act. Section 100-A of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was introduced by the Amendment Act, 1976, specifically bars any further appeal in such cases.

This section has been introduced to minimise the delay in finality of a decision. Prior to the enactment of the above provision, under the Letters Patent, an appeal against the decision of a single judge in a second appeal was, in certain cases, held competent, though under section 100 of the CPC, there was some inhibition against interference with the findings of fact. The right of taking recourse to such an appeal has now been taken away by section 100A of the CPC. Since, an appeal under section 217(1) of the Act is a first appeal in a second forum/court and an appeal under section 218D of the Act is the second appeal in the third forum/court, no further appeal would be competent before the fourth forum/court in view of section 100A of the CPC.

This decision necessarily proceeds on the principle that in absence of any right of appeal conferred by a special statute, the provisions of section 100A of the CPC will hold the filed to bar any further appeal, notwithstanding anything contained in the Letters Patent or any such general law, but where the special Act itself provides for a further appeal against the judgment of a single judge of the high court, such appeal would not be barred by the provisions of section 100A of the CPC, notwithstanding the non-obstante clause with which the said section 100A begins.[1183]

Section 100A, CPC will not take away the Letters Patent jurisdiction of the high court, as the tribunal under the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988 is not a civil court as contemplated under the CPC. The provision contained under section 100A, CPC is applicable to only decree or order passed by a civil court, even those arising under the special enactments but not the orders passed by the tribunals. Even the use of words "notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force" does not take away the substantive right of appeal before a Division Bench of the Rajasthan High Court where such appeal is against the decision of the single judge in exercise of the appellate jurisdiction or decision of the tribunal or quasi-judicial authority.[1184]

In Kandla Export Corp v OCI Corp[1185], 93 the Supreme Court dealt with the question whether an appeal not contemplated under section 50 of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996 is maintainable under section 13(1) of the Commercial Courts, Commercial Division and Commercial Appellate Division of High Courts Act, 2015? The court answered the said question in the negative. It was held that the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996 is a self – contained code and, thus, section 50 contained therein is exhaustive as regards appealable orders. Section 50 is the only provision that provides for appeal on specified grounds in arbitration proceedings seeking enforcement of foreign awards. The appeals, which are not explicitly provided for therein, are not permissible. Section 13(1) of the Commercial Courts, Commercial Division and Commercial Appellate Division of High Courts Act, 2015 is a general provision, thus, it cannot override provision contained in the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996, which is a special law relating to arbitration. The said section 13(1) gets attracted only if the appeal is permitted under section 50 of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996 in the first place and not otherwise.

[S 101] Second appeal on no other grounds.—No second appeal shall lie except on the grounds mentioned in section 100.

A combined reading of sections 100 and 101 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC), providing the grounds for second appeal and providing further that no second appeal can be entertained on any other ground, will make it clear that the second appellate court has no jurisdiction in the matter.[1186] For example, in a particular case, in the absence of a clear error of law, even the ground of erroneous finding of facts by the lower courts by itself does not allow the high court jurisdiction in the matter.[1187] The issue relating to subsistence or otherwise of mortgage was left open to be decided later as agreed upon by counsels for both the parties. The suit was accordingly decided by the trial court. The grievances that the high court ought not to have decreed the suit since the plaintiff's right to redeem the mortgage was not adjudicated by the trial court, were expressly left open. The Hon'ble Supreme Court held that the decree passed by the high court was plainly untenable and set aside the same[1188] Thus, the high court can record proper findings, even of facts, where the lower courts findings are marked by non-consideration of relevant evidence or by an essentially erroneous approach,[1189] but in second appeal it cannot interfere with finding of fact by appellate court.[1190] The appellate court cannot partly admit and partly reject an appeal.[1191]

The mandatory requirement of section 100 cannot be obliterated by reason of a state legislature, where the requirement is not otherwise such. Hence, section 41 of the Punjab Courts Act, 1980, cannot be termed to be repugnant to section 100 and as such, cannot have its effect, since parliamentary supremacy renders section 41 of the Punjab Courts Act, 1980 devoid of any such effect. More so, by reason of the clarification rendered by the legislature in section 101 of the CPC, which provides that no second appeal shall lie except on the ground mentioned in section 100, indicating thereby the further reinforcement to the legislative intent to be obtained from section 101, as regards the issue of a substantial question of law.[1192]

[s 101.3] Second appeal or revision

The question whether a second appeal lies or whether a civil revision petition lies to the high court against the appellate order passed on an application under O XXI, rule 58, depends upon the construction of the amended provision of O XXI, rule 58. Under the provision itself, an appeal lies to the appellate court under the CPC and the question that falls for determination is, whether a second appeal also lies, which is not a right expressly conferred by the said provision. It is well-settled that even though no right of appeal is specifically conferred, yet, if a question is referred to an established court, then all incidents attached to the procedure of that court (including the right of appeal) are attracted. As such, when the right of appeal is conferred by the provision itself, i.e., O XXI, rule 58(4), there cannot be any doubt regarding the right of further appeal according to the High Court of Andhra Pradesh.[1193]

Unless the court comes to the conclusion that the appeal is a proper remedy and not revision, the withdrawal of appeal and its consequential dismissal will not merge the decree with the order of the appellate court and hence, the revision will be competent and will survive. However, if, on the other hand, the court concludes that the proper remedy was revision and not appeal, any order passed in the appeal will be without jurisdiction and inconsequential. Such an order cannot effect the pending application.[1194]

The words "Rs 1,000" were substituted for "Rs 500" by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1956 (Act 66 of 1956).

The 1976 Amendment Act substitutes the words "Rs 3,000" for the words "Rs 1000" and brings the section—in line with the sub-section (4) of section 96. Sub-section (4) of section 96 provides that no first appeal shall lie, except on a question of law, from a decree in any suit of the nature cognizable by the court of small causes when the amount or value of the subject matter of the original suit does not exceed Rs 3,000. This section, after 1976 Amendment Act, barred a second appeal even where—a question of law arose if the amount or value of the subject matter of such a suit did not exceed Rs 3000.

Now after Code of Civil Procedure Amendment Acts 1999 and 2002, no second appeal lies to the high court even on a question of law if the subject-matter of suit for recovery of money does not exceed Rs 25,000. Even first appeal is not maintainable on a question of law from the decree of small causes court, if the value of the subject-matter of the suit does not exceed Rs 10,000 as per section 96(4).

The Amending Act of 2002, substituted section 102. The amendment comes into force with effect from 1 July 2002. Section 102 was first amended by the Amending Act of 1999, however, before the same could be enforced it was again amended by the Act of 2002.

By the Amending Act of 1999, not only the value of the subject matter was sought to be raised from Rs 3,000, but also the existing restriction as to the nature and character of the suit was also sought to be done away with. In other words, according to the substituted section 102, by the Amending Act of 1999, there shall be no second appeal at all where the amount or value of the subject matter of the original suit does not exceed Rs 25,000.

In the opinion of the authors, the enhancement of the value of the subject matter from Rs 3,000 to Rs 25,000 is a step in the right direction. It keeps in view the rate of inflation in the economy and makes the provision suited to the present day's requirement. However, there are certain problems with regard to restriction as to the nature and character of the suit. The Amending Act of 1999 did not permit a second appeal against any decree when the amount or value of the subject matter of the original suit did not exceed Rs 25,000. This was a dangerous step keeping in view the provision of section 11 of the Code incorporating the rule of res judicata. It is possible that many decrees made by the courts in suits, the value of the subject matter whereof is less than Rs 25,000, may operate as res judicata even in the matters of for higher value. In this connection, it may be recalled that suits for mere permanent injunction are valued at a low figure unrelated to the value of the subject matter of the suit. This is indeed permitted by the various Court-Fees Acts. Therefore, a provision of this nature proposed may result in grave injustice in such cases.

The Law Commission in its 163rd report recommended that the amount or value of the subject matter of the original suit in section 102 be raised from Rs 25,000 to Rs 50,000. The reason for this recommendation is that generally speaking, money suits are comparatively simpler suits which are recognised and affirmed by the fact that the legislature has thought it fit to enact O XXXVII providing for summary procedure in many money suits irrespective of the monetary value thereof. The situation may be different in case of other types of suit.

The proposed removal of restriction as to the nature and character of the suits was recommended to be dropped. It may be remembered that the second appeal is not available to all points but is restricted only to substantial questions of law. In such a situation, abolition of second appeal altogether in all matters the value of subject matter whereof does not exceed Rs 25,000, may not be an appropriate step.

Keeping in view the recommendations of the Law Commission, the Amending Act of 2002 again substituted section 102 of the Code. The restrictions on second appeal on the suits of any nature when the amount of the value of the subject matter of the original suit is not exceeding Rs 25,000 is removed. The new substituted section 102 restricts second appeal only in suits of the nature of recovery of money, where the amount of the value of the subject matter of the original suit is not exceeding Rs 25,000. The suits of all other kinds are subject to second appeal provided the provisions of section 100 are complied with.

[s 102.2] Aim of law

The aim of the law is clearly to curtail litigation, which has assumed high proportions, and people are litigating over trifle matters to the highest court leaving no time with the courts to devote to important issues. With this aim in sight by 1976 amendment, the second appeals were limited on the point of "substantial question of law" only. Again, by section 102, CPC, by present amendment, right of second appeals have been taken away in certain class of cases. Therefore, policy of law is to minimise the second appeals and the second appeal cannot be accepted for the reason that the right accrued prior to the amendment was enforced. Even if the right accrued, the court will take the view in accordance with the policy of law that the right of appeals should be curtailed.[1196]

The Supreme Court has held that the purpose behind enacting section 102 is to reduce the quantum of litigation so that courts may not have to waste time where the stakes are meagre and not of much consequence. It was further held that to avail advantage of the provisions of section 102, the subject matter of the original suit should only be recovery of money and that too not exceeding Rs 25,000. If the subject matter of the suit is anything other than recovery of money or something more than recovery of money, the provisions of section 102 cannot be invoked. In the instant matter though the amount sought to be recovered was only Rs 11,006.07, the consequences of the final outcome of the litigation were far reaching. Nevertheless, the court held that as the original suit was not only for recovery of money, but also for a declaration and permanent injunction, the provisions of section 102 could not have been applied and the matter was therefore remanded back to the high court.[1197]

Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 is not relevant.

The first reason being that it is not a case of repeal, and on the other hand section 102, CPC has been substituted by the Amending Act and the said section 6 may not be applicable to the same. Apart from this, clause (c) protects any right, privilege, obligation or liability. It cannot be interpreted to include the right to file repeal or revision. Clause (e) also does not protect the right of institution of a proceeding under the repealed Act.

It is an established principle that procedural law can be amended with retrospective effect and will also apply to pending cases. Therefore, the right of second appeal could be taken away with retrospective effect in pending cases also.[1198]

From the perusal of this provision, it is clear that the pending appeals and the appeals which have been admitted before the commencement of section 102 only have been saved from the mischief of section 102. Therefore, the legislative intent is clear that the right to appeal accrued prior to the enforcement has not been saved.[1199]

[s 102.4] Filing of Second appeal after 30 June 2002

The question, therefore, is whether there is anything in the Amendment Act which takes away the vested rights of the plaintiff to take the matter in second appeal, as on the date of the filing of the suit, he had that right. Section 16(2)(a) of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 2002, reads as follows:

> The provisions of Section 102 of the principal Act as substituted by Section 5 of this Act, shall not apply to or affect any appeal which had been admitted before the commencement of Section 5; and every such appeal shall be disposed of as if Section 5 had not come into force.

Therefore, by necessary intendment, the amendment has taken away the vested right of the plaintiff to file a second appeal on and after the commencement of the Amendment Act.[1200]

Restriction brought by section 102 is only from 1 July 2002.[1201]

In Haryana Dairy Development Co-op Federation Ltd v Jagdish Lal,[1202] the Supreme Court came heavily on the practice of filing special leave petition (SLP) against the order passed in second appeal by the high courts in trivial matters. In the instant case, an amount of Rs 8724 is to be paid to the respondent employee as reimbursement of his medical claim and the petitioner came up to the Supreme Court to deny the said claim. While dismissing the SLP, the court observed that in spite of the fact that Parliament has amended the CPC altering the provisions of section 102 providing that money recovery suit involving less than Rs 25,000 shall not be entertained in the second appeal, the court is burdened with such cases.

[s 102.5] Admitted appeals

The question arises whether any appeal which was pending on 1 July 2002 will be governed by the aforesaid section 102 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 2002, under section 16 provides for repeal and savings. The relevant provision is section 16(2)(a), which reads as under:

> 16(2) Notwithstanding that the provisions of this Act have come into force or repeal under sub-section (1) has taken effect, and without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1887— (a) the provisions of section 102 of the principal Act as substituted by section 5 of this Act, shall not apply to or affect any appeal which had been admitted before the commencement of section 5; and every such appeal shall be disposed of as if section 5 had not come into force.

The aforesaid clause provides that the appeals which are pending on 1 June 2002 and already admitted before commencement of section 5 (substitution of section 102) are to be disposed of as if section 5 has not come into force. The word "admitted" is not used in the CPC. In O XLI under the heading "Procedure on admission of appeal", rule 9 onwards up to rule 37, are given.[1203]

Though under rule 11 word "admit" is not used but when this rule is seen with section 100 and O XLII of CPC, the position becomes clear.[1204] To appreciate section 100(4), it is necessary to read O XLII, rule 2 of the CPC.[1205]

A bare reading of section 16 (2)(a) of the CPC (Amendment) Act, 2002 (Act 22 of 2002) would show that the provision saves such appeals from the bar created by section 102 of the Code wherein the subject matter of the suit for recovery of money is not more than Rs 25,000/- only if such appeals have been admitted before the effective date of the amendment. Thus, appeals not yet admitted but listed for admission would not be saved from the bar.[1206]

The Amendment introduced in 2002 is not retrospective in operation and therefore would not be applicable to appeals pending on 1 July 2002. Thus, where a second appeal for a sum of Rs 10,000/- was pending since 1994, its maintainability would not be affected by the amendment.[1207]

[s 102.6] This Section bars appeal in money suits only

What is postulated by the section is that subject-matter of the original suit should be one for recovery of money. In such cases alone, the bar applies. If the suit is one for injunction, coupled with a claim for recovery of articles as well as for recouping loss suffered, the bar under section 102 is not attracted.[1208] Section creates an absolute bar that no second appeal will lie in the cases dealing with execution of money decree not extending the amount of Rs. 25000.[1209]

[s 102.7] Suits cognizable by Courts of Small Causes

Whether a suit is or is not cognizable by a court of small causes, is to be determined in the light of the provisions of the Provincial Small Cause Courts 1887 (see sections 15, 16 and 27).

If a suit is of the nature cognizable by a small cause court, and the value of the subject-matter of the suit does not exceed Rs 500, now Rs 25,000, no second appeal will lie, though the suit has not been tried in a small cause court, or though the small cause court returns the plaint under section 23 of the said Act to be presented to another court on the ground that it involves a question of title and is not, therefore, cognizable by that court. The reason is that it is the nature of the suit, and not the court in which it is tried, that determines the right of appeal.[1210] The words "any suit of the nature cognizable by courts of small causes" mean any suit relating to a subject-matter over which a court of small causes would have jurisdiction if the claim were within the pecuniary limits of its jurisdiction.[1211] In determining whether a second appeal lies under this section, the original character of the suit is to be regarded rather than the character it may subsequently assume by operation of the findings of the court.[1212] Regard should not be had to the mode of trial of the suit. Thus, a suit which is cognizable by a court of small causes is nonetheless so because instead of being tried under the summary procedure it has been tried in the ordinary manner.[1213] In applying this section it makes no difference that the decree sought to be appealed from was passed by the lower appellate court in review.[1214] In a particular case, suit cognizable by a small cause court was decreed by a first class subordinate judge in his small cause court jurisdiction and it was transferred for execution against immovable property to his regular jurisdiction. The order passed on an objection to attachment was appealable to the district judge by virtue of the provisions of section 42 above, as execution was in the regular jurisdiction, but no second appeal lay as the suit was of the nature cognizable by a court of small causes.[1215] When a claim is partly within the jurisdiction of the regular court and partly within the jurisdiction of small cause courts, the plaintiff is entitled to consolidate both and file a suit in the regular court.[1216] Whether a second appeal lies under the section must be decided with reference to the nature of the suit as originally brought, and not to the valuation in the appeal.[1217]

It has been held by the Chhattisgarh High Court that it is the nature of the suit as disclosed in the plaint which is the determining factor for the application of section 102 of the Code. Merely because the pecuniary jurisdiction of small causes court having been curtailed, the nature of the suit remains one triable by a small cause court. Therefore, a suit for the recovery of Rs 2000/- is not excepted in the second schedule of the Provincial Small Causes Courts Act, 1887.[1218] It is the character of the suit as originally framed and presented which would determine the nature of the subject-matter of the original suit within the meaning of section 102 of the Code.[1219]

[s 102.8] Suit for mesne profits

Section 15 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887 gives jurisdiction to courts of small causes to take cognizance of all suits of a civil nature of which the value does not exceed that specified in that section except such suits as are set out in the second schedule to that Act. The said schedule consists of several articles of which Article 31 is the most important for the purposes of the present section. That article excludes from the jurisdiction of small causes courts "any other suit for an account including ... a suit for the profits of immovable property belonging to the plaintiff which have been wrongfully received by the defendant." This article contemplates cases in which the plaintiff claims an account of moneys which the defendant has received. The plaintiff is entitled to such an account as the moneys received belonged to him. It has been held by a majority of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court that a suit for mesne profits does not fall under this article, in other words, it is cognizable by small cause courts. Such a suit is not a suit "for the profits of immovable properties belonging to the plaintiff which have been wrongfully received by the defendant." A suit for mesne profits is a suit for damages in which the defendant is liable even if no profits have been actually received by him during the period of dispossessions as defined in sub-section 12 of section 2 of the CPC, mesne profits are profits which the person in wrongful possession of such property actually received or might with ordinary diligence have received therefrom.[1220]

On the other hand, it has been held by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court,[1221] that a suit for mesne profits does come within Article 31 of the said Act, and is, therefore, not cognizable by a small cause court.

Bombay decisions are difficult to reconcile but the general effect of them is that a suit for mesne profits is a "suit for the profits of immovable property belonging to the plaintiff which have been wrongfully received by the defendant" within the meaning of Article 31,[1222] but, that it does not come within the said article if the amount claimed is an ascertained sum so that no account has to be taken.[1223]

[s 102.9] Suit for rent

A suit for the rent of agricultural land is excepted from the jurisdiction of a small causes court unless expressly invested with such jurisdiction by the local government. If the court is so invested, it exercises the jurisdiction not as a small causes court but because of its special jurisdiction. The section, therefore, does not apply and a second appeal lies.[1224] But the contrary view has been taken in the undermentioned cases.[1225]

[s 102.10] Suit for title

A small causes court has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for title relating to immovable property. However, a suit, which is otherwise cognizable by a small cause court does not cease to be so merely because it incidentally involves a question of title.[1226]

[s 102.11] Suit for declaration

A small cause court has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for a declaratory decree. However, the mere fact, that there is a prayer for a declaration will not prevent a suit from being cognizable by a small cause court, if the other reliefs claimed in the suit could be obtained without asking for a declaration.[1227]

[s 102.12] Suit to enforce a call

Under section 457 of the Companies Act, 1956 no claim founded on the liability of a contributory is cognizable by a small causes court. A second appeal, therefore, lies in a suit against a shareholder to enforce a call for unpaid capital even though the claim is less than Rs 500.[1228]

[s 102.13] Execution

The expression "suit" in this section includes execution proceedings,[1229] from which it follows that if a suit is cognizable by a small causes court, no second appeal will lie from an order made in execution of the decree passed in the suit unless the value of the suit exceeds Rs 500, (now Rs 25,000). It is immaterial that the order in execution is made by a court other than a small causes court or a court vested with the powers of a small causes court, as where the property attached in execution of the decree is immovable property and the order in execution is made by a first class subordinate judge in his ordinary jurisdiction. The test lies in determining the nature of the suit in which the decree is sought to be executed was passed, and not the nature of the proceedings in execution.[1230] It is also immaterial that the amount sought to be recovered in execution exceeds Rs 500, (now Rs 25,000). For the test is not the amount claimed in execution proceedings but the amount of the subject-matter of the suit.[1231] An order of remand made by an appellate court in an appeal from an order of the court executing a decree in a suit cognizable by a small causes court is also not appealable.[1232]

Where the plaintiff decree-holder applied under O XXI, rule 71, to recover Rs 360 which was the deficiency of price from a defaulting purchaser, and both the lower courts disallowed the plaintiff's claim, it was held that no second appeal lay to the high court. The reason given being that but for the provisions of rule 71, a suit would have to be filed for that amount, in which case it would have been a small causes court suit, and the application, therefore, must be treated as one made in execution of a small causes court decree.[1233]

[s 102.14] Conversion of second appeal into revision—permissibility

To appreciate plea of permission to convert the appeal into civil revision, it is necessary to consider the relevant provisions for necessary contents in memorandum of second appeal and memo of revision. As per sub-rule (2) of rule 1 of O XLI, memorandum of appeal shall set forth, concisely and under distinct heads the grounds of objection to the decree appealed from without any argument or narrative; and such grounds shall be numbered consecutively. In second appeal, memorandum of appeal shall concisely set forth substantial question of law involved in appeal. In the aforesaid circumstances, the contents for memorandum of appeal in second appeal are based on different requirements, while the memorandum of revision has to contend the facts of the case and specific averments that the court either have exercised jurisdiction not vested in it by law or have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, or have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, without such averments in memo of revision it will be incomplete, and the revisional court may not entertain a revision. In the circumstances, memo of appeal and memo of revision are based on different requirements. In the circumstances, memo of appeal cannot be treated as a memo of revision. Similar is the position under O XLI, rule 3 of the CPC. If the memorandum of appeal is not drawn up in the manner prescribed under rule 1 of O XLI, CPC, it shall be rejected or returned to the appellant for the purpose of being amended within a time to be fixed by the court or be amended then and there. In the circumstances, it will not be just and proper to convert the memorandum of appeal into revision. However, appellants who had filed appeal much before of the amendment in section 102, CPC, can be permitted to withdraw this appeal with liberty to file a revision or other proceeding as they choose in accordance with law. If the appellants find that the order is revisable as per section 115, CPC, they may file such a revision before the court by taking all the grounds as required for revision, by drafting appropriate memorandum of revision within a period specified. In the abovesaid peculiar circumstances their revision will not be dismissed on the ground of limitation and will be heard and decided in accordance with law. But the appeal cannot be permitted to convert into civil revision.[1234]

In the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 2002 there is no such provision directing refund of court-fee. Even in the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999, section 34 inserted a new section 16 in the Court Fees Act, 1870, in which the refund of court-fee is provided only in case the court refers the parties to the suit to any one of the mode of settlement of dispute referred to in section 89 of the CPC the plaintiff shall be entitled to a certificate from the court authorising him to receive back from the Collector, the full amount of the fee paid in respect of such plaint, but no such provision has been made when the appeal is held to be not maintainable. In the circumstances, the provision of Court Fees Act, 1870 can be seen. The refund of court-fee is envisaged in sections 13, 14 and 15 of the Court Fees Act, 1870. Under section 13 of this Act, the refund of court fees of memorandum of appeal can be ordered in the circumstances when an appeal or plaint, which has been rejected by the lower court on any of the grounds mentioned in the CPC, is ordered to be received or if a suit is remanded in appeal, on any of the grounds mentioned in section 35 (now O XLI, rule 23 of the Code) of the same Code, for a second decision by the lower Court, the appellate court is authorised to grant the appellant a certificate for refund. Section 14 provides refund of court-fee on application for review of judgment and section 15 provides for refund of court-fee where the court reverses or modifies its former decision on the ground of mistake. But the right of appeal which was available prior to 1 June 2002 has been taken away by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 2002 without making any such provision of refund of court-fee. In the circumstances, prayer made by for refund of court-fee cannot be accepted.[1235]

By the Uttar Pradesh Act 24 of 1954, the words "Rs 2,000" were substituted for the words "Rs 500." It has been held that this amendment is not affected by the subsequent amendment made by the Central Civil Procedure Code Amendment Act 66 of 1956, and that no second appeal lies, if the valuation of the suit did not exceed Rs 2,000.[1236] The state amendment has no relevance now in view of the value having been enhanced by the new amendment.

[s 103.1] Changes in the section

The changes are best seen by setting out here the section as it stood before its amendment.

In any second appeal, the high court may, if the evidence on the record is sufficient, determine any issue of fact necessary for the disposal of the appeal which has not been determined by the lower appellate court or which has been wrongly determined by such court by reason of any illegality, omission, error or defect such as is referred to in sub-section (1) of section 100.

The following judgment may be looked in to determine the position prior to amendment.[1238]

Under this section, before its amendment in 1976, the high court in second appeal had the power to determine issues of fact (1) where such issues had not been determined by the lower appellate court; or (2) where they had been wrongly determined by that court provided the evidence on record was sufficient to enable the high court to determine such issues. The expression "wrongly determined" meant wrongly determined by reason of any illegality, omission, error or defect in procedure. If the evidence on record was not sufficient, the proper course was to refer such issues for trial under O XLI, rule 25. In view of the restrictions placed on the power of the high court in second appeals by the new section 100, this section has been correspondingly altered and restructured, so as to formulate it in two clauses, i.e., (a) and (b). The words "of fact" after the words "any issue" in the main part of the section are dropped, though the marginal note of the section still retains the words "issue of fact." The fact that the section itself has dropped the words "of fact" and simply speaks of "any issue" indicates that the words "any issue" mean any issue of fact or of law. The jurisdiction of the high court to decide a question of fact not determined by the lower appellate court is confined to evidence on record which is sufficient to determine such question of fact necessary for disposal of the appeal. It does not extend to the appreciation of additional evidence being led before it—a function which is more appropriately performed by the lower courts.[1239]

Section 103, authorises the high court to determine any issue which is necessary for the disposal of the appeal provided the evidence on it is sufficient, in any of the following two situations (1) when that issue has not been determined both by the trial court as well as the lower appellate court or by the lower appellate court, or (2) when both the trial court as well as the lower appellate court have wrongly determined issue on a substantial question of law which can properly be the subject matter of second appeal under section 100 of Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC).[1240]

A bare perusal of section 103 of CPC makes it clear that this section appears to be proviso and Explanation to section 100 of CPC and empowers the high court to determine any issue on two contingencies:

(i) when determination of such issue is necessary for the disposal of the appeal and the evidence on record is sufficient and yet it has not been decided by the trial Court or by the lower appellate courts; or

(ii) when an issue has been wrongly determined either by the trial Court or by the lower appellate court or by both the Courts by reason of a decision on substantial question of law.[1241]

If, in a case, on the issues on account of its erroneous approach the first appellate court did not determine the relevant issues, the high court was well within its jurisdiction in recording the afore-mentioned findings of fact for which the evidence was on record as section 103 of the CPC empowered the high court to determine such issues of fact.[1242]

Where a finding is based on misappreciation of oral and documentary evidence on record, it is not binding in second appeal. For example, a plaintiff asserted customary right of irrigation but the lower appellate court failed to appreciate the principles regarding such a right and hence, could not consider evidence on record in the correct background. The case was remanded.[1243]

A suit was filed for injunction against the defendant by three plaintiffs. The dispute was regarding the land title. The court found plaintiff no 1 in possession of the land, but in view of amendment of plaint in suit for injunction, plaintiff no 1 was found to be an agent of plaintiff no 3. It was held that there was no error of law. The jurisdiction of the high court could not be exercised in second appeal.[1244]

A high court cannot set aside a finding of the first appellate court, as to limitation, where questions of fact are involved in second appeal.[1245]

A finding of partition based on detailed consideration of legal evidence on record cannot be altered in second appeal. The high court cannot reappraise the evidence and substitute its own conclusion on a fact in lieu of that reached by the trial court and the first appellate court.[1246]

For instance, a suit for declaration of title was dismissed by the trial court but decreed by the first appellate court, which, in doing so, ignored material evidence. The findings of fact so arrived at, were not considered binding in second appeal.[1247] In another case, the findings of the lower court were that the landlord, who was a foreigner, intended to come back to India and settle in Calcutta, but was not in a position to do so for want of accommodation and would reasonably require the suit premises for such accommodation. These were findings of fact. They were not shown to be based on no evidence or to be palpably unreasonable. Hence, they could not be interfered with under section 110.[1248]

A plea of part performance can be taken for the first time in first appeal, provided the sufficient and necessary facts have been placed on the basis of which plea of part performance could be legitimately raised.[1249] For instance, a delay in filing an appeal by a railway board cannot be excused merely on the ground that it had to defend too many suits. In any case, it does not stand in a privileged position in regard to limitation.[1250]

Where the plaintiff claims a declaration of his right to the trees under dispute, the burden is not wholly the plaintiff's to prove, as a primary fact crucial to the claim, that he had sown and grown the trees and he had, therefore, right to the trees. The concurrent findings of the courts below that the plaintiff had failed to prove that he had sown and grown the trees entitling him to a right therein, would be final and conclusive. The high court cannot in such a case, interfere with the findings in second appeal.[1251]

A certified copy of the sale deed was admitted by the trial court, as the original had been lost. It was held that there was no reasonable ground to assail the admissibility of the document in appeal.[1252]

A question that the first appellate court was not competent to entertain an appeal against an order of the trial court dismissing a suit for default is a question of law. It goes to the root of the case. It can be disposed of on the materials on record. The second appellate court cannot be debarred from entertaining it.[1253]

The finding of a court that the money was advanced as loan is a finding on question of fact. The high court cannot interfere with it in the second appeal when it was not vitiated by any error of law. A high court cannot re-appreciate the evidence and find out what is the weight of evidence on a particular point.[1254]

Under section 103, the high court in a second appeal can determine: (a) issues which have not been determined by the lower appellate court; or (b) issues not determined both, by the court of first instance and the lower appellate court. This can be done, only when there is sufficient evidence on record for the purpose of pronouncing a judgment.[1255]

As the section empowers the high court to decide an issue of fact where it has not been determined by the lower courts,[1256] it is inconceivable that the high court would not have the power to determine an issue of law which has been left undetermined by the lower appellate court or by both the lower appellate courts and the court of first instance. Since interference by the high court in second appeals is now restricted to questions which are substantial questions of law under the amended section 100, the latter part of this section has been correspondingly altered and the words "by reason of any illegality, omission, error or defect" in procedure are omitted. No question would henceforth arise on the ground of any issue having been wrongly determined by reason of any illegality or defect or omission in procedure. The decision in such cases of the lower appellate court is made final even if it has been determined in a manner contrary to the procedure. This is so because under the new clause (b), a wrong determination can be challenged in second appeal, provided it is a decision on such question of law as is referred to in the amended section 100.

The high court is certainly entitled to go into the question as to whether the findings of the facts recorded by the first appellate court, which was the final court of facts, were vitiated in the eyes of law on account of non-consideration of admissible evidence of vital nature. It may do so after setting aside the findings of facts on the ground that the court had either to remand the matter to the first appellate court for a re-hearing of the first appeal and decision in accordance with law after taking into consideration the entire relevant evidence on the record, or it may in the alternative, decide the case finally in accordance with the provisions of section 103 (b) of the CPC.[1257]

[s 103.3] This Section and Section 102

For the purpose of section 102 the nature of the suit matters. The fact that it was tried on the regular side is immaterial.[1258] Section 103 is attracted only if a specific issue is raised, there is sufficient evidence on record thereon and that issue remains undecided (or is wrongly decided) by the trial or lower appellate court. When, in a case of injunction, alleging interference by the defendant with the plaintiff's possession of suit property, though there is evidence of commission, omission etc. of the defendant, there is no specific issue framed in view of the defendant's commitment of leaving no intention of such interference. Therefore, there is no question of the high court deciding the issue in terms of section 103.[1259]

[s 103.4] Waiver and estoppel

Although the expression "waiver" is freely and frequently used in the field of law, the principle governing it is often misunderstood and the term is confused with "estoppel". Waiver differs from estoppel in the sense that it is contractual and is an agreement to release or not to assert a right whereas estoppel is a rule of evidence. An objection to jurisdiction cannot be waived.[1260]

[s 103.5] Matter should be examined as a whole

Injustum est nisi tota lege inspecta, de una aliqua ejus particula proposita judicare vel respondere. It is unjust to decide or respond to any particular part of a law without examining the whole of it.[1261] This may be further explained by the maxim.

Festinatio justitiae est noverea informateeni which means hasty justice is the stepmother of misfortune. Before reversing a finding of fact of the trial court, the first appellate court must consider all the reasons given by the trial court for coming to a different conclusion.[1262]

[s 103.6] Change in law

A change in the law has to be taken into account while an appeal is pending. If the new law, by its express language or clear intendment, takes in even pending matters, the trial court as well as appellate court may give effect to such a law, even after the judgement of the court of first instance.[1263] Although a high court can take notice of changes in the law, the right obtained by a party under decree should not be allowed to be defeated by delay, if it is possible to save the decree by moulding it to conform to the statutes subsequently coming into play.[1264] Where the high court does not examine the facts of the case in light of the laws prevailing at the time of the sales, such a matter can be interfered with under section 103 of the CPC.

[s 103.7] Determining question of fact

In second appeal by landlord, the high court modified the judgment of the first appellate court confirming the judgment and decree of the trial court and decreed the suit of the landlord for eviction of the tenant from the suit accommodation in view of findings that averments made in the application made by the landlord under section 13(6) of the Act remained unrebutted and uncontroverted and recorded the finding that the rent remained unpaid during the pendency of the appeal. As on both the issues relating to clauses (a) and (o),[1265] on account of its erroneous approach, the first appellate court did not determine the relevant issues, the high court, in second appeal, was well within its jurisdiction in recording the afore-mentioned findings of fact for which the evidence was on record as section 103 of the CPC empowers the high court to determine such issues of fact.[1266]

In an appeal filed against the decision of learned district judge remanding back the matter to the trial court for fresh consideration on the basis of material evidence present on record. The trial court has passed the decree of ejectment in favour of the respondent. The high court held that there is no need to interfere with the decree of ejectment passed by the trial court and there is no need for fresh consideration. Ownership of the plaintiff was admitted and the defendant was aware about that and the defendant was licensee of the property and thus the impugned judgment suffers from illegality and devoid of merit. Thus, set aside and that of trial court is restored.[1267]

In a suit for declaration filed by the plaintiff, it was claimed that the plaintiff was senior to defendants and that the promotion of defendants was illegal. The defendant-corporation took the plea that promotion was as per merit-cum-seniority basis. The issue as to mode/manner of promotion was not framed in the suit at any stage and the question, though vital for the determination of the controversy, was not decided even in second appeal. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court remanded the matter to the high court to re-hear the matter and decide the aforesaid question.[1268] Laying emphasis on the importance of the mode of promotion, AK Ganguly, J speaking for the Bench observed as follows:

> 8. The Court is of the opinion that the principle of Merit-cum-Seniority and that of Seniority-cum-Merit are two totally different principles. The principle of Merit-cum-Seniority puts greater emphasis on merit and ability and where promotion is governed by this principle seniority plays a less significant role. However, seniority is to be given weightage when merit and ability more or less are equal among the candidates who are to be promoted. On the other hand, insofar as the principle of seniority-cum-merit is concerned it gives greater importance to seniority and promotion to a senior person cannot be denied unless the person concerned is found totally unfit on merit to discharge the duties of the higher post. The totality of the service of the employee has to be considered for promotion on the basis of Seniority-cum-Merit.[1269]

Section 103 deals with the power of the high court to determine issues of fact. A suit was filed for specific performance of an agreement of reconveyance of land. There was non-incorporation of "readiness and willingness" clause in the pleadings as required by law and the entire consideration for reconveyance was deposited by the plaintiff in court on the date of suit. An amendment to incorporate such a clause in the plaint was allowed on consent of parties. No objection was taken, in the memorandum of appeal, that the defendant's advocate had not given consent. The first appellate court set aside the order allowing amendment. A second appeal was filed which succeeded. The decree passed by the lower appellate court was set aside and the decree for specific performance passed by the trial court was restored by the high court.[1270] agreement was held to be a license. It was there also before the lower appellate court but it was not adjudicated upon. When the core issue is not adjudicated upon, it results in a substantial question of law under section 100, CPC.[1271]

[s 103.8] Core issue

Although the core issue of tenancy arose before the first appellate court the same was not adjudicated upon and in the circumstances, the high court was right in invoking section 103, CPC.[1272] In the case of Santosh Hazari v Purushottam Tiwari,[1273] it has been held that whether a question of law is a substantial question of law in a case will depend on facts and circumstances of each case, the paramount consideration being the need to strike a balance between obligation to do justice and necessity to avoid prolongation of any dispute. In that matter, the Supreme Court found that an important issue had arisen for determination before the first appellate court whether dependent had made out the case of adverse possession and whether the suit filed by the plaintiff was liable to be dismissed as barred by time under Article 65 of the Limitation Act, 1963, which issue was decided by a cryptic order passed by the first appellate court, and in the circumstances, the Supreme Court took the view that failure to decide the core issue gives rise to a substantial question of law.

[s 103.9] Concurrent findings

Concurrent findings recorded by the trial court and the first appellate court cannot be interfered with in second appeal by wrongly attributing perversity to the findings where the findings are amply supported by reasons.[1274] Where the attitude of lower courts about the non-existence of tenancy is not found to be perverse, the high court cannot set aside the finding in second appeal.[1275]

In a concurrent finding of fact, whereas recorded on the basis of the commissioner's plan and report that water from a stream was not diverted into the well, it was held that being a concurrent finding, it would not be interfered with in the second appeal.[1276]

It has been reiterated that interference in second appeal is not permissible unless such findings are based on no evidence or are perverse where there are concurrent findings of the courts below on a pure question of fact.[1277]

A concurrent finding of fact based on a discussion of evidence that there was no unity of title and possession in favour of the plaintiff cannot be disturbed in second appeal.[1278] Similarly, a finding of the trial court that the tenant had not tendered the rent and, therefore, there was a consequent default for the purpose of Bihar Rent Act, 1947 cannot be re-opened in second appeal.[1279] Finding of the lower court that the marriage had broken down irretrievably and should be dissolved under section 2(ix) of the Dissolution of Muslim Marriages Act, 1939 cannot be also interfered with in second appeal.[1280]

[s 103.10] Non-examination of plaintiff

However, where the plaintiff was not examined and there was no cogent explanation for the non-examination, the matter will fall under section 103(b) of the CPC. Such a finding of fact which has been wrongly determined by both the courts below by reason of a decision on a question of law as is referred to in section 100, can definitely be looked into by the high court in exercise of its power under section 103 read with section 100 of the CPC.[1281]

[s 103.11] Plea for first time in second appeal

In a suit for eviction, the tenant did not controvert ending of tenancy month on the last day of the calendar month either in his reply to the notice or in the two courts below. It was held that the high court could not permit the tenant in the second appeal to challenge that basis and try the issue of fact itself.[1282]

The question of legal necessity is purely a question of fact. Where specific grounds affecting the validity of a sale have been pleaded at the stage of trial, but the absence of legal necessity has not been pleaded, the parties cannot raise a stand on the question of legal necessity for the first time in appeal. The appellate court cannot allow such a plea to be raised before it for the first time without the same having been advanced in the pleadings.[1283]

[s 103.12] Reopening of Issue

In a suit for specific performance of a contract of sale, the trial court found that possession had not been delivered. However, the lower appellate court wrongly assumed that the trial court had found that the possession had been delivered. It was held that the high court in second appeal could reopen the issue as the decision of the first appellate court was obviously wrong.[1284]

[s 103.13] Bhumiswami

In a particular case the finding of the appellate court that the suit land was mortgaged by the defendant was not based on evidence, as it was the plaintiff who was recorded as "Bhumiswami" in respect of the land and the defendant was never recorded as Bhumiswami in relation to it. Secondly, as regards findings of adverse possession of defendants for more than 12 years, no material was pointed out to show that the defendant was in adverse possession. It was held that the findings could not be sustained in law.[1285]

[s 103.14] Executing Court

The question whether appellants were only liable to pay decretal amount was not considered to be subject matter of a suit under O XXI, rule 63 and it was not allowed to be raised in second appeal in that suit. The courts felt it should have been raised before the executing court.[1286]

[s 104.1] Section to be read as a whole

Section 104 has to be read as a whole. Merely reading sub-clause (2) by ignoring the saving clause in sub-section (1) would lead to a conflict between the two sub-clauses. Read as a whole and on well-established principles of interpretation it is clear that sub-clause (2) can only apply to appeals not saved by sub-clause (1) of section 104. The finality provided by sub-clause (2) only attaches to orders passed in appeal under section 104, i.e., for those orders against which 1288. Inserted by Act 9 of 1922, section 3.

1289. Inserted by Act 104 of 1976, section 41 (w.e.f. 1-2-1977).

an appeal under "any other law for the time being in force" is not permitted, section 104(2) would not thus bar a Letters Patent Appeal.[1290]

[s 104.2] Section 100, Section 104 and O XLIII, Rule 1

See matter under the same heading in section 100.

[s 104.3] Appealable order

This section and O XLIII, rule 1, contain a full list of appealable orders. The words, "save as otherwise expressly provided in the body of this Code or by any law for the time being in force", were added in 1908.[1291]

The right of appeal given under clauses (ff), (g) and (h) is independent of the one conferred by O XLIII, rule 1, under clause (i) and is not controlled by it.[1292] Order XLIII, rule 1 provides for an appeal from certain orders under the provisions of section 104, CPC. Thus, appeals under O XLIII, rule 1 are appeals under the provisions of section 104.[1293]

In a case relating to religious trust under section 92 of the Code permission to sell the property of the Math was sought which was accorded by the district judge. An appeal against the said order granting permission was filed before high court. The appeal was dismissed by the high court on the ground that the appellant had no locus standi as he was a stranger to the said application. It was held by the high court that the appellant was in-charge of another Math and as such cannot be said to be person who is not aggrieved.[1294]

[s 104.4] Special Statutes

By reason of section 104 of the CPC, the bar of appeal under a special statute is saved. A plain reading of section 104 would show that an appeal shall lie from an appealable order and no other order save as otherwise expressly provided in the body of this Code of or by any law for the time being in force. Section 104 of the CPC merely recognises appeals provided under special statute. It does not create a right of appeal as such. It does not, therefore, bar any further appeal also, if the same is provided for under any other Act, for the time being in force. Whenever the statute provides such a bar it is so expressly stated, as would appear from section 100A of the CPC.[1295]

Sub-section (2) of section 104 of the CPC provides that no appeal shall lie from any order passed in appeal under "this Section". This also shows that if appeal is provided for under any other law, section 104 of the CPC would have no application.[1296]

[s 104.5] From no other order

An order which amounts to a decree within section 2(2) does not fall within this section and is open to appeal under section 96. Thus, an order pronouncing abatement of a suit is a decree and is, therefore, appealable under section 96.[1297] However, where it is not a decree within section 2(2), no appeal lies against it except as provided in this section. The following orders have thus been held to be not appealable:

(i) an order under O I, rule 3, holding that the suit is bad for multifariousness and asking the plaintiff to elect;[1298]

(ii) an order holding that the court has jurisdiction to try the cause;[1299]

(iii) an order appointing a commissioner to ascertain mesne profits;[1300]

(iv) an order under O XXXVII, rule 3, granting, or refusing to grant, leave to defend;[1301]

(v) an order made in execution proceedings on objection raised by the judgment-debtor under O XXI, rule 90;[1302]

(vi) an order passed under section 151, since such an order is not included in the category of appealable orders;[1303]

(vii) an order disposing of a miscellaneous appeal.[1304]

(viii) Interlocutory order passed under O XXII, rule 10 in a revision, substituting party in execution proceedings.[1305]

(ix) Order declining to review the final order passed by single judge in writ proceedings.[1306]

(x) Order granting or rejecting injunction.[1307]

(xi) Interlocutory order in civil miscellaneous appeal under section 104 of the CPC.[1308]

Clauses (a)–(f) have been annulled by the Arbitration Act, 1940 (Now repealed by the Arbitration & Conciliation Act, 1996). They were:

(a) an order superseding an arbitration where the award has not been completed within the period allowed by the court;

(b) an order on an award stated in the form of a special case;

(c) an order modifying or correcting an award;

(d) an order filing or refusing to file an agreement to refer to arbitration;

(e) an order staying or refusing to stay a suit where there is an agreement to refer to arbitration;

(f) an order filing or refusing to file an award in an arbitration without the intervention of the court.

[s 104.7] Clause (ff)

This clause was inserted in the section by Act 9 of 1922. (See the proviso to sub-section (1)).

[s 104.8] Clause (ffa)

This clause has been added in the section by the Amendment Act, 1976 to incorporate consequential changes in view of the amendments effected in sections 91 and 92.

[s 104.9] Clause (h)

An appeal lies from an order of arrest before judgment.[1309]

[s 104.10] Clause (i)

Section 104 of the CPC has to be read in juxtaposition with O XLIII of the Code. While section 104 provides for appeal from orders passed under the Code, rule 1 of the O XLIII enumerates those orders from which an appeal lies. Explaining the ambit of section 104 of the Code, a Full Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court observed as follows:

> 33. Section 104, on the other hand, is neither, general, not residuary in nature. It is only those orders, which answer the descriptions contained in its class, that are appealable under it. Section 104, as it stands now, provides for appeals against five categories of orders. There is no dispute that an order under Rule 158 does not fall into clauses (ff), (ffa), (g), and (h). An effort can certainly be made to bring it within the purview of clause (i) of sub-section (1), since it is an order made under a Rule. This effort would certainly have been successful, had the clause been "any order made under Rules", without anything further. The subsequent part of the clause, which obviously refers to Order 43, CPC, restricts its scope. In none of the clauses contained in Rule 1 of Order 43, an order passed under Rule 58 of Order 21, finds place.[1310]

Thus, it is clear that every order passed under the Rules cannot be brought within the ambit of section 104.

Therefore, a question arises, whether an order passed under rule 58 of O XXI would be appealable under O XLIII. Sub-rule (4) of rule 58 of O XXI directs that the orders passed under sub-rule (3) thereof shall have the force of a decree. An interpretation to the contrary would have the effect of setting at naught, the intention of the Parliament in attributing characteristics of a decree to an order.[1311]

The above-mentioned Full Bench decision further went on to observe as follows:

> 32. Once it emerges that an order passed under Rule 58 of Order 21 is conferred the status of a decree, in the particular context of appeal, Section 96 gets attracted. Section 96 does not enumerate the types of decrees that can fall into its fold. Once the outcome of adjudication partakes the character of a decree, it gains an entry into the realm of Section 96.[1312]

An order abating a suit against one legal representative in its entirety against the rest of the legal representatives, in fact, determines the rights of parties conclusively and as such falls within the definition of "decree" and is appealable under section 96 of the Code. Even otherwise if no finding is recorded regarding rights of parties finally, it can be treated as an "order dismissing suit as abated". So it will be appealable under section 104 CPC.[1313]

No appeal shall lie under O XLIII, rule 1(r) against order rejecting application under O XXXIX, rule 2-A. Sub-rule (r) has been substituted by a new sub-rule wherein rule 2-A has been omitted by the amendment introduced by Bombay High Court by notification dated 15 September 1983.[1314]

Section 104 (1) (i) CPC clearly states that an appeal will lie from any order made under rules. Thus, the words, "order made under rules" clearly takes one to O XLIII, rule 1 CPC O XLIII, rule 1 (u) permits the filing of an appeal against an order remanding the case under rule 23 A of O XLI CPC In this view of the matter, an appeal would lie against an order remanding the case under section 104 CPC. Hence, an appeal would certainly lie to the Board under section 225 of the Rajasthan Tenancy Act, 1955 from an order of the RRA remanding the case to the Assistant Collector.[1315]

The recall application has been filed on the ground that the second appeal is not maintainable against a remand order in view of the provisions of O XLIII, rule 1 (u) of the CPC. The appeal under O XLIII, rule 1(u) can only be heard on the grounds a second appeal is heard under section 100. There is a difference between maintainability of an appeal and the scope of hearing of an appeal. Thus, second appeal is not maintainable against the remand order.[1316]

The proviso was inserted in the section by Act 9 of 1922.

In case an appellate court, while dealing with an appeal filed under section 104(1) read with O XLIII rule 1 of the CPC, against an order passed by the trial court in a pending suit passes an order, and such order passed by the appellate court in such an appeal is covered under any of the clauses (a) to (w) of rule 1 of O XLIII then no further appeal under section 104(1) read with O XLIII, rule 1 of the CPC will lie against such an order of the appellate court in view of the bar created by sub-section (2) of section 104 of the CPC.[1317]

Thus, if an appeal is preferred under O XLIII, rule 1(a), to an order under O VII, rule 10 returning a plaint to be presented to the proper court, and an order is made in appeal remanding the case under O XLI, rule 23 no appeal lies from such order,[1318] neither does it lie from an order by the appellate court setting aside an ex parte decree,[1319] nor from an order of ad interim injunction passed by an appellate court during the pendency of an appeal against rejection of an application for temporary injunction by the trial court.[1320] Where the appellate court, while dealing with an appeal filed under section 104 (1) read with O XLIII, rule 1, clause (r) of the CPC passes an order allowing the appeal, setting aside the order of the trial court and granting injunction in favour of the appellant, such an order passed by the appellate court will apparently be covered under section 104(1) read with O XLIII, rule 1, clause (r) of the CPC and therefore, such an order will be appealable under the said provisions. However, in view of the bar created by sub-section (2) of section 104 no further appeal may be filed against the said order passed by the appellate court.[1321]

When an application is made under O IX, rule 13 of the CPC for setting aside an ex parte decree, if such an application is rejected then alone an appeal would lie under O XLIII, rule 1(d) of the CPC. Section 104 of the CPC which is a charging section for preferring an appeal from orders, makes it clear that an appeal would lie from the following orders "save otherwise expressly provided in the body of the Code or by any law for the time being in force", from no other order and section 104 (2) of the CPC prohibits that no appeal shall lie from any order passed in appeal under this section.[1322]

Where an application is filed under O XXI, rule 58, read with section 151 of the Code was dismissed and instead of filing regular appeal against the said order, civil miscellaneous appeal was filed, it was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that the filing of the miscellaneous appeal was misconceived and no further second appeal would be maintainable.[1323]

Where the appellate court during the pendency of the regular first appeal before it under section 96 of the CPC, passes an order of the nature mentioned in any of the clauses (a) to (w) of rule 1 of O XLIII, then an appeal will lie against such an order under section 104(1) read with O XLIII, rule 1 of the CPC. Such an appeal will lie to the high court in view of the provisions of section 106 of the CPC. In case a regular first appeal has been filed under section 96 of the Code, and the appellate court passes an order during the pendency of such a regular first appeal, then such an order will not be covered under sub-section (2) of section 104 of the CPC. This is because, sub-section (2) of section 104 of the CPC is confined only to an order passed in an appeal filed under section 104. And the bar created by sub-section (2) of section 104 will not apply to such an appeal. Thus, where in a suit for partition. during pendency of first appeal an injunction order was passed by the lower appellate court under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 read with section 107(2) of the CPC and subsequently by the impugned order, the order of injunction was vacated, such an order vacating the injunction order and rejecting the application for recall of that order would evidently be an order under O XXXIX, rule 4 read with section 107(2) of the CPC passed by the lower appellate court during the pendency of the regular first appeal under section 96. Hence, an appeal would lie under O XLIII, rule 1(r) to the high court against the impugned order passed by the lower appellate court vacating the injunction order and rejecting the recall application.[1324]

Though reference to this section is made in O XLIII, rule 1, the right of appeal given against orders enumerated in O XLIII, rule 1 is subject to the stipulation contained in this sub-section. Where, however, the order amounts to a decree within section 2(2), a second appeal will lie under section 100 of the CPC.[1325] This should now be read subject to the restrictions placed on the right of second appeal under section 100 as amended by the Amendment Acts 1999 and 2002. This sub-section did not take away until recently the right of appeal conferred by clause 15 of the Letters Patent.[1326]

There are some orders which were appealable under section 588 of the repealed CPC but which are not appealable under this section. As to these, it is provided by section 154 that where the right to appeal has already accrued to a party before the commencement of this CPC, such right shall not be affected by anything contained in this Code. But section 154 has been repealed by section (2) and Sch I of the Repealing and Amending Act (48 of 1952).

[s 104.14] Interlocutory Order

No appeal is competent against an interlocutory order of an Accidents Claims Tribunal (for example, refusal to set aside an ex parte order) because its interlocutory orders are not made appealable and section 104 or O XLIII, rule 1 have not been made applicable to such tribunals under rule 21 of the UP Motor Accidents Claims Tribunals Rules 1967.[1327]

Appellate court passed an interim injunction in appeal against the decree of the trial court. It was held that the order was appealable under O XLIII, rule 1(r), read with section 104(1) and was not hit by section 104(2). The case was not where, against the order under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 by the trial court, an appeal was preferred to the district court and, as against the orders of the district court, the matter was carried to the high court. Therefore, the case did not come within the mischief of section 104(2) of the CPC, but fell squarely under O XLIII, rule 2(r).[1328]

[s 104.15] Order granting injunction

It is pertinent to note that under clause (a) of sub-section (2) of section 2 of the CPC "any adjudication from which an appeal lies as an appeal from an order" is specifically excluded from being a decree. Since an order passed under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 of the CPC is an appealable order under section 104 read with O XLIII, rule 1(r) of the CPC, it comes within the purview of the exclusion under clause (a) of section 2(2) and consequently it cannot be treated as a "decree" within the meaning of section 2(2) of the CPC. Therefore the irresistible conclusion is that O IX, rule 13 of CPC cannot be invoked for setting aside an order of ex parte temporary injunction passed under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2.

However, it is open to the respondents to file an application under O XXXIX, rule 4 of the CPC seeking to set aside the ex parte order under O XXXIX, rule 1.[1329]

Clause (i) of sub-section (1) of section 104 provides that an appeal shall lie against an order made under rules from which an appeal is expressly allowed by rules. An appeal under O XLIII, rule 1 shall lie against the first order because the rule says that such an appeal shall be permissible. The law nowhere says that even against appellate order granting or rejecting the injunction, a second appeal is maintainable in the high court under sub-rule (2) above clearly bars an appeal against the appellate order.[1330]

[s 104.16] Order under O XXXIX, Rule 2A

An appeal shall lie from any order passed under O XXXIX, rule 2A of the CPC and there is no limitation whatsoever in the rule itself as to the nature of the order passed under this rule. The restricted meaning that in case where the trial court has refused to initiate action under O XXXIX, rule 2A of the CPC does not flow from the provision of the above noted rule.[1331]

[s 104.17] Orders under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955

Section 28 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955 provides that all decrees and orders passed under the Act "may be appealed from under any law for the time being in force". It has been held that this section does not itself confer a right of appeal against orders passed in proceedings under the Act, that is governed by the "law for the time being in force", which is the CPC; that when the order amounts to a decree, it is appealable as a decree; and that in other cases there is no right of appeal unless the order falls within this section of O XLIII, rule 1, and that accordingly no appeal lies against an order granting or refusing to grant interim maintenance pendente lite.[1332] It has, however, been held that for purposes of court fees an appeal under the Act cannot be equated with one under the CPC.[1333]

[s 104.18] Order Substituting Party Under O XXII, Rule 10

Section 104(2) creates a bar against filing an appeal against an order passed in appeal under that section. In other words, if an order under O XXII, rule 10, CPC, is passed in an appeal under the provisions of section 104 no further appeal against that order would lie in view of the bar created under section 104(2). There is no such bar created specifically in the CPC in respect of such an order passed in a revision. However, a revision is a part of the ordinary appellate jurisdiction of the court. Both appeals as well as revisions are creatures of statute and they are maintained before a superior court against an order passed by a subordinate court.[1334]

It was held by the Hon'ble Supreme Court that the revisional jurisdiction is a part of the general appellate jurisdiction of a court. It is inconceivable that while the legislature precluded an appeal from an appellate order, it permitted an appeal from an order passed in revision.[1335]

There is a second aspect of the matter. A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Chandra Deo Pandey v Sukdeo Rai and others has taken a view that the provisions of O XXII are not applicable to revision.[1336]

Applications for substituting a party would therefore be maintainable in the case of a revision under the provisions of section 151, CPC. The effect of this legal position would be that appeals under O XLIII, rule 1(1) can logically be filed only if an order under rule 10 of O XXII is passed in a suit pending trial. No such appeal would lie against an order under rule 10 of O XXII in a pending appeal on account of the bar created under section 104(2) of CPC. Thus, the provisions of O XLIII, rule 1(1) have to be read as being applicable only to an order under rule 10 of O XXII passed in a suit at the trial stage.

There is a third aspect of the matter. Against a final order passed in a revision, no appeal lies. Even a revision will not lie. As such, it is not conceivable that even though an appeal does not lie against the final order in the revision, an appeal would lie against an interlocutory order disposing of an application under O XXII, rule 10 of CPC in a revision.[1337]

[s 104.19] Order Remanding Case for Fresh Decision by Trial Court

The order in appeal passed by the learned additional district judge remanding the case to the learned civil judge for a decision on merit in accordance with law. An appeal from this order falls within the category of an appeal from an order as described in O XLIII, rule 1(u) of the CPC. There was no dispute that had the learned additional district judge confirmed the decree, a second appeal could have been filed to the high court. Since the decree passed by the learned civil judge was not confirmed but was in fact set aside and the matter remanded for a decision in accordance with law, it would squarely be covered by the aforesaid provision of O XLIII of the CPC. Reference in this context may also be made to section 104(1)(i) of the CPC whereby an appeal is provided from any order made under the rules from which an appeal is expressly allowed. There is, therefore, no difficulty in holding that the appeal filed by the appellants against the said remand order is maintainable whether the registry chooses to call it a first appeal or a second appeal or give it some other nomenclature is not the concern of the appellants. For convenience, the registry has described the appeal as a first appeal. As long as it is maintainable in the high court, its description is of no consequence.[1338]

[s 104.20] Letters Patent Appeal

If a right of appeal is provided for under the Act, the limitation thereof must also be provided therein. A right of appeal which is provided under the Letters Patent cannot be said to be restricted. Limitation of a right of appeal in absence of any provision in a statute cannot be readily inferred.[1339]

While determining the question as regards clause 15 of the Letters Patent, the court is required to see as to whether the order sought to be appealed against is a judgment within the meaning thereof or not. Once it is held that irrespective of the nature of the order, meaning thereby whether interlocutory or final, a judgment has been rendered, clause 15 of the Letters Patent would be attracted.[1340]

The orders passed under section 299 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, may be an interlocutory order determining the rights of the parties or a final order. When a final order is passed in a contentious suit, as would be evident from the provisions contained in section 295 of the Act, the procedures of the CPC are required to be followed. Therefore, a final order passed between the parties adjudicating upon the rights and obligations which are binding between the parties thereto and are enforceable, although may not be, stricto sensu, a decree within the meaning of section 2(2) of the CPC but it is beyond any cavil that the same would be a judgment within the meaning of section 2(9) thereof.[1341]

An order of removal of executor under section 301 of the Succession Act, 1925 is not a discretionary order since it requires finding of misconduct. It amounts to judgment and therefore Letters Patent Appeal against the same would be maintainable.[1342]

Clause 15 of the Letters Patent provides that an appeal lies from every "judgment" of a single judge of the high court in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction to other judges of the court. There was a conflict of decisions under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 as to the effects of section 588 upon section 15 of the Letters Patent. The High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay held, following a decision of the Privy Council,[1343] that section 588 did not take away the right of appeal given by clause 15 of the Letters Patent.[1344] On the other hand, it was held by the Allahabad High Court, on a different reading of the Privy Council case referred to above, that section 588 took away the right of appeal given by the Letters Patent.[1345] It is submitted that the words "save as otherwise expressly provided by any law for the time being in force" include the Letters Patent, and that they were added into the present section to give effect to the Calcutta, Madras and Bombay decisions. This is the view taken by the Lahore[1346], Madras[1347] and Nagpur High Courts[1348]. The High Court of Allahabad, however, adhered for a time to its previous view even in cases under the present Code.[1349] But it has been subsequently held by the Allahabad High Court that under clause (10) of the Letters Patent as amended in 1929, an appeal lies from the order of the single Judge passed in appeal from order.[1350] However the new section 100A inserted in the Code by the Amendment Act, 1976 debars any Letters Patent appeal from any judgment, decision or order passed by a single Judge of the high court in a second appeal heard and decided by him. Section 104 (2) applies to Letters Patent appeals also.[1351] Section 104 applies to internal appeals in the high court.[1352] Section 104 (2) applies to Letters Patent Appeals also. However, where an appeal is filed before a single Judge of the high court under O XLIII, rule 1 (s) read with section 104 (1) no Letters Patent appeal is maintainable.[1353] Where an order under O XXXIX or O XL, CPC is passed by a single Judge of the high court in appeal under section 104, CPC, then section 104 (2) bar a Letters Patent Appeal. The order contemplated by section 104 (2) need not be an order finally disposing of the appeal. Section 104 (2) does not speak of "an order disposing of an appeal". Court cannot re-write the section in that manner.[1354] Effect must also be given to legislative intent of introducing section 4, CPC and the words "by any law for the time being in force" in section 104(1). This was done to give effect to the Calcutta, Madras and Bombay views that section 104 did not bar a Letters Patent. As appeals under "any other law for the time being in force" undeniably include a Letters Patent Appeal, such appeals are now specifically saved. Section 104 must be read as a whole and harmoniously. If the intention was to exclude what is specifically saved in sub-clause (1), then there had to be a specific exclusion. A general exclusion of this nature would not be sufficient. We are not saying that a general exclusion would never oust a Letters Patent Appeal. However, when section 104(1) specifically saves a Letters Patent Appeal then the only way such an appeal could be excluded is by express mention in section 104(2) that a Letters Patent Appeal is also prohibited.[1355]

A specific exclusion may be clear from the words of a statute, even though no specific reference is made to Letters Patent. But where there is an express saving in the statute/ section itself, then general words to the effect that "an appeal would not lie" or "order will be final" are not sufficient. In such case, i.e., where there is an express saving, there must be an express exclusion. Sub-clause (2) of section 104 does not provide for any express exclusion.[1356]

The present section 100A was amended in 2002 from the earlier section 100A, introduced in 1976.

See "Specific exclusion of Letters Patent Appeal" under section 100A, Syn. 8

Now by virtue of section 100A, no Letters Patent Appeal would be maintainable.

However, it is an admitted position that the law which would prevail would be the law at the relevant time. At the relevant time, neither section 100A nor section 104(2) barred a Letters Patent Appeal.

Applying the above principle, the appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent is an appeal provided by a law for the time being in force. Therefore, the finality contemplated by sub-section (2) of section 104 did not attach to an appeal passed under such law.[1357]

[s 104.22] Supreme Court Appeal

The provision in sub-section (2) dealt with internal appeals within the limits of India. It did not take away the general right of appealing to the Supreme Court given by section 109. A applies to the district judge of East Berar under Sch II, para 20 to file an award in Court. B opposes the application. The district judge makes an order refusing to file the award. An appeal from the order [see clause (f)] to the Judicial Commissioner. The Judicial Commissioner makes an order filing the award. B appeals to the King in Council from this order of the Judicial Commissioner. Was the appeal to the King competent? Yes, for though no second appeal would lie to the high court by reason of the provisions in sub-section (2), an appeal would lie before the King in council under section 109 of Code.[1358] Similarly though no second appeal lies from an order passed on appeal from the order specified in O XLIII clause (i), an appeal would have laid to the King in Council under section 109 of the Code.[1359] These decisions would, it is submitted, apply to appeals to the Supreme Court but subject to the conditions prescribed in section 109. (See Articles 133 and 134A of the Constitution).

[s 105.1] Changes in the Section

This section corresponds with section 591 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1882, except in the following particulars:

(a) Sub-section (2) was added in 1908.[1361]

(b) Section 591 contained the words "in any such order" after the word "irregularity" in sub-section (1). The word "such" was omitted in 1908 as the expression "such order" gave rise to a contention in some cases before the Privy Council that section 591 applied to non-appealable orders only, a contention that was overruled by the Privy Council.[1362]

(c) The Amendment Act, 1976 has deleted the words "made after the commencement of this Code" occurring after the words "by an order of remand" in sub-section (2) on the ground that they are no longer necessary.

An interlocutory order made in a suit is either appealable (section 104) or not appealable. This section, like the corresponding section 591, applies to any order, that is, to appealable as well as non-appealable order. Where an interlocutory order is appealable, the party against whom the order is made is not bound to prefer an appeal against it, but he may make the irregularity in the order a ground of objection in the memorandum of appeal where an appeal is preferred from the decree in the suit in which the order was made. In other words, section 105 allows an appealable order, which has not been appealed from, to be made the subject of appeal in an appeal from the decree. There is no law prevailing in India which renders it imperative upon a party to appeal from every interlocutory order by which he may conceive himself aggrieved under the penalty and if he does not do so, of forfeiting forever the benefit of the consideration of the appellate court. Nothing would be more detrimental to the expeditious administration of justice than the establishment of a rule which would impose upon a party the necessity of appealing, whereby on the one hand he might be harassed with endless expense and delay, and on the other, inflict upon his opponents similar calamities. It was so observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Moheshwar Singh v The Government of Bengal[1363] and in subsequent cases,[1364] and it is this principle that underlies the present section. The present section makes it quite clear that an order appealable under section 104 may be questioned under section 105 in an appeal from the decree in the suit, although no appeal from the order has been preferred under section 104.[1365] Sub-section (2) is an exception to this rule.[1366] Even where the interlocutory order is one from which no appeal lies, an error, defect or irregularity in that order may be set forth as a ground of objection in the memorandum of appeal, where an appeal is preferred from the decree in the suit in which the order was made.[1367] It has been held by the Supreme Court that though the principles of res judicata will apply to different stages of the same litigation, they do not preclude a party from questioning the correctness of an interlocutory order in an appeal against the decree, except where it falls within sub-section (2).[1368] In a Letters Patent appeal also, the Letters Patent Bench could go into all the points decided in an interlocutory order in an appeal against the judgment or decision of the single judge of the high court in a second appeal.[1369] This has now become academic in view of section 100A precluding such a Letters Patent appeal.

In a suit for possession, the defendant wished to exhibit a will of the last owner of the property. The court rejected his prayer for the same and, in revision, the high court passed a one-word order "Dismissed". The suit was decreed against the defendant. In first appeal, the defendant argued that the trial court was in error in not granting the above permission. But the first appellate court held that this point had already been decided by the high court by dismissing the revision petition and the point could not be re-agitated. It was held, on second appeal, that the high court order did not amount to res judicata as there was no speaking order.[1370] The following cases were relied upon: (i) Roop Kishore v Firm Raghbir Singh;[1371] (ii) Ishar v Sudesh Kumar.[1372] Interlocutory order can be challenged in revision (section 115) if there is a failure of justice. The fact that, under section 105, the order can be a ground of challenge in appeal later does not bar such a challenge.[1373] In a Madras case, the landlord sued for ejectment of the tenant. The tenancy was governed by the Madras City Tenants Protections Act, 1922. In the course of the suit, the tenant applied for purchase of the premises under section 9 of the Act. The application was dismissed. It was held that such a dismissal was an interlocutory order and its correctness could be challenged in an appeal against the judgment in suit.[1374]

Section 105(1) of the CPC enables a party to set forth any error, defect, or irregularity in any order affecting the decision of the case as a ground of objections in the memorandum of appeal. The remedies available under O XLI, rule 21 of the CPC and as envisaged under section 105 are not mutually exclusive and sometimes may be overlapping.[1375]

[s 105.4] "Affecting the decision of the case"

It has been held by almost all the high courts that the words "affecting the decision of the case" mean affecting the decision of the case on its merits. It has accordingly been held that an order cannot be attacked in appeal from a final decree, unless the error, defect or irregularity in the order is the one affecting the decision of the case on the merits.[1376] It has also been held by the High Courts of Allahabad, Calcutta and Lahore that an order under O IX, rule 13, setting aside an ex parte decree, is not an order that affects the merits of the case. Such an order merely ensures a hearing upon the merits, hence, the order cannot be attacked in an appeal from the decree in the suit.[1377] But there are cases in which this reason does not apply for an order setting aside an ex parte decree may not have the effect of securing a hearing on the merits. Thus, when an application is made to set aside an ex parte final decree in a suit on a mortgage with a view to raising a point of limitation which would render the preliminary decree futile, the order setting aside the ex parte decree may be attacked in the appeal from the final decree.[1378] Again, if the ex parte decree has been set aside as against two defendants at the instance of one defendant by a mistaken application of O IX, rule 13, the error affects the decision on the merits and the order may be attacked in the appeal of the other defendant.[1379] Conversely, if an ex parte decree has been set aside as against two defendants and the proviso to O IX, rule 13, has not been applied so that the necessary parties are not on the record, the error affects the decision on the merits and the order may be attacked in appeal.[1380] In a Full Bench case,[1381] the Rangoon High Court has, overruling its earlier decision, held that it must be shown that the error, defect or irregularity has affected the decision of the case on merits.

In a suit for declaration, interlocutory order was passed by the trial Court refusing to summon witnesses. The said interlocutory order related to valuable right of the appellant but not challenged in revision. It was held by the Madhya Pradesh High Court that the appellants are entitled to summon records and examine witnesses in second appeal. It was held that section 105 gives the appellant right to challenge the interlocutory order at the stage of appeal along with other grounds.[1382]

An order accepting or rejecting a document would not be an appealable order, but its correctness, validity and propriety can be challenged before the appellate court with the help of section 105 of the Code. The Gujarat High Court held that the appellate court was absolutely unjustified in holding that in absence of a revision challenging the correctness of the order passed by the trial Court, it would not be open to appellate court to examine the validity/ correctness of the order.[1383]

An order under O IX, rule 9, restoring a suit dismissed for default cannot be questioned in an appeal against the decree in the suit, as it cannot affect the decision of the case on its merits.[1384]

An order remanding an appeal from an order returning a plaint for presentation to the proper court is not an order affecting the decision of the case and cannot be challenged in second appeal.[1385]

An order under O XLI, rule 19, re-admitting an appeal which has been dismissed for default, is not one which affects the decision of the case on the merits, and it cannot, therefore, be attacked in an appeal from the final decree.[1386]

An order setting aside an abatement under O XXII, rule 9 does not affect the decision of the case on its merits, rather, it re-opens the bearing of the case on its merits, and it cannot, therefore, be challenged in appeal. from the final decree.[1387] But, there is a difference of opinion whether an order setting aside an abatement may be so attacked if it is made simultaneously with the final decree in the suit. It has been held by the High Court of Allahabad that it may be so attacked if passed simultaneously with the final decree.[1388] On the other hand, it has been held by the High Court of Calcutta that an order setting aside an abatement cannot be challenged in an appeal from the final decree, whether it is passed before or simultaneously with the final decree.[1389] The High Court of Lahore followed the decision of the High Court of Calcutta.[1390]

An order refusing leave under section 20(b) cannot be attacked in an appeal from an order returning a plaint for presentation to the proper court.[1391]

In a summary suit conditional leave to defend was granted to the defendant, but the defendant did not fulfil the condition and decree was passed in the summary suit. It was held by the Supreme Court that the order granting conditional leave can be challenged in appeal against the decree though revision against such order of conditional leave was maintainable.

> 18. A statutory right conferred on an litigant cannot ordinarily be taken away. A civil revision application might have been maintainable as against the order dated 27-11-2002 granting conditional leave. The said remedy was also available where leave to defend a suit is refused. Leave to defend a suit, as noticed hereinbefore, should ordinarily be granted. It was, therefore, permissible for the defendant to raise the said contention in the appeal although it had asked for time to comply with the conditions.[1392]

However, the Supreme Court in an earlier decision held that for challenging an earlier interlocutory order, specific challenge has to be raised against the interlocutory order in the memorandum of appeal. Thus, where neither revision was filed against the interlocutory order nor they were challenged specifically in the Memorandum of Appeal, it was held that each of those orders attained finality.[1393]

It has been held that the following orders could be questioned in an appeal against the decree in the suit: an order wrongly casting the burden of proof on a party;[1394] an order refusing leave to defend;[1395] an order striking out defence;[1396] an order holding that an application to set aside an award under section 33 of the Arbitration Act is maintainable, and not barred by limitation;[1397] an order rejecting an application for amendment on the ground of limitation.[1398] It has also been held that where an application to treat a suit filed under the summary chapter as an ordinary suit is dismissed, and leave to defend is refused, the correctness of the order can be challenged in an appeal against the decree.[1399] Findings of the court fixing the liability of partners in proceedings consequential on a preliminary decree in a suit for dissolution of partnership can be attacked in an appeal against the final decree.[1400]

[s 105.5] Error, Defect or Irregularity

The Supreme Court, in the matter of Achal Misra v Rama Shanker Singh, [1401] held as under:

> In Sheonath v Ramnath (1865) 10 MIA 413 the Privy Council reiterated that a party is not bound to appeal from every interlocutory order which is a step in the procedure that leads to a final decree. It is open on appeal from such final decree to question an interlocutory order.

Where it appeared from the order sheet of trial court dated 8 December 1987, the application, which was supported with an affidavit, for calling the record and examining the concerning Patwari filed by appellants, was dismissed without considering the merits of it. As per its contention, on non-availability of the copies of relevant revenue record it was filed in order to prove material facts in favour of appellants but by dismissing this application they were deprived to adduce material evidence on record. Although then, this was not challenged by revision, but, on dismissal of the suit, such interlocutory order was assailed in appeal along with other grounds. But the appellate court did not examine the correctness of this order by saying that it was revisable but the revision was not filed, thus, it could not be considered in appeal and ground was answered in the negative against the appellants. But in view of the provisions of section 105 of the CPC, such approach cannot be sustained.[1402]

The appellate court committed grave error in not considering the merits of the interlocutory order while it was related with the valuable right of the appellants. In view of this, the said high court has two options— either this question be decided itself or it be sent back to the appellate court for considering the merits of the said application.[1403]

The error, defect or irregularity referred to in this section must be an error, defect or irregularity in law or procedure, and not in matters of fact.[1404] The order setting all the respondents ex-parte without calling on the appeal for hearing amounting to an error effecting the decision of the case which can be raised in the appeal from the ultimate decrees.[1405]

Order IX rule 13 of CPC and section 96(2) of CPC work in different spheres. Court observed that in the regular appeal filed under section 96(2) of CPC, the appellate court had got wide jurisdiction to go into the merits of the decree. The scope of enquiry under two provisions, i.e., O IX, rule 13 and section 96(2) was entirely different. Just because the party pursued the remedy under O IX rule 13 of CPC, it does not prohibit him from preferring an appeal even if the application under O IX, rule 13 CPC is dismissed. Court said that right of appeal under section 96(2) of CPC is a statutory right and the party cannot be deprived of its statutory right merely because the application preferred to set aside ex-parte order is dismissed.[1406]

This section contemplates two things namely: (i) regular appeal from a decree; and (ii) the insertion in that appeal of a ground of objection relating to an interlocutory order. The High Court of Allahabad has held that no appeal will lie where the appeal is ostensibly against the decree passed in the suit, but the grounds of appeal are solely directed against an interlocutory order made in the suit.[1407] On the other hand, the High Courts of Calcutta and Madras have held that such an appeal will lie, though the only reason for the appeal is an erroneous decision in regard to an interlocutory order.[1408]

It should be noted that in order to take advantage of the provisions of this section the ground of objection must be set out in the memorandum of appeal.[1409]

[s 105.7] Interlocutory Orders in Execution Proceedings

The rule enacted in this section applies to orders passed in the course of execution proceedings. Where an order is interlocutory in character, its correctness can be assailed in an appeal against an order, which is appealable as a decree.[1410]

[s 105.8] Sub-section (2): Appeal from Order of Remand

It is well settled in law that the order of remand cannot be passed by the appellate court or any statutory authority as a matter of course. One will have to make out a case for remand of the case to show any material evidence was either ignored, misread or misconstrued by the appellate court.[1411]

Sub-section (2) of section 105 of the CPC provides that where any party is aggrieved by an order of remand from which an appeal lies does not appeal therefrom, he shall thereafter be precluded from disputing its correctness. The provision is not without exceptions and limitation. First is, when the order of remand is illegal, and more so, if it is without jurisdiction. The high court had, in exercise of second appellate jurisdiction, illegally reversed the concurrent findings of fact and ordered remand. It was held, in an appeal to the Supreme Court from the final order of the high court after remand, challenge even to the first order of the high court making remand, and, all the proceedings taken thereafter as a result of the illegal order of remand, was available to be laid. When the matter reaches a forum superior to one which had made the order of remand earlier, it can go into the question of legality or validity of the order of remand. The bar enacted by section 105(2) applies up to the level of that forum which had remanded the matter earlier. Secondly, section 105(2) has no applicability to the jurisdiction exercisable by the Supreme Court by reference to Article 136 of the Constitution. This, for the reason that no appeal lies to the Supreme Court against an order of remand, an appeal under Article 136 of the Constitution is only by special leave granted by the Supreme Court. It is settled law that section 105(2) has no applicability to the Privy Council and to the Supreme Court. In the present appeal preferred against the judgment and decree passed by the high court in the proceedings held pursuant to the earlier order of remand dated, the correctness of the order of remand can be examined and gone into by the Supreme Court.[1412]

An order under O XLI, rule 23, remanding a case, is appealable, where an appeal would lie from the decree of the appellate court [O XLIII, rule 1, clause (u)]. Such an order was also appealable under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 [section 588, clause (28)].[1413] Sub-section (2) has been added to preclude an appellant from taking, on an appeal from the final decree, any objection that might have been urged by way of appeal from an order of remand.[1414] The effect of this sub-section has been said by RANKIN CJ, to be that "a litigant, aggrieved by an order of remand from which an appeal lies, must appeal therefrom directly, or be precluded from disputing its correctness".[1415] This has also been restated by the Supreme Court.[1416]

Correcting an order of remand is not within the inherent power under section 151 since there is a remedy provided against such an order and has not been used by the aggrieved party (ibid). Where an appeal is actually filed and disposed of that decision is final and cannot be agitated at a subsequent stage either before the trial court to which the case is remanded or before the appellate court.[1417]

An order of remand, which is appealable as a judgment under the Letters Patent and has not been appealed against cannot be questioned under this section at later stages of the litigation,[1418] but it can be questioned, if it is not appealable.[1419] A special provision is made in section 105(2) as regards orders of remand. But even under section 105(2) the correctness of an order or remand can be challenged in appeal from the final decision provided the order of remand is not appealable.[1420]

It has been held that the finality, which attaches to an order or remand, extends to all findings on which the order is based[1421] including directions which form part of the order.[1422] But an issue about which nothing is said in the order of remand can be agitated at a subsequent stage when the case comes up on appeal from the order or decree passed after remand.[1423]

An order, which is appealable under O XLIII of the CPC, if not appealed against, becomes final and its correctness is no more open to examination in view of the provisions of section 105(2).[1424] As to whether an appeal lies from an order of remand which does not strictly fall within the purview of O XIV, rule 23, though the judge passing it purports to act in accordance with said provision, the opinion is divided. One view is that the order is appealable.[1425] The other view is to the contrary.[1426]

[s 105.9] Non-Appealable Orders of Remand

When an order of remand is not open to appeal, it is well settled that its correctness can be impugned in an appeal against the revised decree that might be passed pursuant to it on remand,[1427] but that can only be in a superior court, the court which made the order being bound by it.[1428]

[s 106.1] Forum of appeal

Sections 104 to 106 of the Code deal with "Appeals from Orders". Rule 1 of O XLIII enumerates certain orders from which an appeal is permitted. The purpose of this section is to identify the forum in which appeals from orders would lie. The plain meaning of the section is that where an appeal from any order is permitted in terms of section 104 and O XLIII, rule 1 of the Code, the same would lie in the Court in which an appeal would lie from the decree passed in the suit in which that order was made. The second part of the section further lays down that where the Court passing an order in its appellate jurisdiction is not a high court, then the appeal from the order of that Court would lie to the high court.

However, where a suit was transferred to the Original Side of the high court, the appellate court which admitted the appeal loses its jurisdiction to hear the appeal. It is only the appellate forum in the Original Side of the high court which can hear the appeal.[1431]

The appeal is considered to be an extension of the suit because under section 107 of the CPC, the appellate court has the same powers as are conferred by the CPC on courts of original jurisdiction in respect of suits instituted therein. Such a power can be exercised by the appellate court "as nearly as may be" exercised by the trial court under the CPC, if the powers conferred upon the trial court are under a specified statute and not under the Code. It has to be ascertained as to whether such a power intended to be exercised by the appellate court as well. Such a position can be ascertained by having a reference to the specified law by keeping in mind the legislative intention of conferment of power on the appellate court either expressly or by necessary implication.[1432]

The appellate court or the Supreme Court has power to take suo motu judicial notice and exercise power conferred under section 105 of the CPC to set aside a sale even after the expiry of limitation period prescribed therein.[1433]

[s 107.2] Power of High Court

The high court although has a wide power in terms of section 107 of the CPC, but it cannot go outside the pleadings and make out a new case.[1434]

[s 107.3] Preliminary Objections Regarding Condonation of Delay and Maintainability

The impugned order for appointing receiver was passed on 29 September 2000 and at the time of passing of the order, the high court had taken note of the fact that it still had not decided the application for condonation of delay, yet it passed the order because of the urgency involved in the matter and because of the urgency involved in the matter and because of the fact that it was not in a position to decide the appeal finally. As a matter of fact, the high court had decided to dispose of the appeal finally, which it could not do so because of the impending vacation of the court at that time. Hence, it thought it fit to make the impugned interim order without considering the preliminary questions.

Where the second appeal was filed within time, but the refiling after curing defects was done after a delay of 3412 days and the high court had dismissed it on the ground of delay, the Supreme Court restored the appeal but directed enquiry and action against the responsible officers.[1435]

In view of the peculiar facts of this case without going into the merits of the contentions raised by the counsel for the appellants, the Supreme Court thought it is just and fair that they should not, at this point of time interfere with the impugned order, though the high court could have avoided passing such orders in proceedings where the maintainability itself was being seriously questioned. It directed the high court to consider the question of condonation of delay and the objection of the appellants in regard to maintainability of the appeal first, before proceeding with the appeal any further. The Supreme Court thought it to be just and proper that any further interim orders, if necessary, in the appeal before the high court in regard to the suit property should be made only after deciding the question of delay and maintainability of the appeal and the order already made should be confined to the appointment of a receiver and filing of his report only, meaning thereby, that the impugned order be confined to the appointment of receiver for the purpose of filing his report as directed by the court and nothing beyond that, at that stage.[1436]

[s 107.4] Prescribed

"Prescribed" means prescribed by the Rules contained in the First Schedule or made under section 122 or section 125 of the CPC, see section 2, clauses (16) and (18).

[s 107.5] Appellate Court

"Appellate court" includes appellate tribunals exercising judicial functions in civil proceedings, such as the Labour Appellate Tribunal.[1437] In a writ appeal, the high court has power under this section to remand the case to the trial court for rehearing.[1438]

The Supreme Court has held that section 107 empowers the appellate court to remand a case, but it simultaneously empowers the appellate court to take additional evidence or to require such evidence to be taken. Order XLI, rule 24 provides that where evidence on record is sufficient, the appellate court may determine the case finally. The Supreme Court held that it is not a healthy practice to remand a case to the trial court until and unless it is necessary to do so as it makes the parties to wait for the final decision of a case for the period which is avoidable. Only in rare situations, a case should be remanded e.g. when the trial court has disposed of a suit on a preliminary issue without recording evidence and giving its decision on the rest of the issues.[1439]

However, the appellate court cannot interfere with the order passed by the trial Court in a mechanical manner without recording reasons as to how and in what manner the findings of the trial Court were perverse or unsustainable. Thus where the trial Court had granted injunction in favour of the plaintiff on the basis of demarcation report of Commissioner and revenue records, interference by the appellate court without assigning any reason was held to be improper.[1440]

Note that the powers of the appellate court referred to in clauses (a) to (d) are limited by the rules as appears from the opening words of the section.[1441]

[s 107.6.1] Clause (a)

See O XLI, rules 24, 33. Where a revision application against an order granting ex parte divorce under section 13(1)(ib) is filed by the respondent before the high court, it should be treated as substance by way of miscellaneous appeal. Once the high court has appellate jurisdiction over the impugned order of the trial judge, it is fully competent to interfere with the order by re-appreciating the facts of the case. In this case, since the husband had died after the grant of an ex parte decree of divorce, the application of the wife under O IX, rule 13 was set aside and the matter was determined finally as no useful purpose would be served by directing the trial court to proceed with the Hindu marriage petition by restoring it to its file.[1442] The power of the appellate court, as also indicated in section 107 of the CPC, provides that the appellate court shall have the same powers as are conferred on the original court. If the trial court could dispose of a case finally, the appellate court could also, by virtue of clause (a) of sub-section 10 of section 107 determine a case finally.[1443]

A suit for redemption of mortgaged property was filed before the expiry of the term of mortgage. The suit was dismissed as premature and the dismissal was confirmed by the first appellate court. The high court by an erroneous order allowed the appeal and remanded. But the order of remand was not challenged at that time and it was challenged after the final judgment. It was held by the Supreme Court that it being an interlocutory order which did not terminate the proceedings; it is open to the aggrieved party to challenge it after final judgment.[1444]

BN Srikrishna, J, speaking for the Bench in the above case, explained the legal position as follows:

> The trial court and the first Appellate Court had held that the suit for redemption brought by the plaintiff was premature and rightly dismissed. It is the High Court by its judgment dated 18-1-1966 in Second Appeal No. 3033/58, which took an erroneous view that because the plaintiff's advocate had stated that he would not seek delivery of possession before stipulated time (26-1-1968), the suit could be continued. It was on this wrong understanding of the legal position that the remand order dated January18, 1966 come to be made by the High Court pursuant to which the appeal and further proceedings continued. If this remand order was bad in law, then all further proceedings, consequent thereto would be non est and have to be necessarily set aside.[1445]

[s 107.6.2] Clause (b)

(See O XLI, rule 23, text under the heading "sub-section (2): Appeal from order of remand" in section 105 and "order of remand" in section 109). In a particular case, the high court dismissed the appeal by one word order "dismissed". As numerous points both of law and fact appear to have been raised in appeal, which again was sought to be canvassed before the Hon'ble Supreme Court. The Supreme Court remitted the matter to the high court as in its opinion it was a fit case which ought to have been admitted and disposed off on merits.[1446]

An order of remand, being an interlocutory order which did not terminate proceedings, it is open to aggrieved party to challenge it after final judgment.[1447]

A question in second appeal was also formulated, i.e., whether the lower appellate court is justified in dealing with issues other than those framed by the trial court and deciding the same in favour of the plaintiff depriving the defendant the opportunity to counter the plaintiff's evidence. It has been clearly stated that there was no issue framed regarding the adverse possession. The lower appellate court was not justified in deciding issues which were not framed. The high court took a view that there was no direct reference to the issue of adverse possession. But that is really of no consequence when the specific stand of the appellant was that there was no issue framed relating to adverse possession and, therefore, the first appellate court should not have recorded any finding on that regard. The trial court had not specifically framed any issue relating to adverse possession. This being the position, the judgment could not be maintained and was set aside. The matter was remitted by the Supreme Court to the high court for fresh consideration and it was made clear that the Supreme Court did not express any opinion on the merits of the case.[1448]

It has been held by the Orissa High Court, that remand of a case by appellate court is not necessary in every case of illegality of the trial Court. Thus, where order was passed by the trial Court without revocation of the stay order was held to be erroneous, it was felt that the remand of the suit would be an exercise in futility as the same would result in starting another round of litigation.[1449]

The Rajasthan High Court has held that appellate courts should not remand a suit from the appellate stage to the trial Court when the case can be decided at the appellate stage itself.[1450] A word of caution has been sounded by the Court to curb the growing tendency to remand a case which has the effect of prolonging the litigation:

> 22. The purpose behind the Rules is not to initiate a de novo trial. The purpose is also not to prolong the dispute between the parties. Since the judiciary must endeavour to decide the dispute as soon as possible, the Appellate Court is expected to decide the case at the appellate stage itself. Therefore, the tendency to remand the case in to after setting aside the judgment of the trial Court and the tendency to direct a de novo trial is against the tenor of law.[1451]

It will be seen that O XLI, rules 23 to 26A deals with power of remand. In the above-noted case, the first appellate court by judgment dated 8 September 1998, allowed the appeal, re-framed the issues and remanded the case back to the trial Court to take fresh evidence on the newly framed issues and to decide the case. The high court noted that the defendants claimed the suit land to be Government property and have right to demolish the construction made on it, but failed to produce any oral or documentary evidence in order to substantiate its stand. It was further found by the high court that the issue whether the land in dispute belonged to Government or was the ancestral property of the plaintiff was long settled by the high court. Under these circumstances it was held that remand of the matter after the lapse of almost two decades to enable the defendants to fill lacuna would be improper.[1452]

The observations of the high court in the above case deserve notice:

> Therefore, no fruitful purpose would be served in reopening the said issue. The learned judge should also have been alive to the conduct of the U.T.I. The suit was filed on 21-3-1977 and the trial Court decided the case on 30-9-1993. During this period of over sixteen years, the U.T.I. decided not to contest the case. A litigant, who sleeps over his rights for sixteen years, cannot be permitted to re-open the Pandora's Box after a lapse of almost two decades. To do so is to inflict grave injustice on the appellant.[1453]

[s 107.6.3] Clause (c)

Under section 107 of the CPC, the appellate court has power to frame issue other than those framed by the trial court. But here again, the requirement is to refer them for trial. Consequentially, the defendant would have got opportunity to adduce evidence in that regard.[1454] The first appellate court is also competent as per the provisions of section 107 read with relevant rules of the CPC to frame issues and decide matters as if it is the trial court.[1455] (See O XLI, rule 25).

In an appeal against a trial court decree, when the appellate court considers an issue turning on oral evidence, it does not enjoy the advantage which the trial court has in having the witness before it and of observing the manner in which he gives his testimony. When there is a conflict of oral evidence on any matter in issue and appellate court resolution turns upon the creditability of witness, the general rule is that it should permit the finding of fact rendered by the trial court to prevail unless it clearly appears that some features about the evidence of a particular witness has escaped the notice of the trial court or there is sufficient balance of improbabilities to displaced its opinion as to whether the creditability lies or the appraisals of the evidence by the trial court suffers from a material irregularity or is based on inadmissible evidence or on a misreading or the evidence or on conjunctures and surmises.[1456] If it appears that the court has not framed the issues properly and then again, without taking each and every issue separately for discussion had taken all the issues together, on the pretext of "convenience" for discussion which is not proper, but then, in any case improper framing of the issues alone is not fatal unless prejudice is alleged and shown an appellate court is at liberty as per the provision of O XLI, rule 31, CPC to record the points for determination in the appeal, which, when done, will dispense with the defect of the improper framing of the issues by the trial court.[1457]

(See O XLI, rules 27, 28). As regards filing of application for additional evidence, it is better if the application is given a separate number and an order is passed thereon, separately. It is absolutely necessary that every application for permission to file additional evidence should contain a list of documents giving full particulars thereof, such as dates, parties thereto, and description. Apart from that, each document should also bear a certificate of endorsement made by the counsel or the party stating that the said document was the one referred to in the affidavit or application of the party. The application must also specify the number of pages of each document filed therewith. Whenever such application is filed in pending matter, the copies thereof and the copies of document sought to be filed, as additional document should be served on the other side after being duly verified as true copies by the applicant or his counsels. Appropriate rules have to be framed in this regard also.[1458] In view of the provisions of O XVIII, rule 18, the trial court is possessed of power to inspect any property or thing concerning which any question may arise at any stage of a suit. The appellate court is also, therefore, possessed of the power of inspection of any property or thing concerning which any question arises at any stage of the suit including appeal. Such a conclusion is inevitable if the provisions of O XVIII, rule 18 and section 107 of the CPC are read together.[1459] In an Andhra Pradesh case concerning land acquisition proceedings, the appellate court allowed certain documents to be brought on record by way of an additional evidence as the same were necessary for a just and effective decision about valuation.[1460]

Rule 27 of O XLI empowers the Court to permit additional evidence to be adduced at the appellate stage under the circumstances enumerated in the said Rule. Rule 27(1)(b) of O XLI provides a circumstance where the Court requires additional evidence to be produced in order to enable it to pronounce judgment in more satisfactory manner. However, where the application for permitting additional evidence was not even considered by the high court and the appeal was dismissed, it was held by the Supreme Court that the order of dismissal was improper.[1461]

> 17. It is manifest that in the present case, the High Court did not examine the record of the case with the thoroughness which was expected at the time of disposal of the pending applications. On a perusal of the impugned decisions, it is clear that the High Court was not even aware of the pendency of the application under O 41, r 27 CPC seeking leave to adduce additional evidence. A perusal of the documents, which came to light pursuant to the directions given by the High Court on 3rd April, 2002, prima facie, goes to show that these are likely to widely affect the decision of the court in one way or the other. If the stand of the appellant, which, according to them, is borne out from the documents now on record, is found to be correct, then obviously these will have material bearing on the core issue, namely whether the decree dated 13th March, 2001 is a nullity, having been allegedly obtained by concealing material facts and playing fraud on the Court.[1462]

[s 107.7] Sub-section (2) to Section 107

The appeal is considered to be an extension of the suit because under section 107 of the CPC, the appellate court has the same powers as are conferred by the Code on courts of original jurisdiction in respect of suits instituted therein. Such a power can be exercised by the appellate court "as nearly as may be" exercised by the trial court under the CPC. If the powers conferred upon the trial court are under a specified statute and not under the CPC, it has to be ascertained as to whether such a power was intended to be exercised by the appellate court as well. Such a position can be ascertained by having a reference to the specified law by keeping in mind the legislative intention of conferment of power on the appellate court either expressly or by necessary implication.[1463]

Sub-section 2 confers upon the appellate court, powers and duties co-extensive with that of the trial court, unless stated otherwise by a statute governing the cause.[1464] Accordingly, where the evidence on record is sufficient, the appellate court can resettle the issues and finally determine the suit, notwithstanding that the judgment of the trial court has proceeded upon some ground other than that on which the appellate court proceeds;[1465] but the decision must be based on the pleas taken by the parties and not on grounds not taken in the pleadings.[1466] The appellate court has power under this section to give leave to a plaintiff to withdraw from a suit under O XXIII, rule 1.[1467] The appellate court also has power under this section to order the rejection of a memorandum of appeal under O VII, rule 13, and such rejection shall not of its own force preclude the appellant from filing a fresh memorandum of appeal.[1468] In a case before the Supreme Court, reading section 107(2) with section 149 of the CPC together and keeping fairness of procedure in view, it was held that, where the lower appellate court came to hold that the memorandum of appeal had not been sufficiently stamped, an opportunity should have been given by the court to the appellant to make good the balance court-fees within a time indicated and if, there was failure to comply with the directions of court, the memorandum of appeal could have been dismissed.[1469] The essence of a judgment is that it must be supported by reason. Importance of reasoning in judgment is all the more before the lower appellate court whose decision on finding of fact is binding on the high court in second appeal. If the judgment of the lower appellate court is unreasonable, it cannot be regarded as being in accordance with law. Therefore, where the lower appellate court simply agrees with the finding of fact recorded by the trial court, discusses the evidence on record and does not record its reasons in support of the finding, the finding will not be binding in second appeal.[1470] When a judgment is founded on misconception as to a concession made by an advocate, the proper procedure is to apply, by way of review, to the very court in whose judgment the error is alleged to have crept in, for a rectification of the mistake, if any, and it would not be proper for the appellate court to wipe out the effect of the so-called concession on considering the evidence.[1471] In a particular case, a court declined to decide the issue of jurisdiction as a preliminary issue. Evidence was recorded. Plaint was returned on a finding of want of jurisdiction without deciding the remaining issues. This was held to be invalid. The high court, in appeal, will not go into the merits of finding on issue of jurisdiction. Where an appeal is presented to a court which has no jurisdiction to entertain it, it can, under O VII, rule 10, read with this section pass an order that the memorandum be returned for presentation to the proper court.[1472] On the same reasoning, where an appeal against the decree of the subordinate judge is wrongly presented to the district court instead of the high court, and against the decree of the district court, a further appeal is taken to the high court, the high court should set aside the order of the district judge and direct him to return the memorandum of appeal for presentation to the proper court.[1473] Sections 104 and 107 do not prevent the high court from remanding the case to the trial court, for giving findings on all issues.[1474]

Under section 107 (2) of the Code it is open to appellate court to pass appropriate orders for injunction or stay during the pendency of the proceeding on an application filed for restoration of second appeal dismissed as being abated and application for substitution. It was held by the Allahabad High Court that the expression "all proceedings in any Court of civil jurisdiction" in section 141 of the Code is of wide import and injunction may be issued against persons who are sought to be substituted as heirs and legal representatives of the plaintiff.[1475]

Where a miscellaneous appeal was filed before the district court on rejection of the application for injunction and the district court came to the conclusion that it has no pecuniary jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. The only legal course open to the district court was to return the appeal for presentation before the appropriate Court. Thus, where the district court itself found that it had no jurisdiction but proceeded to decide the appeal on merit, the order was erroneous. Section 107 (2) read with O XXIII, rule 1 confers power on the appellate court to allow an appeal to be withdrawn.[1476]

Suit for declaration of title was dismissed where withdrawal can be permitted at the appellate stage. The CPC does not require the court to refuse permission to withdraw the suit in such circumstances and to compel the plaintiff to proceed with it. It is, of course, possible that different considerations may arise where a set-off may have been claimed or a counter-claim may have been filed, as per procedural law applicable to the proceedings governing the suit.[1477]

An appeal against a decree in a suit can, under this section, be referred to arbitration,[1478] but not one against an order in execution.[1479] An appeal under the Representation of the Peoples Act, 1951, can, under this section, be withdrawn as provided in O XXIII, rule 1, and the high court cannot refuse to permit it.[1480]

Leave to sue defendants who are not residing within the territorial limits of the court under section 20(b) can be granted by the appellate court in appropriate cases.[1481]

Ordinarily, a court of appeal cannot take into account a new law brought into existence after the judgment appealed from has been given. This is so because the rights of a litigant in an appeal are determined under the law in force at the date of suit. But if the new law either expressly or by necessary implication takes in even pending matters, the court of appeal must have regard to the legislative intention so expressed and give effect to such a law.[1482] The appellate court can also take into account facts and events which have come into existence after the judgment and decree appealed against were passed.[1483]

[s 107.8] This Section and Section 12(3) of Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947

Where the appellant, by filing the application under section 12(3) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, had not made a prayer to the appellate court for passing any order which the trial court intended to pass under the CPC. His prayer was to invoke the benefit conferred upon a tenant under the Act. The beneficial provision under the Act unequivocally provides that it can be availed of in the suit and that too on the first day of hearing of the suit or on or before such other date as the court may fix, the first date of hearing cannot be stretched to be any date beyond the date before the issues are framed in the suit. The object is to protect the bona fide tenants from being evicted on the grounds of default by affording them further opportunity to make the payment of the arrears of rent at least at two times during the subsistence of tenancy, the provision is not intended to confer a right without circumspection to be availed of by the tenant at any time according to his convenience.

The words "such other date as the court may fix" would not include the date fixed by the appellate court in terms of section 107 of the CPC. However, in the instant case vide its order dated 18 January 2001, the appellate court had not extended the time and expressly permitted the appellant to deposit the arrears of rent allegedly payable by him without prejudice to the rights of the other party, i.e., the landlords. The high court was, therefore, justified in holding that the appellant cannot take advantage of section 12(3) of the Act at the appellate stage which he had failed to avail of before the trial court. The appellant was rightly held to be in arrears of rent for more than six months from the date of filing of the suit and had failed to apply before the trial court on the first day of suit for depositing the arrears of rent.[1484]

[s 107.9] Difference Between Appeal and Revision

The legislature made a provision for discretionary remedy of revision which is indicative of the fact that the legislature has created two jurisdictions different from each other in scope and content in the form of an appeal and revision. An appeal is a continuation of suit or proceedings wherein the entire proceedings are again left open for consideration by the appellate authority which has the power to review the entire evidence, subject to the prescribed statutory limitation. But in the case of revision, whatever powers the revisional authority may have, it has no power to recess and re-appreciate the evidence unless the statute expressly confers on it that power. That limitation is implicit in the concept of revision.[1485]

The Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act (49 of 1973), which received the assent of the President on 11 November 1973, substituted the present section for the old section. The Amendment Act, 1973 also deleted section 110. The section as it stood before the amendment was as follows:

> Section 109. Subject to the provisions in Chapter IV of Part v of the Constitution and such rules as may, from time to time, be made by the Supreme Court regarding appeals from the Court of India, and to the provisions herein contained, an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court—
> (a) from any judgment, decree or final order passed on appeal by a High Court or by another Court of final appellate jurisdiction;
>
> (b) from any judgment, decree or final order passed by a High Court in the exercise of original civil jurisdiction; and
> (c) from any judgment, decree or order, when the case, as hereinafter provided, is certified to be a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.

The section, as it stood before its amendment in 1973, corresponded with section 595 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1882 (except that in clauses (a) and (b) the words "decree or final order" were substituted for the words "final decree", and in cl(c) the words "or Order" were added after the word "decree"). By the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950, the following amendments were made in the section:

(i) the words "subject to the provisions in Chapter IV of Part V of the Constitution and such rules" were substituted for the words "subject to such rules";

(ii) the words "the Supreme Court" were substituted for the words "His Majesty in Council";

(iii) in clause (b), the words "judgment, decree or final Order" were substituted for the words "decree or final order";

(iv) by Amendment Act 66 of 1956, the words "judgment, decree or, final order" were substituted for the words "decree or order" in clause (c).

The Amendment Act 1973 restructured the section by taking the words "from any judgment, decree or final order" in clause (a) into the main operative part of the section. It deleted the words "passed on appeal" and the words "or by any other court of final appellate jurisdiction;"

in cl(a) and substituted for clauses (a), (b) and (c) new clauses (i) and (ii). The words "any other court of final appellate jurisdiction" found in the unamended section 109 were omitted in Article 133 of the Constitution, the obvious intention being to confine appeals to the Supreme Court against judgment, decree or final order passed by a high court. Though these words remained in the unamended section 109, there could be no appeal to the Supreme Court except against an order passed by the high court since the section was subject to Article 133. Those words having been, thus, rendered superfluous by their omission from Article 133, they are now deleted from the section also. The word "court" in section 109 made it abundantly clear that the section did not cover a tribunal or body which was not a court within the Code of Civil Procedure or the Civil Courts Act. Though decisions of tribunals appointed under special status were not open to appeal to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court could grant leave to appeal under Article 136 of the Constitution in appropriate cases. Article 133, having restricted appeals to the Supreme Court from the orders of the high courts, there could not have been appeals to the Supreme Court against the orders passed by the judicial commissioners' courts. To get over this difficulty certain judicial commissioners courts for the purposes of Articles 132, 133 and 134 of the Constitution were declared by the Parliament to be high courts by enacting the Judicial Commissioners' Court (Declaration as High Courts) Act, 1950 and the Goa, Daman and Diu Judicial Commissioner's Court (Declaration as High Court) Act, 1964.

Section 109 is subject to the provisions of Chapter IV of Part V of the Constitution. The articles bearing on the right conferred by section 109 are Articles 132, 133 and 134A. Clause 1 of Article 132 provides that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a high court, whether in a civil, criminal or other proceeding, if the high court certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution. However, it is Article 133 which deals with the appeals under section 109. Article 133, before its amendment by the Constitution (Thirtieth Amendment) Act, 1972 was as follows:

> Article 133. Appellate Jurisdiction of Supreme Court in appeals from High Courts in regard to civil matters—
> (1) An appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court in the territory of India if the High Court certifies:
>
> (a) that the amount or value of the subject matter of the dispute in the court of the first instance and still in dispute on appeal was and is not less than twenty thousand rupees or such other sum as may be specified in that behalf by Parliament by law; or
>
> (b) that the judgment, decree or final order involves, directly or indirectly, some claim or question respecting property of the like amount or value; or
>
> (c) that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court; and where the judgment, decree or final order appealed from affirms the decision of the court immediately below in any case other than a case referred to in sub-clause (c), if the High Court further certifies that the appeal involves some substantial question of law.
> (2) Notwithstanding anything in Article 132, any party appealing to the Supreme Court under cl (1) may urge as one of the grounds in such appeal that a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of this Constitution has been wrongly decided.

(3) Notwithstanding anything in this Article, no appeal shall, unless Parliament by law otherwise provides, lie to the Supreme Court from the judgment, decree or final order of one Judge of a High Court.

Section 2 of the Constitution (Thirtieth Amendment) Act, 1972 which was brought into force with effect from 27 February 1973 substituted cl(1) of the article by the following clause:

(1) An appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court in the territory of India if the High Court certifies:

(a) that the case involves a substantial question of law of general importance; and

(b) that in the opinion of the High Court the said question needs to be decided by the Supreme Court.

Section 3 of the Constitution Thirtieth Amendment Act, 1972, makes special provision inter alia as to pending proceedings and provides:

(1) Nothing in this Act shall affect—

(a) any appeal under sub-clause (a) or sub-clause (b) or sub-clause (c) of clause (1) of Article 133 of the Constitution which immediately before the commencement of this Act was pending before the Supreme Court; or

(b) any appeal preferred on or after the commencement of this Act against any judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding of a High Court by virtue of a certificate given by the High Court before the commencement of this Act under sub-clause (a) or sub-clause (b) or sub-clause (c) of Article 133; and every such appeal may be heard and disposed of or as the case may be, entertained, heard and disposed of by the Supreme Court as if this Act had not been passed.

(2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (1) no appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court under clause (1) of article 133 of the Constitution from any judgment, decree or final order arising out of a suit or other civil proceeding which was instituted or commenced in any court before the commencement of this Act unless such appeal satisfies the provisions of that clause as amended by this Act.

The amended clause (1) of Article 133 does away with the criterion of the value of the subject matter of Rs 20,000 in the court of the first instance and in an appeal from its judgment, decree or final order. It also does away with the certificate by the high court to that effect and instead lays down two new criteria, both of which must be satisfied before an appeal to the Supreme Court can lie. The first is that the case involves a substantial question of law of general importance and the second, is that such a question needs, in the opinion of the high court, to be decided by the Supreme Court. The two conditions are thus cumulative, so made clear by the use of the word "and" at the end of sub-clause (a). Therefore, the mere circumstance that the proposed appeal involves a substantial question of law of general importance is not by itself sufficient. Even, where such a question is raised, the high court must ensure that it is such as needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. The meaning of the expression "substantial question of law" was given by the Supreme Court in Sir Chunilal v Mehta v Century Spg and Mfg Co Ltd,[1488] in the following terms:

> The proper test for determining whether a question of law raised in the case is substantial would be whether it is of general importance or whether it directly and substantially affects the rights of the parties and if so whether it is either an open question in the sense that it is not finally settled by this court or by the Privy Council or by the Federal court or is not > free from difficulty or calls for discussion of alternative views. If the question is settled by the highest court or the general principles to be applied in determining the question are well-settled and there is a mere question of applying those principles or that the plea raised is palpably absurd, the question would not the substantial question.

In the above case, the construction of a managing agency agreement, which was neither simple nor free from doubt, was held to be a substantial question of law.[1489] In another case, the question whether a dedication for the performance of gurupuja at a samadhi, and for conducting annadanam, was valid or not was held to be a substantial question of law.[1490] However, as aforestated, it is not enough that the case involves a substantial question of law. Such question must furthermore, be one of general importance. It has been decided by the High Court of Calcutta that the question whether revision lies from an award of an arbitrator appointed under section 19(1)(b) of the Defence of India Act, 1939, specially when there are a number of such applications pending, and where there exists a difference of opinion between two high courts, is a substantial question of law of general importance. The high court, however, expressed the view that Article 133(1) vested a wide discretion in the high court and held, in exercise of that discretion, that it was not a question which in its opinion needed to be decided by the Supreme Court.[1491] The mere fact that the refusal of the certificate is likely to cause inconvenience is no ground for its issuance.

The question next is to what appeals do the amended Article 133 and the amended section 109 apply? The ordinary rule is that a court of appeal cannot take into account a new law brought into existence after the judgment appealed from has been rendered. The reason underlying this rule is that the rights of litigants in an appeal are determined under the law in force, at the date of the institution of the suit. Courts have always looked with disfavour upon laws which take away vested rights or which affect pending cases. However, there is a distinction between procedural and substantive matters. The law affecting procedure is treated generally as retrospective. The right to an appeal to a superior tribunal is a very different thing from one regulating procedure and has since long been recognised as a substantive right.[1492] The right to appeal to the Supreme Court is also a constitutional right under Article 133 of the Constitution. Consequently, the appellate court must give effect to the same law which was in force at the date of the earlier proceeding.[1493] This is not an absolute rule of inviolability of substantive rights. As stated by the Supreme Court in Dayawati v Inderjit:[1494]

> If the new law speaks in language which expressly or by clear intendment takes in even pending matters, the Court of trial as well as the Court of appeal must have regard to an intention so expressed, and the Court of appeal must give effect to such a law even after the judgment of the Court of first instance. The distinction between laws affecting procedure and those affecting vested rights does not matter when the Court is invited by law to take away from a successful plaintiff what he has obtained under a judgment.[1495]

The Constitution (Thirtieth Amendment) Act, 1972 does contain, it is submitted, provisions as contemplated in the case of Dayawati v Inderjit. Section 3 of the Amendment Act, 1972 furnishes a special provision as to pending proceedings and expressly provides that nothing in the Act is to affect: (a) appeals pending before the Supreme Court immediately before the commencement of the Amendment Act; and (b) appeals, though preferred on or after the commencement of the Act, by virtue of certificates granted by the high courts under sub-clause (a) or (b) or (c) of the unamended Article 133(1) before the commencement of the Act. The fact that only two categories of appeals are saved by a specific provision does, it is apprehended, show that the rest of the appeals are governed by and are subject to the provisions of the amended Article 133 and amended section 109 of the CPC. This is also clear from sub-section 2 of section 3 of the Constitution Amendment Act, 1972 which provides that, subject to the provisions of sub-section 1, no appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court under clause (1) of Article 133 from any judgment, decree or final order arising out of a suit or other civil proceeding which was instituted or commenced in any court before the commencement of this Act, unless such an appeal satisfies the provisions of that clause as amended by this Act. This sub-section was intended to rule out the principle laid down in the case of Colonial Sugar Refining Co, that a right of appeal is a substantive right which cannot ordinarily be said to have been defeated by a new enactment, unless such enactment is expressly or by necessary intendment made retrospective.

The right to appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment, decree or final order in a civil proceeding is expressly given by Article 133 of the Constitution. It is, therefore, not necessary now to invoke the principles laid down in the series of cases beginning from Secretary of State v Chelikani Rama Rao,[1496] and ending with Pramatha Nath Roy v Sanat Kumar Mukerji,[1497] that once a civil proceeding reached the high court, the right of appeal conferred by sections 109 and 110 of the CPC would attach to these proceedings, notwithstanding that no right of appeal had been specially given by the relevant special statute. When a special statute dealing with a special class of cases uses, with reference to the decision given by a tribunal set up under that statute, the word "final", the use of this word must be taken to indicate an intention to override section 109 and no appeal will lie from that decision. There will be no right of appeal to the Supreme Court unless Parliament by law otherwise directs [Article 133(3) of the Constitution] from an order of a single judge of a high court either in a first appeal or a second appeal or in a revision.

However, mere filing of appeal in the Supreme Court does not operate as stay of proceedings in the Court below. The execution of a decree will not be stayed merely by reason of the filing of appeal against such decree. Mere pendency of Special Leave Petition before the Supreme Court cannot be a ground to direct the executing Court to stay its hands.[1498]

[s 109.4] Civil Proceedings

There is no right of appeal to the Supreme Court unless the judgment, decree or order is made in a civil proceeding. There has been some discussion in the courts as to the precise import of the words "civil proceeding". It has been said that the "simplest definition of civil proceeding is a proceeding in a court of civil jurisdiction, for example a civil court".[1499] It has also been observed that the words "civil proceedings" are used in opposition to criminal proceedings.[1500] Discussing this question, the High Court of Madras held in Krishnaswami v Council of Institute of Chartered Accountants,[1501] that it would not be right to say that a civil proceeding will include whatever is not a criminal proceeding, or that whatever comes before a civil court is a civil proceeding or that whatever jurisdiction is conferred by a statute is a civil proceeding. It held that it would depend on the character of the dispute whether it is a civil proceeding. The decisions of various high courts are fairly unanimous that any proceeding which involves an adjudication of a right to property or any other civil right will be a civil proceeding,[1502] and that it is the nature of the right involved, and not the form of the proceeding, that is determinative.[1503] A proceeding for the grant of patent under the Patents and Designs Act, 1911 is a civil proceeding.[1504]

[s 109.5] Writ Proceedings

There is a difference of judicial opinion on the question whether proceedings for a writ under Article 226 of the Constitution are civil proceedings. It has been held in Collector of Monghyr v Maharaj Pratap Singh,[1505] that the extraordinary jurisdiction vested in the high court under this article is not for the purpose of determining the rights of parties, but only to see that the tribunals act within their jurisdiction and is, therefore, not a civil proceeding. However, the preponderance of authority favours the view that if the order in a writ proceeding has the effect of finally deciding the rights of parties, it will be a civil proceeding.[1506] However, it has been held by a Full Bench of the Patna High Court that proceedings under Article 227 of the Constitution are, in contrast to those under Article 226, civil proceedings, and that orders passed thereon are open to appeal under Article 133.[1507] The view of the Patna High Court expressed in the case of Collector of Monghyr v Maharaj Pratap Singh above is no longer correct, in view of the Supreme Court having subsequently held that writ proceedings under Article 226 are civil proceedings as they directly involve civil rights of the contending parties.[1508] grant leave to appeal to the Supreme Court. Such an order is passed in the exercise of the administrative powers of the court. Similarly, an order by a high court striking an advocate off the rolls under its disciplinary jurisdiction conferred by clause 8 of the Letters Patent is one from which the high court has no power to grant leave to appeal. The principles underlying the decisions in Re Sudhansu[1509] and Re An Advocate,[1510] apply in such a case. (For the view of Calcutta, Bombay, Madras and Patna High Courts on the point, see note to clause 39 of the Letters Patent of the High Court of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras). According to the High Court of Allahabad, it has been the practice of that court to grant leave in a fit case, such as when a pleader's name[1511] or an advocate's name[1512] is struck off the rolls. The Supreme Court has power under Article 136 to interfere with an order passed by the high court in the exercise of disciplinary jurisdiction in proceedings against a legal practitioner, but only in exceptional cases.[1513]

[s 109.7] Proceedings by way of Arbitration

Where a dispute was referred to the decision of arbitrators under the Defence of India Rules and against the decision an appeal was taken to the court, as provided under the rules, it was held by the Supreme Court that this was not a judgment open to appeal under Article 133 as it was really an award with the imprimatur of the court impressed on it.[1514] Proceedings before a tribunal appointed under the Kanpur Urban Area Development Act, 1945 are really in the nature of arbitration and the decision of the arbitrator is not a judgment open to appeal,[1515] nor a decision by the high court in an appeal preferred under the Uttar Pradesh Towns Improvement Act, 1920.[1516] An appeal by special leave under Article 136 against an award made under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 is not an appeal as of a right.[1517]

[s 109.8] Election Cases

It was held in VV Giri v DS Dora,[1518] that a decision in an appeal, preferred under the Representation of the Peoples Act, 1951, raising the question of the validity of an election was not a civil proceeding and that accordingly, no leave to appeal could be granted under Article 133. However, the weight of authority is decidedly against this view.[1519]

[s 109.9] Contempt Proceedings

The Privy Council has held that a committal for a finding, by a high court, of contempt for breach of an injunction is not criminal in its nature, and that leave to appeal may be granted

[s 109.10] Judgment on a Reference Under Section 66 of the Income Tax Act, 1922

The high court, hearing a reference under section 66 of the Income Tax Act, 1922, exercises an advisory jurisdiction and its opinion is not a judgment, decree or final order within Article 133 of the Constitution or this section.[1522] For the same reason, it has been held that a judgment given on a reference under section 108(1) of the Saurashtra Income Tax Ordinance 1949, is not open to appeal under this section;[1523] nor an order made on a reference under section 24 of the United Provinces Agriculturists Income Tax Act, 1948.[1524] A decision given by the high court on a point of law referred to it by the revenue authorities under section 21 of the Bihar Sales Tax Act, 1944 is not a judgment within the meaning of this section. It is only an opinion,[1525] and so is an order delivered under section 24(5) of the Cochin Sales Tax Act.[1526] It has also been held that a writ to quash assessment of income tax, under section 23 of the Income Tax Act, 1922, is not a civil proceeding and the order passed therein is not open to appeal under this section.[1527]

[s 109.11] Judgment

The word "judgment" occurs in this section and Article 133 of the Constitution. It was also used in section 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935. It has been held that in the context in which it occurs, the word signifies not the reasons in support of a decision, but a decision which finally adjudicates on the rights of the parties and that an interlocutory judgment, which merely decides an issue or issues without finally determining the rights and liabilities of the parties is not a judgment within this section, however, cardinal the issue might be.[1528]

[s 109.13] Preliminary Decree

An appeal would lie to the Supreme Court from a preliminary decree, for example, a decree declaring the liability of a party and directing accounts to be taken on the same principles as laid down in Sanyasi v Krishnadhan.[1529]

[s 109.14] Final Order

In Ramchand v Goverdhandas,[1530] the Privy Council said that an order is final if it finally disposes off the rights of the parties. In that case, a stay order under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1940 had been reversed and the suit went back for trial. The appellate court had thought that the order was final as it "went to the root of the suit, namely the jurisdiction of the court to entertain it" and it was for this reason that the order was supposed to be final; but it was not so where the parties were still under trial. In Abdul Rahman v Cassim,[1531] a suit for damages had been dismissed on a preliminary ground and the high court, on appeal, reversed the decree and remanded the suit for trial on the merits under O XLI, rule 23. The Privy Council held that this was not a final order. The test has been laid down by Sir George Lowndes in the following terms—

> The finality must be a finality in relation to the suit. If, after the order, the suit is still a live suit in which the rights of the parties have still to be determined, no appeal lies against it under Section 109.[1532]

Their Lordships distinguished the previous Privy Council decisions of Rahimbhoy v Turner,[1533] and Muzhar Hossein v Bodha,[1534] as decided under the Code of Civil Procedure 1882. In Rahimbhoy v Turner,[1535] the order was one determining the defendant's liability to account and directing accounts to be taken. This was held to be the final order as it determined the cardinal point in the suit which was the defendant's liability to account. In Muzhar Hossein v Bodha,[1536] the suit was to recover property which was the subject of a gift by a will. The validity of the will was disputed and the high court, differing from the court of first instance, held that the will was valid and remanded the suit for subordinate inquiries. The Privy Council held that the order was a final order as it comprised a decision of the cardinal issue in the suit, namely, the validity of the will. The order in Rahimbhoy's case was one which under the present Code would be a preliminary decree. With reference to Muzhar Hossein's case the Privy Council said that if the effect of the decree had been merely to remand the suit for trial on the merits, a different consideration would have applied. In an earlier case, where the lower court refused to set aside an ex parte decree and the high court remanded the suit for an inquiry on the merits, the Privy Council held that the order of the high court was not a final order but a purely interlocutory order directing procedure.[1537] The meaning of the words "final order" has been considered in a number of decisions by the Federal court and the Supreme Court. The result of the authorities might, thus, be summed up—if the order amounts to a final decision on the rights of the parties in dispute in the proceeding, it is a final order; but if the proceeding still remains to be tried even after the order is made, and the rights in dispute have still to be determined, then the order is interlocutory.[1538] If the order finally determines all the rights of the parties, but proceedings have to be taken to give effect to it, it is in the nature of a preliminary decree and is a final order.[1539]

Order of Remand.—When the lower court dismisses a suit on the ground that it is barred by limitation, and the high court, reversing the decision, remands the suit for trial, the order is interlocutory.[1540] An order remanding a suit for decision on the merits is therefore, not a final order.[1541] The contrary view expressed in Shantilal v Raj Narain,[1542] is, it is submitted, not correct. There are a few decisions in which orders of remand, which did not decide finally the rights of parties, have been held to be final but they cannot be regarded as laying down the law correctly.[1543]

An order refusing to appoint a receiver in a suit is not a final order and no appeal lies to the Privy Council.[1544] In a case where the high court discharged an order made by the district court appointing a receiver and the high court granted leave to appeal, the Privy Council observed that as a general rule and in the absence of special circumstances or some unusual occasion for its exercise, the power of making interlocutory order was one which was not a suitable subject for review by the judicial committee.[1545] An order passed in an appeal against an order appointing a receiver under O XL, rule 1, is not a final order open to appeal under this section[1546] nor is an order issuing an injunction restraining the defendant from proceeding with a suit in another court.[1547]

The following are further instances of orders which have been held not to be final orders:

The Explanation to Article 132 of the Constitution states that the expression "final order" used in that article includes an order deciding an issue which, if decided in favour of the appellant, would be sufficient for the final disposal of the case. It is submitted that this Explanation should now be the guide.[1571]

[s 109.15] High Court

Clause (a) of the unamended section 109 provided that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order passed on an appeal by a high court or by any other court of final appellate jurisdiction. There were a number of occasions when the question arose whether a decree or a final order passed by a high court was a decree or an order passed on an appeal. Those decisions have now ceased to be of any use in view of these words having been omitted in Article 133 of the Constitution. There were also cases where it was held that by reason of the words passed "on an appeal" in section 109 as it then stood, no appeal lay before the Privy Council against an order in a revision as such an order was not one "passed on an appeal". However, since these words were omitted in Article 133 and section 109 was subject to that article, an order passed in revision would be appealable to the Supreme Court.[1572] The decision to the contrary in Radhakisan Laxminarayan v VR Oke,[1573] is, it is submitted, not correct as it does not take into account the change in law made by Article 133 and the amended section 109.

The unamended section 109 also contained in cl(a) thereof the words "by any other court of final appellate jurisdiction". Before the Constitution was promulgated, an appeal lay to the Privy Council from a final order passed by a district judge[1574] of a judicial commissioner's court[1575] made under section 104. These words, however, did not occur in Article 133 and as section 109 was subject to that Article, there could be no appeal to the Supreme Court except against an order passed by a high court. These words have now been omitted in the amended section 109, in order that its language is in consonance with Article 133. The result of this omission would be to preclude appeals to the Supreme Court from decrees and final orders by the judicial commissioner's courts. To avoid such a result the Parliament has declared, for the purposes of Articles 133 and 134, certain Judicial Commissioners' Courts to be high courts (see the Judicial Commissioners' Courts (Declaration as High Courts) Act, 1950 and the Goa, Daman and Diu Judicial Commissioner's Court (Declaration as High Court Act, 1964).

The word "court" in the section cannot include any tribunal or body which is not a court within the meaning of Code of Civil Procedure or the Civil Courts Act. Consequently, a decision of the rent controller under the West Bengal Premises Rent Control Order is not appealable under this section.[1576] In Karuppan Chettiar v State of Madras,[1577] the High Court of Madras has held that decisions of tribunals appointed under special statutes are not open to appeal to the Supreme Court under this section. The Supreme Court can grant leave to appeal under Article 136 of the Constitution in appropriate cases. However, such appeals are not as of right under this section.

Under Article 179 of the Limitation Act, 1908, the period of limitation prescribed for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court was 90 days from the date of the decree.[1578] The matter is now governed by Article 133 of the Limitation Act, 1963, which also prescribes the same period. Article 133, cl(b) provides that where leave is refused by the high court, an application for special leave in the Supreme Court must be filed within 60 days of the order of refusal.

Under the Limitation Act of 1877, it was held that in computing the aforesaid period, the time requisite for obtaining a copy of the decree appealed from could not be excluded, as section 12 of that Act did not apply to such applications.[1579] It was also held that the application could not be admitted after the expiration of the aforesaid period, even though there was sufficient cause for not presenting the application within the prescribed period as section 5 of the Act did not apply to such applications.[1580] Both these sections were amended in the Limitation Act, 1908, and they were made applicable to applications for leave to appeal. The decisions, therefore, under the Limitation Act, 1877, ceased to be law and it was expressly held that under section 12 of the Limitation Act, 1908, the time requisite to obtain copy of the decree appealed from was to be excluded.[1581] The matter is now governed by sections 5 and 12 of the Limitation Act, 1963, under which the position is the same as under the Limitation Act, 1908.

An award by the court under Part III of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, is deemed to be a decree.[1582] An appeal, therefore, lies from a decree of a high court on an appeal from such an award. In such a case, the Privy Council would not interfere in matters involving valuation of a property unless the judgment was not supported as it stood, either by reason of a wrong application of principle or because some important part of the evidence had been overlooked or misapplied.[1583]

[s 109.18] Interlocutory Orders

By Article 136 of the Constitution, the Supreme Court has the power to grant a special leave in its discretion. The practice of the Privy Council, as a rule, was not to grant special leave unless there was some substantial question of general interest involved.[1584] In a fit case, such a leave was granted even where the high court had refused a leave[1585] or even where it had been granted wrongly by the high court.[1586] Where special leave was granted the appeal was to be confined to the ground on which special leave was granted.[1587] Where special leave was granted as ex parte application, it did not preclude the Privy Council from going into the question, when true facts were brought to its notice of competency at special leave.[1588]

[s 109.19] Clause (I), Section 109

The first condition for an appeal to the Supreme Court, now, is that the case must involve a substantial question of law, which question is also of general importance. For the meaning of the expression "substantial question of law of general importance" see the commentary under the heading "Scope of the Section" above.

[s 109.20] Clause (II), Section 109

Over and above the requirements of cl(i) and cl(ii) requires that the case in the opinion of the high court must be such that it needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. Article 133 and this section as amended, having dropped the criterion of the value of the subject matter, no matter how considerable such value may be, the only condition which now gives the right of an appeal to the Supreme Court is the existence of a substantial question of law of general importance, and the opinion of the high court that the question, so involved, needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. Accordingly, a question involved in the case may be a substantial question of law of general importance and yet, in the opinion of the high court, it may not be such as needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. If a previous decision of the Supreme Court has laid down principles applicable to such a question, the high court may refuse to certify that a subsequent case, which involves the same question and requires only the application of the principles earlier laid down, needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. However, if the decision of the high court affects not only a particular litigant but also involves questions of great public importance, a certificate will presumably be issued.[1589] That would also be so where the question involved is a substantial point of law of general importance, and either it has not been so far decided or there is, upon it, a conflict of opinion among different high courts.

The tests applied by the Privy Council in cases such as Benarasi Prasad v Kashi Krishna,[1590] and Radhakrishna v Swaminatha[1591] under clause (e) of the unamended section 109, that is cases in which the points in issue are not measurable in terms of money but they are of great public importance including questions relating to religious rights and ceremonies, or caste rights or privileges, still hold validity. Where a petition was made by a company for certificate to appeal to the Privy Council, on the ground that the financial and commercial position of the company might be seriously affected by the question at issue, and those questions were of importance to companies generally, the high court issued the certificate. The order sought to be challenged in that case was one dismissing a petition for confirmation of a special resolution altering the memorandum of association.[1592] Similarly, the question as to the right of Mahomedans to take out religious processions is one of general importance to both the Hindu and Mahommedan communities, and was held to be a fit case for appeal to the Privy Council.[1593] It is submitted that such a question would be a fit one for a certificate under the present section. A question cannot be said to be of general importance unless it is such as is likely to arise frequently for decision and affect many parties in litigation. However, a question which has been settled by the highest authority is not one which can be certified as fit to be decided by the Supreme Court.[1594] The fact that there is divergence of opinion may not in itself be a ground for the grant of a certificate but that fact would have an important bearing on whether the question is one of public or private importance.[1595] It is submitted that these decisions still have validity under the amended section. Questions such as the validity of section 20 of the Uttar Pradesh Zamindari Abolition Act, 1951, and as to the power of the Board of Revenue under the Act to entertain a second application for review[1596] or as to the interpretation of section 123(7)(f) of the Representation of Peoples Act, 1951[1597] or of rule 56 of the Fundamental Service Rules[1598] have been held to be questions on which certificates of fitness under clause (c) of the unamended section 109 were granted. It is conceived that a certificate under clauses (i) and (ii) of the present section would be issued by the high court if such questions were to arise since they are, without doubt, substantial questions of law of general importance and need to be decided by the highest court of the realm. On similar consideration the decision in Guru Govind Basu v Sankari Prasad Ghosal[1599] still has validity, where a certificate of fitness was granted under clause (c) of the unamended section 109 for the question whether a partner in a firm of chartered accountants appointed as auditors of Life Insurance Corporation of India and other government concerns, held an office of profit under Article 102 of the Constitution.

As against the certificate of fitness for an appeal to the Supreme Court under clause (c) of the unamended section 109, the certificate issued now is a dual one. First, it must state that the case involves a substantial question of law of general importance and secondly, it must state that such a question, in the opinion of the high court, needs to be decided by the Supreme Court. The act of certifying, though left to the discretion of the high court, is a judicial act which cannot be performed without special exercise of that discretion evinced by the certificate.[1600] Under the unamended section, the certificate had to make plain upon its face that the discretion conferred on the high court was invoked and exercised.[1601] It was also the rule that it was the certificate, and not the order for the certificate, which had to be considered and acted upon; and unless the certificate upon which a leave to an appeal was based was in such a form as to justify that leave, it could not be held that the leave was properly granted.[1602] It is submitted that these rules are applicable under the present section.

[s 109.21] Revocation of Certificate

When a certificate is granted under this clause without sufficient grounds thereof, the Supreme Court may vacate it.[1603] It is, however, open to the appellant to support the grant of a certificate on a ground different from the one on which it is based.[1604]

[s 109.22] Proceedings Under Patents and Designs Act, 1911 now Repealed by the Patents Act, 1970 and the Designs Act, 2000

An application to the controller under the Act for the grant of patent is a civil proceeding, as it involves the right to use it exclusively for a period, and that is property. An appeal to the high court under section 23F of the Act, against an order granting a licence, would likewise be a civil proceeding. However, as the high court acts, in hearing the appeal, as a persona designata, and not as an ordinary court, no appeal lies against its decision to the Supreme Court, under this section or Article 133 of the Constitution.[1605]

The basis of the value of the subject matter of the suit which gave the right to an appeal was also omitted from Article 133 which had been amended by the Constitution (Thirtieth Amendment) Act, 1972. Although section 3 of that Amendment Act excludes the applicability of the amended article, such an exclusion is in respect of two categories of appeals only, viz: (a) appeals pending before the Supreme Court at the date of the commencement of the amended article; and (b) appeals in respect of which certificates were already granted before such commencement. It would seem that in neither case the section before its deletion or the commentary thereon, would henceforth be of any practical use and hence, they are not reproduced here.

This sub-section was substituted by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The section declares that nothing in the CPC affects the jurisdiction conferred upon the Supreme Court by Article 136 of the Constitution. Before, independence His Majesty-in-Council had a similar jurisdiction by the virtue of the royal prerogative.[1607] In view of section 112 of the CPC, the Supreme Court's power under Article 136 is not effected by rule 3B of O XXIII of the Code.[1608] Though the powers of the Supreme Court under Article 136 are expressed in wide terms, the court has accepted the Privy Council's procedure of using those powers sparingly and in limited classes of cases. For example, where the case is of a grave nature involving a matter of important. question of law, or where the case is, otherwise, of public importance, or where interference by the court promotes the cause of justice.[1609] A special leave under Article 136 will not, thus, be given as a matter of course. Though the Supreme Court will not ordinarily interfere with a finding of fact, it should not refrain from doing so, where it has been arrived at upon an erroneous approach and otherwise suffers from a number of infirmities.[1610]

[s 112.2] Extension of Time to Furnish Security

Order XII, rule 3 of the Supreme Court Rules runs as follows—

> Where an appellant, having obtained a certificate from the High Court fails to furnish the security or make the deposit required, the court may, on its own motion or on application in that behalf made by the respondent, cancel the certificate and may give such directions > as to the costs of the appeal and the security entered into by the appellant as it shall think fit or make such further or other order as the justice of the case requires.

It has been held that the high court has power under this section read with O XII, rule 3, of the Supreme Court Rules to extend the time for furnishing security, even beyond the limit prescribed under O XLV, rule 7.[1611] However, where the petitioner does not deposit security in time nor apply for extension of time and in consequence leave is revoked, an application for review of the order under O XLVII, rule 1, or a second application for leave is barred under this section.[1612] (For history of admiralty jurisdiction and details of relevant enactments, see Law Commission Report on British Statutes).[1613]

It is pertinent to note that while sub-section (1) of section 112 provides for excluding the entire CPC in connection with the topics covered by sub-clauses (a) and (b) of sub-section (1) thereof, pertaining to powers of the Supreme Court in appeals, sub-section (2) of section 112 conspicuously does not contain the same phraseology, i.e., the words "nothing contained in this Code"; instead, it uses the phraseology "nothing herein contained", meaning thereby, nothing contained in the sub-topic "appeals to the Supreme Court" would apply to admiralty or vice-admiralty jurisdiction amongst others and nothing more. The said provision cannot get telescoped into any other part of the CPC nor can it travel beyond the limited scope and periphery of its operation as indicated in the said provision.[1614]

REFERENCE, REVIEW AND REVISION

[S 113] Reference to High Court.—Subject to such conditions and limitations as may be prescribed, any Court may state a case and refer the same for the opinion of the High Court, and the High Court may make such order thereon as it thinks fit.

[1][Provided that where the Court is satisfied that a case pending before it involves a question as to the validity of any Act, Ordinance or Regulation or of any provision contained in an Act, Ordinance or Regulation, the determination of which is necessary for the disposal of the case, and is of opinion that such Act, Ordinance, Regulation or provision is invalid or inoperative, but has not been so declared by the High Court to which that Court is subordinate or by the Supreme Court, the Court shall state a case setting out its opinion and the reasons therefor, and refer the same for the opinion of the High Court.

Explanation.—In this section, "Regulation" means any Regulation of the Bengal, Bombay or Madras Code or Regulation as defined in the General Clauses Act, 1897 (10 of 1897), or in the General Clauses Act of a State].

[s 113.2] Any Court

It has been held that in the absence of a definition in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC), the word "court" must be construed as meaning courts governed by the CPC and that it would comprise courts of civil jurisdiction established under the local Civil Courts Act.[2]

1. Inserted by CPC Amendment Act 24 of 1951, section 2.
2. Phul Kumari v State, AIR 1957 All 495.

The collector, acting under the provisions of the Bombay Mamlatdars' Court Act, 1906, is not a court within this section[3] nor a tribunal constituted under the Central Provinces and Berar Relief of Indebtedness Act, 1939.[4] In a case before the High Court of Allahabad, it was held that the high court has no power under this section to entertain a reference from the Benaras State Court of an application submitted to His Highness, the Maharaja of Benaras in a civil case.[5] But a reference by the Improvement Trust Tribunal constituted under the Uttar Pradesh Town Improvement Act, 1919, is competent under this section as the provisions of the CPC have been extended to proceedings before it.[6] A reference by a subordinate court under section 113 must set out its opinion and grounds for doubting the validity of the law.[7]

The full bench of the Gauhati High Court dealt with a question that whether the reference of the review petition made to full bench passed by division bench was maintainable. It was held that though normally the review petition was to be heard by the same bench whose judgment was sought to be reviewed, or at least by a bench in which one of the members of the division bench was also a member, in case both the members were not present, the Chief Justice, could withdraw any pending proceeding from any bench and allot the same to another bench. In the instant case, the Chief Justice had passed the order on the administrative side constituting the full bench for hearing the matter relating to the foreigners. Hence, it was held that it could not be said that the reference to the full bench was not maintainable.[8]

The proviso appended to section 113 postulates that when there is a question before the civil court relating to the validity of any Act, ordinance or regulation or any provision of an Act which in its opinion is invalid or becomes inoperative, but has not been declared by the high court as such, then only the civil court may state the case and refer the matter for the opinion of the high court.[9]

The power under section 113 is subject to the prescribed conditions, that is, the conditions laid down in O XLVI.[10] The proviso and the explanation to the section were added as also section 432 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, by section 2 of the Code of Civil and Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1951. The object of these provisions is to enable questions as to the validity of an Act, ordinance or regulation or of any provision therein, to be decided speedily by the highest tribunal.[11] Before a reference could be made under this section, the conditions laid down in the proviso must be strictly complied with. The question must relate to the vires of an Act, ordinance or regulation or of any provision therein. This section has no application when the question raised is as to the validity of a notification,[12] or a rule or bye-law or order issued under an enactment,[13] or of a right or custom of pre-emption not turning on any provision of a statute.[14] When a division bench of the high court had already decided the question as to validity of an Act, section 113 has no application.[15] A reference would not be competent under this section if a decision on the question raised is not necessary for the determination of the case.[16] A reference of hypothetical questions or of points likely to arise in future is incompetent.[17] A subordinate court can make a reference to the high court under section 113, only if the subordinate court entertains a doubt about the validity of any impugned Act, ordinance or regulation, the determination of which was necessary for the disposal of the case and the court must be of the opinion that the same is ultra vires. It can, then, state the case, setting out its opinion, with the reasons therefor, and state the same for the opinion of the high court. Where no such finding or reason for its opinion are given, the reference will not be competent.[18] To attract this section, it is necessary that the court should itself feel some doubts on the question. Where, therefore, the court had formed an opinion but made a reference because that opinion was in conflict with that of another court, it was held that that was not within this section.[19]

Where no issue is involved in the case relating to the validity of any ordinance, regulation or any Act or any provision of any Act which has become invalid but which has not been declared as such by the high court, necessitating the civil court to refer the matter to the high court for its opinion, having regard to the pleadings in the plaint and in the light of the relief claimed by the plaintiff, no such issue, prima facie, appears to be involved in the proceedings requiring the opinion of the high court, therefore, no reference under section 113 can be made.[20]

Reference was made to the high court under section 113, CPC by the lower court. The court found that the reference does not pertain to the matters testing the constitutional validity of any Act, ordinance or regulation, i.e., the condition of the proviso to section 113 is not fulfilled. Further, court observed that the reference made to it pertains to the interpretation of the terms of the decree, and the order passed by the hon'ble apex court in special leave petition (SLP) between the parties which are outside the scope of reference.[21] Court noted that as per O XLVI, rule 1, CPC, reference cannot be made of such matters which are appealable and in the instant case the application filed is appealable and thus, the court stated that the reference made to it is misconceived in law.[22]

Where the trial court is not satisfied that the question as to the validity of an Act, etc, is involved and categorically states that no case is made out for making such a reference, its discretion cannot be interfered with in revision.[23] It has also been held that a reference can be made only after the court records its prima facie finding that the impugned Act or proviso is bad.[24] In Raja Ganga Pratap v Allahabad Bank,[25] the appellant questioned the validity of section 2(f) of the Uttar Pradesh Zamindars Debt Reduction Act, 1953, under which certain debts were excluded from the operation of the Act and applied for a reference under this section. He claimed the section to be discriminatory. That was refused on the ground that if section 2(f) was void, the whole section must be struck down on the ground that the offending portion was not severable from the rest and that in that view, the appellant would not be benefited. It was held by the Supreme Court reversing this order that the challenge of section 2(f) fell within section 113 and the appellant was in consequence entitled to a reference. It was, further, held that the question as to the severability of the offending portion would arise only after the validity of section 2(f) was determined and that would not affect the right of the appellant to a reference. It has been held that a party who claims under a statute has no right to impugn it and call for a reference under this section.[26] After a question is referred, if a new aspect of law touching the question arises, the high court is justified in answering the question with reference to such new aspect, provided it does not entail any fresh investigation into facts.[27] The reference is restricted to the specific point referred to for the opinion of the high court and therefore, the high court is not seized of the proceeding which remains pending before the court making the reference. An application in suit for reference of the appointment of a receiver, therefore, is not maintainable before the high court proving such reference.[28] Once the high court has answered the question referred to it by rejecting the reference, nothing further survives for the high court to decide.[29]

Section 114 of the CPC empowers a court to review its order if the conditions precedents laid down therein are satisfied. The substantive provision of law does not prescribe any limitation on the power of the court except those which are expressly provided in section 114 of the CPC in terms whereof it is empowered to make such order as it thinks fit. [30]

Sinha, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> 93. It is also not correct to contend that the Court while exercising its review jurisdiction in any situation whatsoever cannot take into consideration a subsequent event. In a case of this nature when the Court accepts its own mistake in understanding the nature and purport of the undertaking given by the learned Senior Counsel appearing on behalf of the Board and its correlation with as to what transpired in the AGM of the Board held on 29th September, 2004, the subsequent event may be taken into consideration by the Court for the purpose of rectifying its own mistake.[31]

Explaining the scope and ambit of the power of review, the Supreme Court, in the above judgment, quoted with approval a passage from its earlier judgment,[32] which was in relation to the rights of trustees of Malankara Jacobite Syrian Church in Kerala:

> Before going into the merits of the case it is as well to bear in mind the scope of the application for review which has given rise to the present appeal. It is needless to emphasise that the scope of an application for review is much more restricted than that of an appeal. Under the provisions in the Travancore Code of Civil Procedure which is similar in terms of O XLVII, rule 1 of our Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, the Court of review has only a limited jurisdiction circumscribed by the definitive limits fixed by the language used therein. It may allow a review on three specified grounds, namely (i) discovery of new and important matter or evidence which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within the applicant's knowledge or could not be produced by him at the time when the decree was passed, (ii) mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, and (iii) for any other sufficient reason. It has been held by the Judicial Committee that the words "any other sufficient reason" must mean "a reason sufficient on grounds, at least analogous to those specified in the rule".

The full bench of the Patna High Court[33] has held that under section 114 of the Code, any person, considering himself aggrieved by a decree or order of a court from which appeal is allowed, but no appeal is preferred, or where there is no provision for appeal against the order or decree, may apply for review of the decree or order, as the case may be, in the court, which made the order or passed the decree. Broadly speaking, thus, under section 114 of the Code, review of a decree or order is possible if no appeal is provided against such a decree or order or where the provisions for appeal exist, but no appeal has been preferred. This is the substantive power of review. This substantive power of review under section 114 has not laid down any condition as a condition precedent for the exercise of the power of review nor has section 114 imposed any fetters on the court's power to review its decision.

Justice IA Ansari held that—

> (i) Ordinarily, a court or a tribunal cannot review its order or decision if the statute does not confer on the court or the tribunal, as the case may be, the power to review its own order. This apart, whatever limitations are imposed by a statute, while conferring the power of review on a court or a tribunal, the court or the tribunal, as the case may be, must adhere to the limitations, which the relevant statute may impose on the exercise of such power. Section 114 CPC, which embodies the substantive power of review of a civil court, does not impose any limitations on the court's power to review its order or decision; yet the power of review even by a civil court cannot be unguided and uncanalised, for, Order 47, Rule 1 circumscribes the court's power of review.
> (ii) Though, at one point of time, it was considered to be a rule of universal application that review by a court of its order is not possible except on three prescribed grounds, namely, (i) discovery of new and important matter or evidence, which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within the applicant's knowledge or could not be produced by him at the time, when the decree or order was passed and (ii) mistake or error apparent on the face of the record or (iii) any such sufficient ground, which is analogous to the two grounds aforementioned, the subsequent development of law, on the subject of review, has shown that the grounds referred to, namely, that any sufficient ground must be analogous to the two sufficient grounds aforementioned is no longer a rule of universal application.
>
> (iii) One of the cases, which has helped in the expansion of the court's power to review its order is the case of Lily Thomas (supra) inasmuch as Lily Thomas (supra) ruled that ordinarily, the power of review, being a creature of statute, cannot be exercised as an inherent power, yet such technicalities of law may have to be bent, in an appropriate cases, for the purpose of correcting an order committed by the court if such an error arises out of a presumption of fact, which was nonexistent, and when the court finds that its refusal to review its own error would cause, or has caused, grave miscarriage of justice.
> (iv) It is essentially the principle behind the doctrine of "actus curiae neminem gravabit", which has made the court hold, in Municipal Board, Pratabgarh (supra), that when a court corrects and rectifies an error, it restores the rule of law and not defeat it. Even Rajesh D. Darbar v Narasingrao Krishnaji Kulkarni, reported in (2003) 7 SCC 219, recognises that in an exceptional case, a court may have to review its order by invoking the doctrine of "actus curiae neminem gravabit".

Explaining the scope of this section, the Delhi High Court ruled that disputed questions of fact, which are not amenable to writ jurisdiction, cannot be permitted to be taken on record by way of review. It was held that the petitioner's claim for benefit of one-time settlement in terms of the guidelines issued by the Reserve Bank of India is not borne out by the facts of the case.[34]

An important question regarding amenability of orders of civil courts to the writ jurisdiction under Article 226 of the Constitution came up, on reference, before the three-judge bench of the apex court in Radhey Shyam v Chhabi Nath.[35] The reference was made by the two-judge bench, which, vide order dated 15 April 2009,[36] doubted the correctness of the law laid down in Surya Dev Rai v Ram Chander Rai,[37] where it was held that an order of the civil court is amenable to the writ jurisdiction of the high court under Article 226 of the Constitution of India. In Surya Dev Rai, the two-judge bench of the Supreme Court did not follow the ratio laid down by a nine-judge constitutional bench in Mirajkar[38] and one of the reasons it accorded for not following the said ratio was that "the law relating to certiorari changed both in England and in India". The three-judge bench in Radhey Shyam overruled Surya Dev Rai and reaffirmed the correctness of the ratio laid down in Mirajkar. The bench categorically stated that the challenge to orders of judicial courts lie by way of appeal or revision under the relevant statutory provisions or under Article 227 of the Constitution and not by way of a writ either under Article 226 or Article 32. Comparing the position under the Constitution with the law relating to writs in England, it observed:

> It is true that this Court has laid down that technicalities associated with the prerogative writs in England have no role to play under our constitutional scheme. There is no parallel system of King's Court in India and of all the other courts having limited jurisdiction subject to the supervision of the King's Court. Courts are set up under the Constitution or the laws. All courts in the jurisdiction of a High Court are subordinate to it and subject to its control and supervision under Article 227. Writ jurisdiction is constitutionally conferred on all High Courts. Broad principles of writ jurisdiction followed in England are applicable to India and a writ of certiorari lies against patently erroneous or without jurisdiction orders of tribunals or authorities or courts other than judicial courts. There are no precedents in India for High Courts to issue writs to subordinate courts. Control of working of subordinate courts in dealing with their judicial orders is exercised by way of appellate or revisional powers or power of superintendence under Article 227. Orders of the civil court stand on different footing from the orders of authorities or tribunals or courts other than judicial/civil courts.

In Himalayan Co-op Group Housing Society v Balwan Singh,[39] another three-judge bench of the Supreme Court, while dealing with an issue relating to the jurisdiction of the high courts under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution, made reference to Radhey Shyam and observed that:

> The scope and extent of power of the writ court in a petition filed under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution came up for consideration before a three-Judge Bench of this Court in the recent case of Radhey Shyam v Chhabi Nath. This Court observed that the writ of certiorari under Article 226 though directed against the orders of an inferior court would be distinct and separate from the challenge to an order of an inferior court under Article 227 of the Constitution. The supervisory jurisdiction comes into play in the latter case and it is only when the scope and ambit of the remedy sought for does not fall in the purview of the scope of supervisory jurisdiction under Article 227, the jurisdiction of the Court under Article 226 could be invoked.

From the author's point of view, the above observation is not wholly correct. It does not seem that the three-judge bench in Himalayan Co-op Group Housing Society had correctly appreciated the principle laid down in Radhey Shyam.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held in various judgments that the jurisdiction and scope of review is not that of an appeal and it can be entertained only if there is an error apparent on the face of the record. The following grounds of review are maintainable:

(i) Discovery of new and important matter or evidence which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within the knowledge of the petitioner or could not be produced by him;

(ii) Mistake or error apparent on the face of the record;

(iii) Any other sufficient reason.

The words "any other sufficient reason" have been interpreted in Chhajju Ram v Neki,[40] and approved by the Supreme Court in Moran Mar Basselios Catholicos v Most Rev. Mar Poulose Athanasius,[41] to mean "a reason sufficient on grounds at least analogous to those specified in the rule".

When review will not be maintainable:

(i) A repetition of the old and overruled argument is not enough to reopen concluded adjudications.

(ii) Minor mistakes of inconsequential import.

(iii) Review proceedings cannot be equated with the original hearing of the case.

(iv) Review is not maintainable unless the material error, manifest on the face of the order, undermines its soundness or results in miscarriage of justice.

(v) A review is by no means an appeal in disguise whereby an erroneous decision is re-heard and corrected but lies only for patent error.

(vi) The mere possibility of two views on the subject cannot be a ground for review.

(vii) The error apparent on the face of the record should not be an error which has to be fished out and searched.

(viii) The appreciation of evidence on record is fully within the domain of the appellate court, it cannot be permitted to be advanced in the review petition.

(ix) Review is not maintainable when the same relief sought at the time of arguing the main matter had been negatived.[42]

While making a claim before the arbitrator where a party only claimed value of the machinery to be determined at the time of illegal seizure of the machinery, the party cannot be permitted to make claim for interest for the first time in review application.[43]

It has been held by the Orissa High Court that the mere possibility of two views on the subject cannot be a ground for review. The court cannot entertain a review petition to find out as to which view is correct.[44] attorney in favour of developer, the order cannot be said to have been obtained by playing fraud upon the court. Such order cannot be recalled in review.[45]

The scope of the power of the review as envisaged under O 47, rule 1, CPC is very limited and the review must be confined strictly only to the errors apparent on the face of the record. Re-appraisal of the evidence on the record for finding out the error would amount to exercise of appellate jurisdiction, which is not permissible by the statute. The review proceedings are not by way of appeal and have to be strictly confined to the scope and ambit of O XLVII, rule 1 CPC.[46] The review sought for is not permissible within the ambit and scope of section 114 or O XLVII, simply because something what is decided on merits sought to be decided again.[47] It is no doubt true that power of review should either be conferred expressly or it should be taken to be implied. Since the revenue court has got inherent power to do justice and there is nothing in the provision of the Act as to restrict or otherwise curtail that power, the revenue court has got power to review in exercise of its inherent jurisdiction or to recall the order which appears to be amounting to abuse of the process of the court or an order which is likely to cause injustice or which is likely to frustrate the very object and purpose of the Act.[48] The admissions and concessions, if mistaken, can be permitted to be withdrawn by consent.[49] Review on question of fact on the basis of new evidence is not permissible where it is proved that the new evidence was not available at the time of original hearing.[50] The amendment of a decree by correcting accidental errors, slips or omissions may not involve review or reopening of the decision in the case. It may not have any effect on the finality of the decision rendered by the court.[51] Where an application for amendment of plaint was made so as to take up the plea that earlier suit was not maintainable against the defendants as the petitioner, being "bazigars", belonged to the scheduled caste, for the reasons recorded above, the review petition was allowed and the petitioner was allowed to amend their plaint.[52]

The review jurisdiction is extremely limited and unless there is a mistake apparent on the face of the record, the order/judgment ought not to be reviewed. A review does not permit rehearing of the matter on merits.[53]

[s 114.2] "Any Person"

Section 114 and O XLVII, rule 1 does not contemplate a party to a suit or proceeding to seek for review, rather it permits any person aggrieved by the order to seek for review.[54]

It was held by the Calcutta High Court that review application against an order of revocation granting probate is maintainable against third party. Moreover, the applicants in the case were heirs and legal representatives of the deceased testator having caveatable interest in probate proceedings in case of intestate succession.[55]

[s 114.3] Filing of Review Petition Without Order Under Review — Maintainability

The party who seeks review of the order must place the same order on record and without placing it on record, the applicant cannot get any relief from the court because it is a well-settled principle of law that any party aggrieved by the order must first place it before the court for its consideration and without placing it on record, no person can get relief from the court. Hence, only on this ground the review application is required to be rejected. [56]

It is true that before filing review application, the applicant had approached the Hon'ble Supreme Court by way of SLP (civil). While disposing that petition, the Supreme Court observed that the proper procedure would be to move the learned judge in the high court to review the observations in regard to which the grievance is made. However, the Supreme Court has never observed that the applicant can seek review of the order without placing it on the record of this case. Hence, the review petition was not found maintainable. [57]

[s 114.4] Review on the Ground That Judge Was Earlier Counsel for Opposite Party

The learned single judge while practising at the bar had argued a revision on behalf of the respondent but the same was dismissed. Between the date of decision of that earlier revision and the date of hearing in the present revision-petition, a long period of more than eight years had elapsed. It is not the case of the appellant that the learned judge, whilst at the bar had at any time appeared for the respondent at the trial or was personally known to him. The learned judge cannot be expected to have remembered unless reminded that he had been a counsel for any of the parties at some state in some litigation between these very parties. If only the appellant would have brought this fact to the notice of the learned judge at or before the hearing, Supreme Court would have no reason to doubt that the learned judge would have certainly reclused himself from hearing the revision. But that was not done by the appellant and he must, therefore, bear burden of the fault entirely on himself.

The appellant must have known that the counsel who had appeared for his opponent in some litigation between these very parties and touching these very premises was elevated and was now a judge in the high court in which he was filing the revision. He should have told his counsel that in the event of the revision-petition coming up for hearing before such judge he should bring the fact to the notice of the learned judge. This must be taken as a duty to speak on the part of the litigant failing which he cannot be heard to raise grievance if the result of the litigation goes against him. The appellant would have never filed the review/recall petition if only he would have succeeded in the revision, and he became wiser only after the revision was dismissed. In the Supreme Court's opinion, the learned judge was right in hearing and deciding the revision on merits when it was argued before him without any demur and without seeking reclusion from the judge. Supreme Court could not find fault even with the view taken by the learned single judge in dismissing the review petition.

However still, on the principle that justice should not only be done but also seen to have been done, Supreme Court was inclined to set aside the two orders passed by the learned single judge and restore the revision petition for hearing afresh before the high court albeit by another judge. However, the appellant was burdened with cost of Rs 25,000 for his conduct which has resulted in the valuable time of the court being wasted and the respondent being dragged before this court in these proceedings, and on such costs being deposited, the revision petition shall stand restored and taken up for hearing expeditiously. From out of the amount so deposited, an amount of Rs 20,000 shall be made over to the State Legal Aid Service Authority and an amount of Rs 5,000 shall be paid to the respondent.[58]

[s 114.5] Review and Appeal

If, before the making of an application for review, an appeal from the judgment for review has already been filed and is pending, then the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the review application. Where the application for review is made first and thereafter, an appeal is preferred, the review application can be disposed of provided the appellate court has not disposed of the appeal before the review application is taken up for disposal.[59]

In the instant case, as the special appeal filed by the state before the division bench of this court was dismissed only on the ground of delay, the order of the learned single judge cannot be said to have merged in the order of the division bench. Therefore, the order of the learned single judge cannot be substituted as a binding precedent as a judgment of the division bench. Another effect is that review of the order of the learned single judge cannot be declined solely on the ground that a special appeal against the said judgment has been rejected. The order of the learned single judge shall continue to be final, effective and binding as between the parties. It is also a binding precedent as a judgment of the single judge. The same is the consequence of the rejection of the special leave to appeal by the Supreme Court. As no second appeal can be maintained against the same judgment of the learned single judge, the question of leave to special appeal does not arise. [60]

Where the review petition was filed after a delay of 30 odd days, the high court dismissed the petition on the ground of delay and non-prosecution and the restoration petition filed by the appellant was also dismissed, it was held by the Supreme Court that the high court instead of dismissing the review petition ought to have condoned the delay, the reason of which was sufficiently explained by appellant and ought to have allowed the revision application in favour of the appellant.[61]

[s 114.7] Review and Special Leave Petition

The petition for review before the high court cannot be dismissed merely because a SPL is filed before the Supreme Court.[62]

If review petition was filed well within time and since the review petition was not being decided by the high court, the appellant filed the SPL against the main judgment of the high court. The appeal arising out of SPL is maintainable.[63]

The dismissal of the SPL against the main judgment of the high court would not constitute res judicata when a SPL is filed against the order passed in the review petition, provided the review petition was filed prior to filing of SPL against the main judgment of the high court.[64] The position would be different where, after dismissal of the SPL against the main judgment, a party files a review petition after a long delay on the ground that the party was prosecuting remedy by way of SPL. In such a situation, filing of review would be an abuse of the process of the law.[65] If the high court allows the review petition filed after the SPL was dismissed, after condoning the delay, it would be treated as affront to the order of the Supreme Court.[66]

[s 114.8] Review and Inherent Powers of Courts

The provisions for amendment in sections 122 and 152(A) are different from the provisions of review contained in section 114 and O XLVII, rule 1, CPC. Both deal with different powers. Section 152(A) is intended to resolve a conflict of opinion in the high court as to the power of the court to take up an amendment application under section 152, where an appeal against decree/order has been disposed of in limine under O XLI, rule 11(1) and has no bearing whatsoever on the power of review. In fact, a review under O XLVII, rule 1 and an amendment under section 152 are totally different concepts. In the case of a review, the correctness of a judgment decree or order is in question, while in the case of an amendment of decree, the correctness of the judgment is assumed and the jurisdiction is for bringing the decree in conformity with the judgment. Again, where a review is allowed, the case has to be re-heard on merits but not where an amendment is allowed. In the case of review, a fresh decree is passed while in case of amendment the decree is to be amended.[67] The power of review cannot be equated to the power of jurisdiction to amend or correct the order and judgment conferred on the courts under sections 151 and 152 of the CPC. While exercising the power of review, the court has power to reconsider the entire case afresh and to make such orders as it thinks fit. In exercise of such powers, the court can set aside or modify the orders, judgments and decrees sought to be reviewed either wholly or in part on the basis of reasons altogether different from the reasons contained in the original order or judgment. The provisions in section 114 and O XLVII, rule 1 of the CPC prescribe the requirements to be complied with before exercising the power of review, its extent and the limitations subject to which it should be exercised.[68] If it clearly appears that there are some typographical errors which need be corrected but these are not legal errors which can modify the judgment or reverse the judgment as prayed for by the plaintiff/petitioner in review application; and, admittedly same typographical errors crept in through inadvertence in the judgment and accordingly those are corrected, it is needless to mention that the court has inherent power under sections 151 and 152 of the CPC to correct such mistakes which crept in through inadvertence and which are only clerical error in nature.

The power of review under section 114 read with O XLVII, rule 1 of the CPC cannot be exercised as an inherent power or an appellate power.[69]

In the present case, the high court allowed a review petition which had some observation regarding possession of a disputed property and this issue was neither raised before the trial court nor before the first appellate court, and even no issue with respect to possession was framed by the trial court. The apex court observed that when the observations with respect to the possession of the plaintiff was made on the appreciation of evidence/material on record, then the high court should not have allowed the review application and amend its observations as it cannot be inferred that there was an error apparent on the face of the proceedings that were required to be reviewed in the exercise of powers under section 114 read with O XLVII, rule 1, CPC.[70]

[s 114.9] Erroneous Decisions and Error Apparent on the Face of Record

There is a clear distinction between an erroneous decision and an error apparent on the face of the record. The first can be corrected by the higher forum; the latter can only be corrected by exercise of the review jurisdiction. A review petition has a limited purpose and cannot be allowed to be "an appeal in disguise".[71] An error apparent on the face of record cannot be defined precisely or exhaustively, there being an element of indefiniteness inherent in its very nature. It must be left to be determined judicially on the facts of each case. When a court does not apply the provisions of an enactment which on the face of it would apply to a case, same would be a mistake or error apparent on the face of the record. But a mere error of law is not a ground for review. Only a manifest error would be a ground for review.[72] A review court cannot act as an appellate court and error on the face of the record means an error which strikes one by merely looking at record and would not require any long drawn process of reasoning.[73] Where a statement appears in the judgment of a court that a particular thing happened or did not happen before it, it ought not ordinarily to be permitted to be challenged by a party, unless both the parties to the litigation agree that the statement is wrong, or the court itself admits that the statement is erroneous. In such a circumstance, the remedy available to the party aggrieved is review.[74]

In a case where the order of probate granted by the probate court was recalled by the appellate court in view of the compromise between the parties without arriving at its own conclusions, the Calcutta High Court held that the order suffers from error apparent on record and is liable to be reviewed.[75]

The Gauhati High Court held that in order to justify the review of an order a duty cannot be cost on the court to probe as to whether submissions advanced by the former counsel were in line with the pleadings in the suit in order to determine whether he was off the track without instruction. Since there was no apparent error committed by the court in recording submissions of lawyers, the review petition was dismissed.[76]

In Khela Banerjee v City Montessori School,[77] a review petition was filed seeking review of the judgment in Khela Banerjee- I,[78] on the ground that the observation made by the court that the Governor had passed an order for restoration of plot in favour of the review petitioner in violation of the Rules of Business are factually incorrect. It was the contention of the review petitioner that because of the imposition of the President's rule under Article 356 of the Constitution, the Governor became entitled to exercise all the powers of the state government under the Rules of Business. However, the Supreme Court refused to review the same holding that as the copy of the proclamation issued by the President under Article 356 was not brought to the notice of the court earlier.

Thus, a mistake on the part of the court which would include a mistake in the nature of the undertaking may also call for a review of the order. An application for review would also be maintainable if there exists sufficient reason therefore. What would constitute sufficient reason would depend on the facts and circumstances of the case. The words "sufficient reason" in O XLVII, rule 1 of the CPC is wide enough to include a misconception of fact or law by a court or even an advocate. An application for review may be necessitated by way of invoking the doctrine actus curiae neminem gravabit.[79]

Application for review would be maintainable not only upon discovery of new and important piece of evidence or when there exists an error apparent on the face of the record, but also if the same is necessitated on account of some mistake, or for any other sufficient reason. The expression "sufficient reason" used in O XLVII, rule 1, CPC is wide enough to include misconception of fact or law by a court or even by an advocate. Thus, where the petition against the municipal corporation, cancelling enlistment of the contractor was dismissed on the ground that the impugned order does not debar the contractor from seeking fresh enlistment, it was held by the Delhi High Court that the dismissal was based on incorrect understanding as the Enlistment Rules debarred a contractor from seeking fresh enlistment if he is once removed from approved list.[80]

[s 114.11] Non-Consideration of the Law

The review proceedings cannot be equated with the original hearing of the case and the writ petition cannot be re-heard only on the ground that the law has not been properly considered and applied. If the arguments raised before the court were considered and decided in the judgment, the petitioner, if he has any grievance against the judgment, can prefer an appeal but if the provisions of law have not been considered in a particular manner in which the petitioner wants to agitate it, then that cannot be a ground for reviewing the judgment. If the view taken by the court in the judgment is a possible view, having regard to the facts discernable from the facts on record, then it cannot be said to be an error apparent on the face of the record and no review can be made.

The Madras High Court has held that an order refusing leave for a letters patent appeal, which forms part of the judgment, is not separate from or independent of the judgment and, therefore, cannot be subject to review without the main judgment itself being reviewed.[81] It is an established law that "any other sufficient cause" only means that a reason sufficient on grounds at least to those specified immediately previously. It should be borne in mind that review would not be permissible even if the court has proceeded on a wrong exposition of law or has wrongly decided on question of law. A review would not be permissible on the ground that the decision is erroneous on the merits.[82]

In an application for review of a judgment passed in second appeal, the court can only consider the errors apparent on the face of the record in its judgments on the substantial questions of law already heard and decided by the court and cannot consider fresh substantial question of law which was not heard and decided by the court at the time of disposal of the second appeal.[83]

[s 114.12] Omission as to Authority

Failure of consideration of the judgment of the Supreme Court materially affecting the results of the case amounts to an error apparent on the face of the record. The power of review can be exercised in a suitable case in order to impart justice to the parties but the judgment cannot be reviewed merely to allow the petitioner to agitate new grounds.[84] The omission to cite an authority of law is not a ground for reviewing the prior judgment saying that there is an error apparent on the face of the record, since the counsel has committed an error in not bringing to the notice of the court the relevant precedents.[85]

[s 114.13] Review by Administrative Tribunal

The power of review available to the administrative tribunal is the same as has been given to a court under section 114 read with O XLVII, CPC. The power is not absolute and is hedged in by the restrictions indicated in O XLVII. A review cannot be claimed or asked for merely, for a fresh hearing or arguments or correction of an erroneous view taken earlier.[86]

[s 114.14] Review by Railway Claims Tribunal

It would be necessary to refer rule 32 of the Railway Claims Tribunal (Procedure) Rules (1989). It states the following:

> 32. Review of decision (1) Any person considering himself aggrieved by any order of the Tribunal from which no appeal is allowed [or from which appeal is allowed, but has not been preferred] and who on account of some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, or for any other sufficient reason, desires to obtain a review of the order made against him, may apply for review of a final order not being an interlocutory order, to the Tribunal.

This rule says that any person considering himself aggrieved by any order of the tribunal from which no appeal is allowed and who on account of some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, or for any other sufficient reason, desires to obtain a review of the order made against him, may apply for review of a final order not being an interlocutory order, to the tribunal.

It is thus apparent that rule 32 restricts the scope of power of review vested under section 18(3)(f) of the Railways Claims Tribunal Act, 1987 to non-appealable orders and leaves out from its ambit, orders which are appealable under section 23 of the Act though such orders could be reviewed in view of section 114 and rule 1 of O XI, rule 7 of CPC. To the extent indicated above, rule 32 runs counter to section 18(3)(f) of the Act. As rule 32 is repugnant to the statutory provision of clause (f) of sub-section (3) of section 18, it is certainly bad and in no case can it be allowed to override the specific provision of the Act. In this view of the matter, the high court erred in not considering the appeal of the appellant on merits on the ground that the review petition was not maintainable under rule 32.[87]

[s 114.15] Suo motu Review

The court cannot review its decree or order passed by it suo motu.[88]

[s 114.16] Review by State Government

A State Government empowered to grant or decline an exemption from the provisions of the State Act on cinemas cannot review its earlier order declining to grant an exemption, unless the State Act gives it power of review. The provision in the General Clauses Act, 1897 to the effect that power can be exercised from time to time, does not confer a power of review.[89]

[s 114.17] Defaulting Party

Where the petitioner is unjustifiably absent on two consecutive days, the court cannot entertain a review application at the instance of such defaulting party.[90]

[s 114.18] Delivery of Judgment Without Writing for Written Submission

The plea that the court had delivered the judgment without waiting for the written submission is not acceptable when there is nothing on record to substantiate such a situation. But while considering such a question, the court cannot look into any materials which were not brought on record on the date when the order was passed. There is nothing in the order sheet to show that the court would be waiting to deliver the judgment after having reserved the same till the written notes are submitted and that there would be a further hearing on the question. Unless it is borne out by the record, the court is helpless in a proceeding for review. The review is concerned only on the basis of an error apparent from the record. It cannot enter into a process of taking evidence to establish something which is not on record in order to create records for the purpose. The court is not supposed to entertain such statements in review. If such questions are entertained, it would open a pandora's box and lead to great anomalies, which is undesirable.[91]

[s 114.19] Power of the Court

See also notes under the same heading under section 47.

In a case relating to appointment to government posts, where the high court exceeded in the exercise of powers of review, it was held by the Supreme Court that the order of review was liable to be set aside."[92] Laying down the framework within which the power of review is to be exercised by courts, SINHA, J, speaking for the bench in the above case observed as follows:

> 18. The Division Bench of the High Court committed a serious error in entering into the merit of the matter while exercising its review jurisdiction. The courts jurisdiction to review its own judgment, as is well known, is limited. The High Court, indisputably, has a power of review, but it must be exercised within the framework of Section 114 read with Order 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The High Court did not arrive at a finding that there existed an error on the face of the record. In fact, the High Court, despite noticing the argument advanced on behalf of Union of India that the 1st Respondent had no legal right to be appointed, proceeded to opine that the panel prepared for filling up of future vacancies should be given effect to. The review of the High Court was not only contrary to the circular letter issued by Union of India, but also contrary to the general principles of law.[93]

[s 114.20] Doctrine of Merger in Review Applications

According to the doctrine of merger, the decree passed by an inferior court merges with the decree passed by the superior court by way of appeal or revision whereby the decree of the inferior court is confirmed, varied or modified. The decree which is finally to be executed is of the final court due to the effect of merger of decrees. Similar is the position in case of review. However, where a review petition is dismissed, the doctrine of merger has no application.[94] Explaining the legal position, SB SINHA, J, speaking for the division bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> It is also incorrect to contend that in a case of this nature, namely where a review petition was dismissed, the doctrine of merger will have any application whatsoever.
> It is one thing to say that the respondent was entitled to file an application for review in terms of Section 114 read with Order 47 Rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but it is another thing to say that the decree passed in favour of the respondent merged with the order dismissing the review application. Matter might have been different, if the review application had been allowed either wholly or in part in terms whereof an application for execution of the decree could have been filed only in terms of the modified decree.[95]

[s 115.1] State Amendments

Madhya Pradesh.—The following amendments were made by Madhya Pradesh Act 4 of 1994, section 2 (w.e.f. 15-3-1994)–

In its application to State of Madhya Pradesh for section 115, substitute the following section/namely:—

"115. Revision.—The High Court may call for the record of any cases which has been decided by any Court subordinate to such High Court and in which no appeal lies thereto, and if such subordinate Court appears—

(a) to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law; or

(b) to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested; or

(c) to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity,

the High Court may make such order in the case as it thinks fit:

Provided that the High Court shall not under this section, vary or reverse any order made or any order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceedings except where—

(a) the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for the revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or proceeding; or

(b) the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made.

(2) The High Court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any decree or order against which an appeal lies either to the High Court or to any Court subordinate thereto.

Explanation.—In this section, the expression "any case which has been decided" includes any order made, or any order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding."—[Madhya Pradesh Act 4 of 1994, section 2 (w.e.f. 15-3-1994).]

Orissa.—In its application to the State of Orissa, for section 115, substitute the following section, namely:—

115. Revision.—The High Court, in cases arising out of original suits or other proceedings of the value exceeding one lakh rupees, and the District Court, in any other case including a case arising out of an original suit or other proceedings instituted before the commencement of the Code of Civil Procedure (Orissa Amendment) Act, 1991, may call for the record of any case which has been decided by any Court subordinate to the High Court or the District Court, as the case may be, and in which no appeal lies thereto, and if such subordinate Court appears—

(a) to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law; or

(b) to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested; or

(c) to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, the High Court or the District Court, as the case may be, make such order in the case as it thinks fit:

Provided that in respect of cases arising out of original suits or other proceedings of any valuation decided by the District Court, the High Court alone shall be competent to make an order under this section:

Provided further that the High Court or the District Court shall not under this section, vary or reverse any order, including an order deciding an issue, made in the course of a suit or other proceeding, except where—

(i) the order, if so varied or reversed, would finally dispose of the suit or other proceedings; or

(ii) the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made.

Explanation.—In this section, the expression "any case which has been decided" includes any order deciding an issue in the course of suit or other proceeding.

Saving.—The amendment made by this Act shall not affect the validity, invalidity, effect or consequence of anything already done or suffered, or any jurisdiction already exercised, and any proceeding instituted or commenced in the High Court under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, (5 of 1908), prior to the commencement of this Act shall, notwithstanding such amendment, continue to be heard and decided by such Court.—[Orissa Act 26 of 1991, section 2 (w.e.f. 7-11-1991).]

Uttar Pradesh.—(1) For section 115, substitute the following section, namely:—

115. Revision.—(1) A superior court may revise an order passed in a case decided in an original suit or other proceeding by a subordinate court where no appeal lies against the order and where the subordinate court has—

(a) exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law; or

(b) failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested; or

(c) acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity;

(2) A revision application under sub-section (1), when filed in the High Court, shall contain a certificate on the first page of such application, below the title of the case, to the effect that no revision in the case lies to the District Court but lies only to the High Court either because of valuation or because the order sought to be revised was passed by the District Court.

(3) The superior court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any order made except where,—

(i) the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding; or

(ii) the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it is made.

(4) A revision shall not operate as a stay of suit or other proceeding before the court except where such suit or other proceeding is stayed by the superior court.

Explanation I.—In this section,—

(i) the expression 'superior court' means—

(a) the District Court, where the valuation of a case decided by a court subordinate to it does not exceed five lakh rupees;

(b) the High Court, where the order sought to be revised was passed in a case decided by the District Court or where the value of the original suit or other proceedings in a case decided by a court subordinate to the District Court exceed five lakh rupees;

(ii) the expression 'order' includes an order deciding an issue in any original suit or other proceedings.

Explanation II.—The provisions of this section shall also be applicable to orders passed, before or after the commencement of this section, in original suits or other proceeding instituted before such commencement.—[Act 14 of 2003, section 2 (w.r.e.f. 1-7-2002).]

Transitory Provisions vide section 3 of Uttar Pradesh Act 14 of 2003.—(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in U.P. Act 14 of 2003 no judgement or order passed by the High Court in a revision filed on or after July 1, 2002 shall be liable to be questioned or reviewed on the ground that the revision ought to have been filed in the District Court.

(2) Any revision filed in the District Court in a case where the value of the original suit or proceeding does not exceed five lakh rupees and is decided by it on the assumption that the District Court would have jurisdiction notwithstanding the amendment of section 115 of the principal Act, by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 shall be deemed to have been correctly filed in that court and its decision thereon shall not be liable to be questioned on this ground, and such revision, if any pending on the date of commencement of this Act, shall be decided by that court.

(3) If on or after July 1, 2002 an application for revision under section 115 of the principal Act has been filed before the High Court in a case decided by a court subordinate to the District Court, where the value of the original suit or proceeding does not exceed five lakh rupees and such application is pending on the date of commencement of this Act, then such application, unless arguments thereon have already been concluded and only judgement remains to be pronounced by the High Court, shall stand transferred to the District Court concerned, and the same shall be disposed of in accordance with the said section 115 as substituted by this Act.

Statement of Object and Reasons of Uttar Pradesh Act 14 of 2003.—The Code of Civil Procedure (Uttar Pradesh Amendment) Act, 1978 (U.P. Act No. 31 of 1978) was enacted to amend inter-alia section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 in its application to Uttar Pradesh to provide for empowering the District Judges to revise the orders of courts subordinate to them, arising out of the original suits of the valuation up to Rupees Twenty thousand. The section 115 of the said Code was further amended in its application to Uttar Pradesh by the Uttar Pradesh Civil Laws (Amendment) Act, 1991 (U.P. Act No. 17 of 1991) to raise the said valuation up to Rupees One lac. Since the said amendments have been repealed by section 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (Act No. 46 of 1999), the District Judges in the state not have no power to revise the order of the court subordinate to them arising out of original suits with effect from the date of commencement of the said Act of 1999 i.e. 1-7-2002. Same view has been expressed by the Hon'ble High Court of Judicature Allahabad in the matter of United Service Club and others v Anita Barlow and other (Civil Revision Number 92 of 2002) decided on 16-9-2002. Consequently a litigant has to approach the Hon'ble High Court for filing a revision against the order of the subordinate courts arising out of suits of any valuation, whereas, he can file an appeal before the District Judge against the order of the subordinate courts passed in original suits of valuation up to Rupees Five lacs under the provisions of Bengal, Agra and Assam Civil Courts Act, 1887. With a view to removing the difficulties, it has been decided to amend section 115 of the said Code in its application to Uttar Pradesh to provide for empowering the District Judges to revise the orders of the courts subordinate to them arising out of original suits of the valuation up to Rupees five lacs.

The Code of Civil Procedure (Uttar Pradesh Amendment) Bill, 2003 is introduced accordingly.

"West Bengal.—After section 115, insert the following section, namely:—

115A. District Court's powers of revision.—(1) A District Court may exercise all or any of the powers which may be exercised by the High Court under section 115.

(2) Where any proceeding by way of revision is commenced before a District Court in pursuance of the provisions of sub-section (1), the provisions of section 115 shall, so far as may be, apply to such proceeding and references in the said section to the High Court shall be construed as references to the District Court.

(3) Where any proceeding for revision is commenced before the District Court, the decision of the District Court on such proceeding shall be final and no further proceeding by way of revision shall be entertained by the High Court or any other Court.

(4) If any application for revision has been made by any party either to the High Court under section 115 or to the District Court under this section, no further application by the same party shall be entertained by the High Court or any other Court.

(5) A Court of Additional Judge shall have and may exercise all the powers of a District Court under this section in respect of any proceeding which may be transferred to it by or under any general or special order of the District Court.—[West Bengal Act 15 of 1988, section 3 (w.e.f. 1-2-1989).]

Uttarakhand.—For section 115, substitute the following section, namely:—

115. Revision.—(l) A superior court may revise an order passed in a case decided in an original suit or other proceeding by a subordinate court where no appeal lies against the order and where the subordinate court has–

(a) exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law; or

(b) failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested; or

(c) acted in exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.

(2) A revision application under sub-section (1), when filed in the High Court; shall contain a certificate on the first page of such application, below the title of the case, to the effect that no revision in the case lies to the District Court but lies only to the High Court either because of valuation or because the order sought to be revised was passed by the District Court.

(3) The Superior Court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any order made except where–

(i) the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding; or

(ii) the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it is made.

(4) A revision shall not operate as a stay of suit or other proceeding before the court except where such suit or other proceeding is stayed by the superior court.

Explanation I.—In this section–

(i) the expression 'superior court' means–

(a) The District Court, where the valuation of a case decided by a court subordinate to it does not exceed five lakh rupees;

(b) the High Court, where the order sought to be revised was passed in a case decided by the District Court or where the value of the original suit or other proceedings in a case decided by a court subordinate to the District Court exceed five lakh rupees;

(ii) the expression "order" includes an order deciding an issue in any original suit or other proceedings.

Explanation II.—The provisions of this section shall also be applicable to orders passed, before or after the commencement of this section, in original suits or other proceedings instituted before such commencement.

Explanation III.—The provisions of this section shall not be applicable to the revisions already filed in the High Court before the commencement of this section.—[Uttaranchal Act 1 of 2006, section 2.]

[s 115.2] Unamended Section 115

100 The High Court may call for the record of any case which has been decided by any court subordinate to such High Court and in which no appeal lies thereto, and if such subordinate court appears—

(a) to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or

(b) to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, or

(c) to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.

the High Court may make such order in the case as it thinks fit.

[101]Provided that the High Court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any order made, or may order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding, except where—

(a) the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding; or

(b) the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made;

(2) The High Court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any decree or order against which an appeal lies either to the High Court or to any court subordinate thereto.

100. Renumbered by Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976).
101. Added by Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976).

Explanation.—In this section, the expression "any case which has been decided" includes any order made, or any order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding.

[s 115.3] Legislative Changes

The section, before its alteration by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976), corresponded to section 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882. The Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976) retained the section intact, except that it is renumbered as sub-section 1 and adds a proviso thereto. The Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976) also added a new sub-section 2 and an Explanation.

By the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) effective from 1 July 2002, the proviso to sub-section (1) contains clause (a) and has omitted clause (b) of the earlier proviso to sub-section (1). A new sub-section (3) has been inserted. This amendment has been brought about on the basis of Malimath Committee Report. By the said amendment, the scope of revision has been restricted by the legislature as revision would lie only against such interlocutory orders which would finally dispose of the suit or the proceeding and no other.

The amended provisions shall not apply to or effect any proceeding for revision which had been finally disposed of before the commencement of the amended provisions. The amended provisions shall, however, apply to revisions, which are pending adjudication at the time of commencement of the amended provisions.

Clause (b) of the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 115 provided that the high court shall not under this section, vary or reverse any order made, or may order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit of other proceeding except where the order, if allowed to stand would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made.

A sub-clause (3) to section 115 was inserted which provided that a revision shall not operate as a stay of suit or other proceeding before the court except where such suit or other proceeding is stayed by the high court.

In the opinion of the authors, powers contemplated in clause (b) of the proviso to sub-section (1) should be available to the high court to correct instances of failure of justice or of orders causing irreparable injury. The deletion of said clause would only result in more remands by the appellate courts. As far as the insertion of sub-section (3) is concerned, this is a sound amendment, which will help in faster adjudication of disputes.

The Law Commission in its 163rd report while approving the insertion of sub-section (3) in section 115 opined that the proposal to delete clause (b) of the proviso to sub-section (1) is not advisable nor would it serve the purpose of speedy disposal of suits. The high courts in exercising the powers of revision should always bear in mind the significance, the object and the purpose underlying section 99 of the Code. Section 99 is premised on the supposition that each and every infraction of a procedural provision in the Code does not warrant interference by the appellate court and that interference with a judgment and decree is warranted only where such infraction has resulted in substantial prejudice to the party. This is the spirit behind section 99 which says, "No decree shall be reversed or substantially varied, nor shall any case be remanded, in appeal on account of any mis-joinder or non-joinder of parties or cause of action or any error, defect or irregularity in any proceedings in the suit, not affecting the merits of the case or the jurisdiction of the Court". But the proposal to delete clause (b) of proviso to section 115(1) on the ground of frequent interference by the courts exercising powers of revision may not be warranted. The remedy lies elsewhere, namely, exercising restraint and self-discipline while exercising power of revision.

The Law Commission, therefore, recommended that the proposal to delete clause (b) of proviso to sub-section (1) of section 115 be given up. The addition of sub-section (3) is, however, perfectly in order.

Section 115 is essentially a source of power for the high court to supervise the subordinate courts. It does not, in any way, confer a right on a litigant aggrieved by any order of the subordinate court to approach the high court for relief. The scope for making a revision under section 115 is not linked with a substantive right.[102]

Power conferred on the high court under section 115 of the CPC over all subordinate courts within its jurisdiction is a supervisory power and has been distinguished from its power of appeal to correct errors of fact and law. The power of revision under section 115 being in the nature of power of superintendence to keep subordinate courts within the bounds of their jurisdiction cannot be readily inferred to have been excluded by provisions of a special Act, unless such exclusion is clearly expressed in that Act.[103] However, the Supreme Court has held that the analysis made in ITI Ltd[104] to the effect that merely because the 1996 Act does not provide CPC to be applicable, it should not be inferred that the Code is inapplicable seems to be incorrect, for the scheme of the 1996 Act clearly envisages otherwise and the legislative intendment also so postulates and has referred the same to a larger bench for reconsideration.[105]

The jurisdiction exercised by the high courts under this section is called revisional jurisdiction. Even as the section stood before its amendment, the powers of the high courts under this section could only be invoked in cases in which no appeal lies to the high court and the case was decided by any court subordinate to such high court and such subordinate court appeared:

(i) to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law; or

(ii) to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law; or

(iii) to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.

It is true that the scope to entertain the petition under section 115, CPC is required to be exercised only when the petitioners case falls within the four corners of the provisions of section 115.[106]

It is a settled principle of law that that when a statutory remedy of second appeal is available under section 100, CPC, revision under section 115, CPC is not competent. It is on the settled principle that statutory remedy ousts revisional jurisdiction of this court which is discretionary, sometimes to be exercised suo motu or sometimes on an application. But there is no right of revision to a litigant unlike in a statutory remedy of appeal. So, second appeal lies against the order dismissing the appeal on preliminary grounds.[107]

The high court had no power to interfere in revision except in the three cases mentioned above.[108] Where the approach of judgment-debtor in the entire proceedings was negligent, careless, unfair and intended to stop the transfer of property to auction-purchaser and to avoid payment to decree-holder, the Supreme Court found that the high court ought not to have exercised its revisional jurisdiction.[109]

Further, in the exercise of its revisional power, it is not the province of the high court to enter into the merits of the evidence. It has only to see whether the requirements of the law have been duly and properly obeyed by the court whose order is the subject of revision, and whether the irregularity as to failure or exercise of jurisdiction is such as to justify interference with the order.[110] Where there is no error of law apparent on the face of the record, the order shall not be interfered by the high court in civil revision.[111] The high court in its revisional jurisdiction, which is untenable, ought not to interfere with the order made by the trial court, unless there is an error in exercise of jurisdiction by the trial court.[112] If the high court finds that the external conditions of jurisdiction, of investigation and of command have been satisfied by the inferior court, it should not substitute its own appreciation of evidence, or its own judgment thereon, for the determination of the inferior court in any matter committed by the legislature to the discretion of the inferior court.[113] While hearing a revision petition, the high court cannot, on the same principle, try a new issue, even if the parties were to consent to such a course, and thus convert itself into the original court,[114] nor can it admit additional evidence.[115] However, where the order of the court is based on misreading of pleadings consequent thereto, and the court has misdirected itself in passing an order, the court, under section 115, has the power to interfere.[116] Similarly, where the court below has arrived at a finding which suffers from jurisdictional errors, interference of the high court is not unwarranted in such a situation.[117]

A single judge of the Patna High Court has taken the view that a revision against decree for restoration of possession under section 6 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, is not expressly barred, but generally court would not interfere in revision where other remedies are open to parties. In the case under the Specific Relief Act, 1963, the party has specific remedy by virtue of section 6(4) of the Act to institute a regular suit for declaration of title and possession. But in extreme case where grave injustice has been done or where the trial is no trial at all or where the decision is vitiated by an error apparent on the face of the record, the high court does interfere. However, this question was left open by the high court.[118]

In an execution case, where there was resistance or obstruction to possession of immovable property, the executing court rejected the application of objection as not maintainable on the ground that no document or paper was produced in support of the claim. There being no adjudication, such order would not be in consonance with O XXI, rule 103 of the Code and cannot be held to be a "decree". Since the order would not be appealable, revision against the same is maintainable.[119]

Section 141 of the Code pertains to "miscellaneous proceedings" while the words used in section 115 of the CPC are "suits and other proceedings". No doubt "miscellaneous proceedings" does not include execution proceedings as O XXI of the Code provides separate procedure for execution proceedings and does not require the assistance of section 141. But proceedings under section 47 of the Code are miscellaneous proceedings and as such other proceedings do cover proceedings under section 47 of CPC. Therefore, an order rejecting objections under section 47 is revisable.[120]

Adjudication of right of pre-emption under section 22(2) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, does not amount to decree as defined in section 2(2) of the Code and as such no appeal lies. However, remedy is available to a party under section 115 CPC or Article 227 of the Constitution.[121]

The high court should not, in revision, interfere with an order which is eminently just.[122] In case of the absence of any jurisdictional error committed by the tribunal, the high court would not interfere in its revisional jurisdiction.[123] Section 115 of the CPC, and provisions of similar pattern in several other enactments, are designed to confer a wide power on the ultimate authority to call for the records and supervise the correctness of the proceedings, subject to certain limitations.[124] The revisional jurisdiction of the high court would not be impliedly barred where provisions of a special enactment makes the decision of the appellate authority final and not open to question in any court, and also vests revisional jurisdiction in such authority.[125]

Whenever an appeal or revision petition is filed in the registry of the high court, the defects have to be pointed out by the registry, thereby giving an opportunity to the appellant/petitioner to rectify the defect. In the absence of any objection raised by the registry, it does not seem right where the court on preliminary objection disposes of the appeal.[126] However wide the scope of the revision may be, the revisional court is not competent to decide the validity of the provision of an Act.[127] The revision petition should not be dismissed summarily even if the court comes to the conclusion that there is no substance in the matter. The high court should indicate brief reasons in support of the view it takes.[128] A revision petition once admitted must be disposed of on merits. It cannot be dismissed on some technical grounds like non-payment of rent by the tenant.[129]

While exercising revisional jurisdiction, the court can take into consideration subsequent development, especially when such developments go to the root of the litigation and the cause of action.[130] A basic plea, like, that there was no concluded contract between parties or that there was no written arbitration agreement, can be raised for the first time in revision but the revision cannot be dismissed on such technical grounds.[131] The Madhya Pradesh High Court, relying upon a Supreme Court judgment,[132] held that the correctness of the court proceedings cannot be challenged before the appellate or original courts unless such a challenge was made before these courts because the conduct of judge in recording the proceedings cannot be put in issue.[133] Where the permission is granted by the court to sue in a representative capacity, the court should be very slow to exercise its power under section 115 of the CPC, unless the decision of the court has resulted in manifest error, illegality or irregularity in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred on it, which has resulted in failure of justice.[134]

In a revision against an order partly allowing application under O XXIII, rule 1(3) while declining to grant leave to file fresh suit, the defendant cannot be allowed to raise a plea that plaintiff had filed the application for withdrawal by giving false information regarding the pendency of the suit. Such arguments can only be advanced before the trial court.[135]

Where a revision application was filed against land acquisition appeal by one of the co-owners but other co-owners who were parties in the appeal were not made parties, it was held by the Kerala High Court that the revision was bad for non-joinder of necessary parties.[136]

In another case where a party filed an application in the high court for a direction for early disposal of transfer application pending before district judge and the high court admitted the application with necessary direction to the district judge, it was held that this act of a party cannot be a ground for making disparaging, unmerited and uncharitable remarks against the advocate. The remarks in question were held to be liable to be expunged.[137]

In a particular case, the trial court held that a particular document was a deed of partition (after examining its contents) and the document was, therefore, inadmissible in evidence without stamp and registration. It was held that as the order was neither without jurisdiction nor vitiated by illegality or material irregularity, the high court will not interfere with it in revision.[138] Where the subordinate court on a preliminary issue held that document was a pronote and since it was insufficiently stamped, the same was inadmissible in evidence. The revision against the order was held to be maintainable.[139] In another case, the trial court granted an injunction to occupants of a building thwarting possession of it by the auction purchaser thereof. The injunction was issued on meagre material. The appellate court vacated it. It was held that the appellate court could not be said to have acted with material irregularity. The high court did not interfere with appellate order. Besides, the revisional application against the appellate order would amount to abuse of process of court.[140]

The order of the appellate authority directing grant of succession certificate in favour of one party cannot be interfered with in civil revision.[141] Failure by the trial court to award penalty by considering provisions of section 74 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 amounts to an error of law, revisable under section 115.[142]

The Jaipur Bench of the Rajasthan High Court has held that the provisions of section 115 of the Code can be applied mutatis mutandis to a revision under section 83(9) of the Wakf Act, 1995. Thus, where the Wakf tribunal passed order directing the commissioner to visit the disputed site and submit report before the court, it was held that the order did not decide the case finally and as such revision against the said order was not maintainable.[143]

Revision petition filed under section 115, CPC is not maintainable against the interlocutory orders after the statutory changes made through the amendment brought in the year of 1999.[144] Revision against an interlocutory order which does not finally decide the lis cannot be maintained. The remedy for the aggrieved party is to file an application under Article 227 of the Constitution.[145]

Where an application for dispensing with the requirement of serving notice to government under section 80 of the Code is rejected, the only option to the court is to return the plaint and present the same after compliance with the mandatory provision. It cannot be said to be a "case decided" so as to attract section 115 of the Code.[146]

In a suit for declaration and restoration of possession, there was a preliminary issue regarding the effect of non-service of notice under section 80 of the Code on the party who was in possession. The trial court held that the suit was maintainable as the respondent, who was a government servant, had not done any act in his official capacity. Revision against the order on preliminary issue was filed. In the meantime, the suit itself was dismissed on merit. Hence, when the revision was taken up for hearing, it had become infructuous. It was held by the Supreme Court that the order of the high court in revision holding that the suit was not maintainable for non-service of notice under section 80, CPC was liable to be set aside.[147]

The question as to whether leave to defend in a summary suit can be granted or not is within the discretionary powers of the high court and where such discretion has not been exercised erroneously or with any irregularity, no interference by Supreme Court is warranted.[148]

[s 115.5] Essentials

A civil revision, at the instance of a litigant is maintainable on satisfaction of the following circumstances cumulatively, viz:

(a) (i) impugned order amounts to a case decided.

(ii) Such order must have been passed by any court subordinate to such high court.

(iii) Such order must not be appealable one.

(b) there must be allegation of jurisdictional error, i.e., to say:

(i) exercise of jurisdiction not vested in the court below by law, or

(ii) a jurisdiction vested in it by law was failed to be exercised, and/or

(iii) has acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.

(c) if the impugned order had been passed in favour of the revision-petitioner then that would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings.[149]

[s 115.6] Two Parts — Distinction

The section consists of two parts, the first prescribes the conditions in which jurisdiction of the high court arises, i.e., there is a case decided by a subordinate court in which no appeal lies to the high court, the second sets out the circumstances in which the jurisdiction may be exercised. But the power of the high court is exercisable in respect of "any case which has been decided".[150]

The question regarding maintainability of the revision by the high court is a question distinct and independent of the case in which the high court shall interfere with the orders passed by the court subordinate thereto. The former concerns the power to call for record of courts subordinate to it by a high court and relates to existence of conditions precedent on the basis of which such exercise of jurisdiction under section 115 depends and in the absence of existence of such conditions, there is no authority or jurisdiction to call for the record of subordinate courts for examination in the matter in exercise of jurisdiction under section 115, CPC. The latter relates to stage subsequent to exercise of powers by the court spelling out the circumstances in which the court, in exercise of its jurisdiction under section 115, can vary or modify the order in question. In which case, the high court may vary, modify or pass such other orders as it thinks fit depends on the authority exercisable by it under section 115, CPC. The maintainability of the revision depends upon two conditions, first, that it must relate to a case decided by the court subordinate to the high court and secondly, in connection with the case decided, no appeal lies thereto. Once these two conditions are fulfilled, it cannot be said that the application for revision is not maintainable. The question where in a given case, the court would exercise the jurisdiction to interfere with the orders made by the subordinate court in a case decided would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case, depending upon the conditions imposed on exercise of such powers by the high court in a case where the revision is maintainable.[151]

See also notes under the same heading under section 100.

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the high court can exercise its inherent jurisdiction in appropriate cases. The revisional jurisdiction, in effect and substance, is an appellate jurisdiction.[152] Doctrinally revisional jurisdiction is a part of the appellate jurisdiction, but not vice versa. Both appellate jurisdiction and revisional jurisdiction have to flow from the statute books and no party to the proceedings has an inherent right of appeal or revision.[153]

Appeal or revision is a creature of the legislature and it is within their wisdom to provide or not to provide right of appeal against judicial decision or order. It is also within the domain of the legislature whether the high court should be vested with revisional power against any adjudicatory process. A bare reading of section 115 of the Code reveals that revisional power can be exercised only where the statute does not provide right of appeal. Therefore, when the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988 provides for appeal against the award of the motor accident claims tribunal, revision petition against the award is not maintainable.[154]

However, a special bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court has held that the remedy of appeal under section 173(2) of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988 is not available where the amount awarded by the claims tribunal is less than Rs 10,000. Therefore, the aggrieved party has the remedy of revision under section 115, CPC available to him. The constitutional remedy under Articles 226 and 227 stands barred in view of the alternative efficacious remedy under section 115 of the CPC.[155]

The full bench of the Patna High Court[156] dealt with the question that whether against the order of interim compensation made under section 140 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988, the appeal shall lie under section 173 of the Motor Vehicles Act or can such order be challenged in a revision application under section 115 of the CPC. Relying on Yallwwa v National Insurance Co Ltd[157] and United India Insurance Co Ltd v Serjerao,[158] it was held that an order of the tribunal awarding compensation under section 140 of the Act is appealable under section 173 as it amounts to an award under section 173.

Explaining the respective scopes of appeal and revision in the undernoted case,[159] Pasayat, J, speaking for the Supreme Court Bench observed as follows:

> 13. First aspect that has to be considered is the respective scope of appeal and revision. It is fairly a well settled position in law that the right of appeal is a substantive right. But there is no such substantive right in making an application under Section 115. Though great emphasis was laid on certain observations in Shankar Ramchandra Abhyankar v Krishnaji Dattatraya Bapat[160] to contend that appeal and revision stand on the same pedestal, it is difficult to accept the proposition. The observations in the said case are being read out of context. What was held in that case related to the exercise of power of a higher Court, and in that context the nature of consideration in appeal and revision was referred to. It was never held in that case that appeal is equated to a revision.

> 14. Section 115 is essentially a source of power for the High Court to supervise the subordinate courts. It does not in any way confer a right on a litigant aggrieved by any order of the subordinate court to approach the High Court for relief. The scope for making a revision under section 115 is not linked with a substantive right.

A full bench of the Allahabad High Court[161] was seized of a question that whether in view of the judgments of the Supreme Court in Hari Shanker v Rao Girdhari Lal Chowdhury[162] and Shiv Shakti Co-op Housing Society v Swaraj Developers[163] declaring the power of revision as not a substantive right but merely an enabling provision, the provision for a revision under section 10B of the Uttar Pradesh Trade Tax Act, 1948 would on the repeal of that Act not be saved under section 81(2) of the Uttar Pradesh Value Added Tax Act, 2008. It was held that the power of revision is construed in the context of revenue or fiscal legislation not as one in the nature of a standalone provision, but as a provision which is intended to enable the revisional authority to ensure that the assessment has been carried out in accordance with law. An error on the part of the assessing authority is amenable to correction in revision. The power that is vested in the revisional authority is one which has a direct nexus with the order of assessment and is in the nature of a final determination over the order of the assessing officer. The object and purpose are to ensure that the assessment has been made in accordance with law. The power of the revisional authority to call for and examine the records for the purpose of satisfying himself as to the legality or propriety of the order of assessment and to pass such order with respect thereto as he thinks fit is, hence, unaffected by the repeal. This power is intrinsically connected with the right of the authority to ensure that the assessment has been carried out in accordance with law. This imposes a corresponding obligation and liability on the assessee where it is found that the assessment was otherwise than in accordance with law. One cannot be disassociated from the other.

It is the settled position of law that revision application against an interlocutory order, but remedy under Article 227 of the Constitution is available. But whether the court will exercise its power or not, that is within the discretion of the court. However, in a proper case where the order of the subordinate court is perverse or beyond jurisdiction, the court should exercise jurisdiction under Article 227 of the Constitution.[164]

[s 115.10] Revision and Jurisdiction of High Court Under Articles 226 and 227

There cannot be any restriction with regard to a proceeding under Article 226 or Article 227 and section 115 of CPC when it relates to a proceeding arising out of the order of the civil court. Whatever might be the nature of the proceedings, it remains a revisional jurisdiction.[165]

In Shalini Shyam Shetty v Rajendra Shankar Patil[166] it has been held that it may be true that a statutory amendment of a rather cognate provision, like section 115 of the CPC by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) does not and cannot cut down the ambit of high court's power under Article 227. At the same time, it must be remembered that such statutory amendment does not correspondingly expand the high court's jurisdiction of superintendence under Article 227.

Effectively, revision over jurisdiction of the subordinate courts and its scope is almost similar to the power of court under Articles 226 and 227.[167]

The curtailment of revisional jurisdiction of the high court does not take away — and could not have taken away — the constitutional jurisdiction of the high court to issue a writ of certiorari to a civil court nor the power of superintendence conferred on the high court under Article 227 of the Constitution is taken away or whittled down. The power exists, untrammeled by the amendment in section 115 of the CPC, and is available to be exercised, subject to rules of self-discipline and practice which are well settled.

The conclusions in a nutshell, are hereunder:

(1) Amendment by Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) with effect from 1 July 2002 in section 115 of the CPC cannot and does not affect in any manner the jurisdiction of the high court under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution.

(2) Interlocutory orders, passed by the courts subordinate to the high court, against which remedy of revision has been excluded by AIR 1933 All 523,[168] Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) are nevertheless open to challenge in, and continue to be subject to, certiorari and supervisory jurisdiction of the high court.

(3) Certiorari, under Article 226 of the Constitution of India, is issued for correcting gross errors of jurisdiction, i.e., when a subordinate court is found to have acted (i) without jurisdiction — by assuming jurisdiction where there exists none, or (ii) in excess of its jurisdiction by overstepping or crossing the limits of jurisdiction, or (iii) acting in flagrant disregard of law or the rules of procedure or acting in violation of principles of natural justice where there is no procedure specified, and thereby occasioning failure of justice.

(4) Supervisory jurisdiction under Article 227 of the Constitution of India is exercised for keeping the subordinate courts within the bounds of their jurisdiction. When the subordinate court has assumed a jurisdiction which it does not have or has failed to exercise a jurisdiction which it does have or the jurisdiction though available is being exercised by the court in a manner not permitted by law, and failure of justice or grave injustice has occasioned thereby, the high court may step in to exercise its supervisory jurisdiction.

(5) Be it a writ of certiorari or the exercise of supervisory jurisdiction, none is available to correct mere errors of fact or of law unless the following requirements are satisfied: (i) the error is manifest and apparent on the face of the proceedings such as when it is based on clear ignorance or utter disregard of the provisions of law, and (ii) a grave injustice or gross failure of justice has occasioned thereby.

(6) A patent error is an error which is self-evident, i.e., which can be perceived or demonstrated without involving into any lengthy or complicated argument or a long-drawn process of reasoning. Where two inferences are reasonably possible and the subordinate court has chosen to take one view, the error cannot be called gross or patent.

(7) The power to issue a writ of certiorari and the supervisory jurisdiction are to be exercised sparingly and only in appropriate cases where the judicial conscience of the high court dictates it to act, lest a gross failure of justice or grave injustice should occasion. Care, caution and circumspection need to be exercised, when any of the abovesaid two jurisdictions is sought to be invoked during the pendency of any suit or proceedings in a subordinate court and error, though calling for correction is yet capable of being corrected at the conclusion of the proceedings in an appeal or revision preferred there against and entertaining a petition invoking certiorari or supervisory jurisdiction of high court would obstruct the smooth flow and/or early disposal of the suit or proceedings. The high court may feel inclined to intervene where the error is such, as, if not corrected at that very moment, may become incapable of correction at a later stage and refusal to intervene would result in travesty of justice or where such refusal itself would result in prolonging of the lis.

(8) The high court, in exercise of certiorari or supervisory jurisdiction, will not covert itself into a court of appeal and indulge in re-appreciation or evaluation of evidence or correct errors in drawing inferences or correct errors of mere formal or technical character.

(9) In practice, the parameters for exercising jurisdiction to issue a writ of certiorari and those calling for exercise of supervisory jurisdiction are almost similar and the width of jurisdiction exercised by the high courts in India, unlike English courts, has almost obliterated the distinction between the two jurisdictions. While exercising jurisdiction to issue a writ of certiorari, the high court may annul or set aside the act, order or proceedings of the subordinate courts but cannot substitute its own decision in place thereof. In exercise of supervisory jurisdiction, the high court may not only give suitable directions so as to guide the subordinate court as to the manner in which it would act or proceed thereafter or afresh, the high court may, in appropriate cases, itself make an order in supersession or substitution of the order of the subordinate court as the court should have made in the facts and circumstances of the case.[169] Curtailment made by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), does not take away constitutional jurisdiction of high court under Articles 227 and 226.[170]

Where the power of revision has been invoked and dealt with, the high court ought not to interfere with the order in question in a subsequent writ petition.[171]

Normally, to rectify certain procedural error, the supervisory jurisdiction of the high court vested under Article 227 of the Constitution of India is not invoked because most of the irregularities can be taken care of well by the appellate court. But where the error is likely to cause serious prejudice, then supervisory jurisdiction is exercised. In view of the amendment in the CPC particularly section 115, a substantive petition under Article 227 of the Constitution of India would lie and the error of law or a grave procedural error can be rectified in exercise of powers under Article 227 of the Constitution.[172]

At this stage, it would be pertinent to notice the decision of the Supreme Court in Sadhana Lodh's case.[173] That case was in relation to a motor accident claim. KHARE, CJI, speaking for the three-judge bench observed as follows:

> 6. The right to appeal is a statutory right and where the law provides remedy by filing an appeal on limited grounds, the grounds of challenge cannot be enlarged by filing a petition under Article 226/227 of the Constitution on the premise that the insurer has limited grounds available for challenging the award given by the Tribunal. Section 149(2) of the Act limits the insurer to file an appeal on those enumerated grounds and the appeal being a product of the statute it is not open to an insurer to take any plea other than those provided under Section 149(2) of the Act. (See National Insurance Co. Ltd., Chandigarh v Nicolletta Rohtagi and others.)[174] This being the legal position, the petition filed under Article 227 of the Constitution by the insurer was wholly misconceived. Where a statutory right to file an appeal has been provided for, it is not open to High Court to entertain a petition under Article 227 of the Constitution. Even if where a remedy by way of an appeal has not been provided for against the order and judgment of a District Judge, the remedy available to the aggrieved person is to file a revision before the High Court under Section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Where remedy for filing a revision before the High Court under Section 115 of CPC has been expressly barred by a State enactment, only in such case a petition under Article 227 of the Constitution would lie and not under Article 226 of the Constitution. As a matter of an illustration, where a trial Court in a civil suit refused to grant temporary injunction and an appeal against refusal to grant injunction has been rejected, and a State enactment has barred the remedy of filing revision under Section 115, C.P.C., in such a situation a writ petition under Article 227 would lie and not under Article 226 of the Constitution. Thus, where the State legislature has barred a remedy of filing a revision petition before the High Court under Section 115, C.P.C., no petition under Article 226 of the Constitution would lie for the reason that a mere wrong decision without anything more is not enough to attract jurisdiction of High Court under Article 226 of the Constitution.
> 7. The supervisory jurisdiction conferred on the High Courts under Article 227 of the Constitution is confined only to see whether an inferior Court or Tribunal has proceeded within its parameters and not to correct an error apparent on the face of the record, much less of an error of law. In exercising the supervisory power under Article 227 of the Constitution, the High Court does not act as an Appellate Court or the Tribunal. It is also not permissible to a High Court on a petition filed under Article 227 of the Constitution to review or re-weigh the evidence upon which the inferior Court or Tribunal purports to have passed the order or to correct errors of law in the decision.

In a case, the Sikkim High Court has held that a deficient report of the local commissioner appointed under O XXVI cannot be set aside by the court. The court can call for a supplementary report without setting aside the first report. Thus, where the power of the high court under Article 227 of the Constitution was also invoked along with the power of revision under section 115 of the Code, it was held that the high court has powers to correct the arbitrary exercise of discretion by the lower court.[175]

Explaining the scope of section 115 of the Code and Article 227 of the Constitution of India, AP SUBBA, J, observed as follows:

> It is the well-settled position of law that the power of superintendence of the High Court under Art. 227 of the Constitution is much wider than the power of revision u/s. 115 of the C.P.C. and the limitations which are applicable in case of power of revision u/s. 115 CPC do not apply to the supervisory jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 227 of the Constitution. Of course it is also well-recognised principle that the supervisory power under Art. 227 of the Constitution is to be sparingly used and such power should not be used for correcting a mere error. In this regard, it might be noted that it has already been demonstrated above that the impugned order is not in conformity with the related provisions contained in the order and also the well-established principles of law on the point. In view of this, it is manifest that the limitation placed on the exercise of power vested in the High Court under Art. 227 of the Constitution would not extend to cases where the discretion exercised by the lower Court is found to be not only arbitrary but also against the well established principle of law as in the present case.[176]

[s 115.11] Second Appeal or Revision

See notes under the same heading under section 101.

It is the settled principle of law that as against the appeal preferred under section 384 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, there is no provision for filing a second appeal and therefore, a civil revision lies. A decision by the revisional court is on the merit of the contention of the parties and by exercise of such jurisdiction. The revisional court, in appropriate cases, may set aside the order of the appellate court and dispose of the application for succession certificate by appropriate order. Therefore, the embargo put in section 115 of the CPC is not satisfied as against the maintainability of the civil revision.[177]

[s 115.12] Section 115 and Section 151

It cannot be accepted that the contentions that in exercise of the inherent power the high court, for ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the court, can invoke the revisional jurisdiction overlooking the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 115 of the CPC. Such submission does not appeal since it is contrary to the clear and unambiguous language of the statute. There is no ambiguity in the language of the statute. The inherent powers of the civil court can ordinarily be exercised when there is no legislation on a particular field or subject-matter. Where there is an express provision barring a particular remedy, the court can never resort to the exercise of inherent power, particularly to nullify the effect of the express provision. It is the ordinary rule of interpretation that to exercise the power, the requisite condition must be fulfilled.[178]

Petitioners cannot "blow hot and cold", "fast and loose" or "approbate and reprobate". Where the petitioners have knowingly accepted the benefits of an order, they cannot be permitted to assail the same. This rule is applied to do equity.[179]

[s 115.13] Appeal or Revision — Proper Remedy

Unless the court comes to the conclusion that the appeal is the proper remedy and not revision, the withdrawal of the appeal and its consequential dismissal will not merge the decree in the order of the appellate court and hence, the revision will be competent and will survive. The revision application cannot be dismissed as not surviving unless the court comes to the conclusion that the proper remedy was not a revision but an appeal. If, on the other hand, the court were to come to the conclusion that the proper remedy was revision and not appeal, any order passed in the appeal will be without jurisdiction and inconsequential and it cannot effect the pending revision application.[180]

What inference is to be drawn from the evidence on the record is for the trial court or the appellate court to decide. It is not for the high court under section 115 to decide.[181] If two reasonably possible views of the facts can be taken, the high court should not in revision, substitute its own finding of fact.[182] It will not decline to exercise its jurisdiction on the basis that one of the possible views has been taken by the lower appellate court, for example, as in the case of an interpretation by the terms of a Will. As a court of conscience, the high court has a duty to give effect to the wishes of the testator to the utmost extent possible.[183]

Section 103A of the Bihar Tenancy Act, 1985 lays that "revenue officer specially empowered by the state government in this behalf, may, on application made to him within three months of any order or decision on any objection made under sub-section (1) or on his own motion, after giving reasonable notice to the parties concerned to appear and be heard in the matter, revise, at any time before the final publication of the record-of-rights, any such order or decision whether made by himself or by any other revenue officer". The full bench of the Patna High Court held that although sub-section (3) of section 103A does not use the word "review" expressly yet when the said section says that the revenue officer may revise his own order, what is contemplated is review of the officer's own order. The aforesaid power of review conferred by section 103A of the Bihar Tenancy Act, 1985 is not the same as the power of review under section 114 or O XLVII of the CPC, nor is it circumscribed by the conditions mentioned by section 114 or O XLVII of the CPC.[184]

In an eviction suit, where the trial court determined provisional rent and directed the tenant to deposit arrears of rent in bank and the order was upheld by the first appellate court, it was held by the Supreme Court that interference with the concurrent finding of fact by the high court under revisional jurisdiction was not proper.[185] Explaining the legal position, LS Panta, J, speaking for the bench in the above case observed as follows:

> 15. It is well-settled position in law that under Section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure the High Court cannot re-appreciate the evidence and cannot set aside the concurrent findings of the Courts below by taking a different view of the evidence. The High Court is empowered only to interfere with the findings of fact if the findings are perverse or there has been a non-appreciation or non-consideration of the material evidence on record by the courts below. Simply because another view of the evidence may be taken is no ground by the High Court to interfere in its revisional jurisdiction.[186]

The Supreme Court has reiterated that when the first appellate court, on appreciation of evidence, records a finding of fact on a particular issue, then such finding is usually binding on the high court while hearing revision against such order. It is only when any finding of fact is found to be wholly perverse or dehors to any provision of law or is recorded contrary to pleadings and evidence on record, interference in such finding may arise in appropriate cases but not otherwise.[187]

Applicability of section 115, CPC can't be exercised in a routine manner in absence of any perversity. The court dismissed the revision petition on the ground that impugned order is not perverse because all the contentions raised by the parties are being properly dealt by the learned judge along with the catena of proposition of the law laid by the various adjudicatory bodies on the issue involved in the present dispute.[188]

[s 115.15] Second Revision — Permissibility

The legislature in its wisdom has thought that on account of ample opportunity given to a party to put forth his case before three courts, viz, the trial court, the appellate court and the revisional court, there is no need to make the revisional order of the district court under Kerala Building (Lease and Rent Control) Act, 1965, subject to further scrutiny by means of a second revision either under the said Act or under the CPC.[189]

The ratio in the Aundal Ammal[190] case is that no second revision under section 115(1) will lie against revisional order of the subordinate court.[191]

[s 115.16] Simultaneous Appeal and Revision Against Composite Orders

In case of composite order, for the first part of the order, an appeal is maintainable and for the rest of the order, a revision may be preferred to a judge of the high court to decide the legality and proprietary of the order in question.[192]

[s 115.17] Revisional Court Exceeding Jurisdiction

The question for consideration before the revisional court was confined to the admissibility of the document on the grounds raised by the plaintiff. The revisional court, after holding that the reasons given by the trial court for not exhibiting the document could not be sustained, exceeded its jurisdiction in entering into the question of validity of the document on merits in the light of the provisions of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. The order of the high court virtually decided the suit. It is beyond the scope of the revision petition and suffers from patent illegality on the face of it, causing prejudice to the case of the defendant. So, the impugned order passed by the high court was set aside and the case was remanded to the high court for its decision afresh, in accordance with law.[193]

Companies (Special Provisions) Act, 1985 and section 18FH of the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act, 1951. On rejection of the objection, revision was filed against the order of rejection. The revisional court found that the objection was not tenable, but set aside the sale in the interest of the revival of the industrial unit. It was held by the Supreme Court that the revisional court exceeded its jurisdiction by setting aside orders of civil court which attained finality. It was observed that "there can be no objection to the revival of the respondent's unit but that is a matter between the respondent and the Kerala Financial Corporation or other Governmental Agencies and cannot in any manner affect the legal rights that have already accrued....."[194]

The Supreme Court had occasion to consider the bar created by the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 115. In an execution of a money decree, the executing court finally decided the manner in which the decree passed was to be satisfied. In that view of the matter, the Supreme Court held that the revision was maintainable. However, it was further held that the high court committed a jurisdictional error in view of the proviso (g) to section 60(1) of the Code by directing the satisfaction of the decretal amount from the fixed deposits of the appellant which were part of his pension and gratuity.[195]

Where the high court while admitting a revision passed mandatory injunction order directing the decree-holder to put the judgment-debtor in possession, it was held by the Supreme Court that since the decree-holder had taken possession of the property in execution of decree, the question of redelivering possession to judgment-debtor cannot arise.[196]

[s 115.18] Revision — Appellate Authority Subordinate to High Court—Original Authority Not Necessarily So

Merely because the appellate authority is a court subordinate to the high court, it would not follow that the original authority would be a court subordinate to the high court.[197]

A similar situation arose in Thakur Das (Dead) by LRs v State of Madhya Pradesh.[198] There, the facts were under the Essential Commodities Act, 1955. Against the order of the licensing authority constituted under section 6A of the Act, an appeal is provided under section 6C to the sessions court. When the said order was challenged in revision before the high court, a contention was raised that the order is not made by a court subordinate to the high court. This contention was rejected by the high court. That order was challenged before the Supreme Court. While upholding the said contention, the Supreme Court stated thus:

> While summing up its conclusions, the Court held that when a judicial authority like an officer who presides over a Court is appointed to perform the functions, to judge and decide in accordance with law and as nothing has been mentioned about the finality or otherwise of the decisions made by that authority, it is an indication that the authority is to act as a Court in which case it is not necessary to mention whether they are final or not as all the incidents of exercising jurisdiction as a Court would necessarily follow. We are in broad agreement with this conclusion.
> We are accordingly of the opinion that even though the State Government is authorised to appoint an appellate authority under section 6C, the legislature clearly indicated that such appellate authority must of necessity be a judicial authority. Since under the Constitution > the Courts being the repository of the judicial power and the officer presiding over the Court derives his designation from the nomenclature of the Court, even if the appointment is made by the designation of the judicial officer the appellate authority indicated is the Court over which he presides discharging functions under the relevant Code and placed in the hierarchy of Courts for the purposes of appeal and revision.

Likewise, section 113(1) of the Kerala Panchayat Raj Act, 1994 provides an appeal to the district court, which is a court subordinate to high court. The order is hence revisable, and to hold that because a revision is provided against the appellate order, the trial order is also revisable may not be correct.[199]

As regards orders made on an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis, a distinction was at one time made by the Allahabad High Court between an order granting the application and an order rejecting the application. An order rejecting the application, it was held, amounts to a decision of the case and is, therefore, open to revision. On the other hand, it was held an order granting the application is not a decision of the case, but a mere interlocutory order, and it is not, therefore, open to revision.[200] This last mentioned view has been overruled by a full bench of that court which held that an order granting an application to sue in forma pauperis is so distinct from the main suit that it can be considered to have decided a case.[201] The Rangoon[202] and Bombay[203] High Courts and the chief court of Oudh[204] also hold that an order refusing leave to sue as a pauper is equivalent to a case decided and can, therefore, be revised. In two Allahabad cases,[205] however, WALSH, J, expressed the opinion that no revision lies even from an order rejecting the application, the ground of the decision being that it is not a "case decided" within the meaning of this section; no opinion was, however, expressed by PIGGOTT, J. But in a later case, the Allahabad High Court definitely reverted to the view that an order rejecting the application, though not the decision of the suit, was a decision of a case and, therefore, open to revision.[206] The Allahabad High Court has interfered in revision when a court, by not trying the question to pauperism, has failed to exercise the jurisdiction vested in it, and has dismissed the application after questioning the title of the applicant,[207] or the merits of the case.[208] A full bench of the Oudh court has, in this regard, held that an order on an application for permission to sue in forma pauperis is not revisable unless one or other of the requirements of this section is satisfied.[209] On the other hand, the Nagpur High Court has held that an order allowing a person to sue as a pauper is revisable if it otherwise fulfils the requirements of this section.[210]

It has been held in a number of decisions, that when an application to sue as pauper is rejected on irrelevant considerations or on an erroneous view of the law, the order can be revised.[211] There is divergence of judicial opinion on the question of whether a revision can be maintained against an order refusing permission to sue as pauper or dispaupering the plaintiff, when subsequent thereto an order has been made dismissing the plaint for non-payment of the requisite court fee as directed. One view is that though the order refusing permission or dispaupering the plaintiff was by itself open to revision, when once it is followed by an order of dismissal, that order is open to appeal as a decree. On the analogy of an order rejecting a plaint under O VII, rule 11, no revision can, thereafter, be entertained against a previous interlocutory order.[212] The other view is that an order of dismissal for non-payment of court fee in a pauper application or suit by a pauper is, unlike an order under O VII, rule 11, not a decree, and the order refusing permission or dispaupering the plaintiff is open to revision.[213] When an order is set aside in revision and the case is remanded, a subsequent order dismissing the suit as a result of that order becomes vacated and the suit is revived.[214]

The High Court of Madras has held that where permission has been granted to sue in forma pauperis, the opposite party is entitled to challenge the order in revision, as the question of court fee is one between the plaintiff and the state.[215] That principle has been affirmed by the Supreme Court.[216] It is not necessary that an appellate court should hear the party before passing orders on an application to appeal in forma pauperis, and the order rejecting it is not open to revision on the ground that it has not discussed in detail the points involved.[217]

Where the trial court decided that the respondents are indigent persons, the order though interlocutory in nature, finally decides the issue. So, revision against such order is maintainable.[218] If application to sue as indigent person is allowed by trial court, without enquiry report from the government, revision against it in a 13-year-old litigation has the fate that the court would refuse to direct trial court to hold fresh enquiry.[219]

[s 115.20] Two Changes

On a reading of the juxtaposed provisions of section 115 of the CPC, it will be easily discernible that two changes have been brought in. First, the consideration is irrelevant that the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made; secondly, it has been clarified that the pendency of a revision shall not operate as a stay of a suit or other proceedings. The position that a revision should be entertained only in respect of those orders which would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings have not been altered. In these circumstances, assuming that a decree has not been passed, although leave to defend has not been allowed since the proceedings are still pending, the revision is not maintainable. Prior to the amendment, the interference of this court was possible under the deleted clause (b) of the proviso.[220]

[s 115.21] Mentioning of Wrong Section

Where the revisional court, under section 3 of Muslim women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act, 1986 failed to consider the original application of the petitioner as also the reply and the documents available on record, mere mention of a wrong section in the application or the order would not make the order or the application as illegal or nullity. This is so because the main contents of the application have to be taken note of, and further, in what context the application has been filed should be the main consideration before the court concerned. Therefore, the order of revisional court was set aside by high court in revision petition under section 115 CPC.[221]

[s 115.22] Prayer Clause

A perusal of the prayer clause in the revision petition shows that apart from the main prayer to the effect that respondents nos 1 and 2 may be injuncted and restrained from transferring, etc, any portion of the suit land for the so-called leasehold rights over the same, till the pendency of the main suit, there is also the ancillary prayer for any other order/direction which the court deems fit in the facts and circumstances of the case. That being the position, high court has the jurisdiction in exercise of the powers under section 115, CPC to frame the relief to be granted to the petitioners, in view of a case having been made out by them, which would include setting aside the impugned orders also. This view was fortified by the ratio of the decision of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Ude Singh v The State of Haryana,[222] which in turn, relied on a decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Charanjit Lal Chowdhury v UOI.[223] No doubt, the abovesaid reported decisions were in respect of Articles 226 and 32 of the Constitution of India, but the principles contained therein would definitely apply to the exercise of revisional jurisdiction by this court under section 115, CPC.[224]

[s 115.23] Order and Proceedings

The expression "order" has been defined in section 2(14) of the CPC. It means the formal expression of any decision of a civil court which is not a decree. The order passed under O XIV, rule 2 is an interlocutory order by way of an aid to the proper adjudication of the claims and disputes arising in the suit itself, but does not determine the right of the parties conclusively.[225]

The reading of section 115, CPC, as it stands, makes it clear that no revision lies if the impugned order is of interim nature and does not finally decide the lis. In the case on hand, the application under O XIV, rule 2 has been allowed by the trial court, which has not brought the suit to an end. The question is whether the impugned order could be considered as a proceeding. No definition is available for the word "proceeding" in CPC. The word "proceeding" in general sense means the form and manner of conducting judicial business before a court. The meaning of the word "proceeding" depends upon the scope of enactment wherein the expression is used with reference to the particular context where it occurs. It is not a technical expression with definite meaning. In a case, KJ Lingam and AV Mahayalam v Joint Commercial Tax Officer, Mount Road Division,[226] it has been held thus:

> Therefore, the meaning to be attributed to the word "proceeding" would depend upon the scope of the enactment wherein the expression is used and with reference to the particular context wherein it occurs.
> A proceeding may, in some enactment, mean an action or that which initiates an action and in another enactment it may also mean a step in an action. The word "any proceeding" in section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, was understood to be equivalent to any action. But in the rules of the Supreme Court, Order 64, rule 13, "proceeding" is used as meaning a step in an action.
>
> The words "Any other proceeding in the action" in the rules of the Supreme Court, Order 26, rule 1 mean any proceeding with a view to continuing the action, i.e., a step forward, not one backward.

The Honourable Supreme Court in another case, Babu Lal v Hazari Lal Kishori Lal,[227] held thus:

> The word "proceeding" is not defined in the Act. Shorter Oxford Dictionary defines it as "carrying on of an action at law, a legal action or process; any act done by authority of a court of law; any step taken in a cause by either party". The term "proceeding" is a very comprehensive term and generally speaking means a prescribed course of action for enforcing a legal right. It is not a technical expression with a definite meaning attached to it, but one the ambit of whose meaning will be governed by the statute. It indicates a prescribed mode in which judicial business is conducted. The word "proceeding" in section 22 includes execution proceedings also. In Rameshwar Nath v Uttar Pradesh Union Bank Ltd,[228] such a view was taken. It is a term giving the widest freedom to a Court of Law so that it may do justice to the parties in the case. Execution is a stage in the legal proceedings. It is a step in the judicial process. It marks a stage in litigation. It is a step in the ladder. In the journey of litigation, there are various stages. One of them is execution.

In Ram Chandra Agarwal v State of Uttar Pradesh,[229] it was held thus:

> The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure would apply generally to a proceeding before a Civil Court arising out of a reference to it by a Magistrate under Section 146(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The expression "proceeding" used in section 24 Code of Civil Procedure is not a term of art which has acquired a definite meaning. Looking to the context in which the word has been used in section 24(1)(b) of the Code of Civil Procedure it would appear to be something going on in a Court in relation to the adjudication of a dispute other than a suit or an appeal. Bearing in mind that the term "proceeding" indicates something in which business is conducted according to a prescribed mode it would be only right to give it a comprehensive meaning so as to include within it all matters coming up for judicial adjudication and not to confine it to a civil proceeding alone. A proceeding before a Civil Court arising out of a reference to it under Section 146(1) Code of Criminal Procedure can be transferred by the District Court under section 24 Code of Civil Procedure because it is in any case a "proceeding".

It is seen from the above judgments that the term proceeding is not a term of art which has acquired a definite meaning. Looking to the context in section 24(1)(b) of CPC it would appear to be something going on in a court in relation to the adjudication of a dispute other than a suit or appeal. The order under O XIV, rule 2 cannot be construed as proceedings, which is procussal, i.e., interlocutory or incidental order regulating proceedings but not finally deciding the suit. The word proceedings is applied for the purpose of section 115, the order under O XIV, rule 2 is not an order finally deciding the lis, hence the revision is not maintainable.[230]

To understand, reasonably and comprehensively, meaning of the term "proceeding" with reference to section 115 of the CPC, and intention of the legislators in that respect, useful reference is made to sections 24 and 141. Section 24 provides general power of transfer and withdrawal of suit, appeal or other proceeding and section 141 provides the procedure to be followed in all proceedings, i.e., proceedings which are other than suit or appeal. Rule 431 in the General Rules and Circular Orders of the High Court of Judicature, Orissa (Civil) (General Rules and Circular Orders) provides the list of applications under certain provisions in the CPC and provisions in other statute cognisable by civil court with the prescription to register them as miscellaneous judicial cases. In short, such proceedings are mentioned as miscellaneous judicial cases or miscellaneous cases. Section 24 of the CPC provides for transfer of a proceeding. Similarly, section 141 provides for the procedure regarding the suit to be followed, as far as it can be made applicable, in all proceedings. Procedurally and also traditionally, the aforesaid procedures are followed with respect to miscellaneous cases or miscellaneous judicial cases, and such cases only qualify to the term "other proceeding" mentioned in section 115 of the CPC. On the other hand, if wider meaning shall be given to that term by treating any and every interlocutory matter arising and decided/disposed of in a suit, then that does not fit into the provision of law in section 24 or section 141 of the CPC. Even section 146 of the CPC which speaks of proceedings by or against representatives does not mandate that any interlocutory application should be regarded as a proceeding within the above defined meaning of the term "proceeding". Therefore, unless application is registered as a miscellaneous case in accordance with the provision of the CPC read with the general rules and circular orders, that cannot be termed and determined as a proceeding for the purpose of section 115, CPC. That is so in view of the language in section 115 that "except where the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings".

The application filed by the petitioner under O IX, rule 13, CPC, is a proceeding but application filed by the petitioner under O XXVI, rule 2 being not prescribed in rule 431 of the General Rules and Circular Orders to be registered as a miscellaneous judicial case or miscellaneous case, and that being an interlocutory application relating to examination of a witness in commission, that cannot be given the meaning of the term "proceeding". Hence, the order passed relating to rejecting that application is not revisable under section 115 of the CPC.[231]

The scope for the high court to interfere in exercising jurisdiction under section 115 of CPC is very limited. This section is enacted with a view to enable the high court to correct, when necessary, certain clauses of errors of jurisdiction committed by subordinate courts. If the subordinate court, in the decision of the case, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, has committed illegality or material irregularity, then only the high court can interfere with the orders passed by the subordinate court. When this condition is satisfied, that a subordinate court has committed illegality or material irregularity, then the high court can interfere with the decision. The high court cannot, in the exercise of revisional powers under this section, attack the findings of facts of subordinate court. No doubt the power in revision is limited one, in comparison to the appellate power. Whether the courts decide it rightly or wrongly, if they had jurisdiction to decide the case and even if they decided it wrongly, they did not exercise their jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. In such circumstances, the high court cannot interfere with the order passed by the subordinate court.[232]

The section gives a discretionary power of intervention to the high court.[233] The high court does not usually interfere if the aim of an irregularity of the lower court has been to promote justice.[234] Even though the order is without jurisdiction, the powers under section 115, CPC may not be exercised. The powers under section 115, CPC are intended to be exercised with a view to subserve and not to defeat the ends of justice. Where the order of the court below is in the interest of justice, the high court can refuse to interfere under section 115, CPC, even if the court below has no jurisdiction to pass such an order. The interference in revision is discretionary and should be exercised only in the interest of justice and not in a case where interference is against the interest of justice. The order even if not regular may not be interfered with in revision if it is made irregularly or even improperly unless grave injustice or hardship would result from a failure to do so. Where the interference is likely to work not in the interest of justice but rather against it, the high court will not interfere in its revisional jurisdiction.[235] The high court is not bound to interfere in each case in which it is found that the subordinate court has acted without jurisdiction.[236] Where it is clearly proved that defendant owes money to the plaintiff and a decree is passed against the defendant, the high court will not interfere in revision on a point of jurisdiction, as it cannot use its revisional powers to bring about injustice.[237] In a case where the district court acted outside the scope of its jurisdiction in allowing an appeal and reversing an erroneous order of a munsif, the high court declined to make an order which would have the effect of re-establishing the munsif's decision.[238] The high court cannot act under this section if the matter is sub judice in an appeal filed by another party.[239] Before interfering in revision, it takes into consideration the conduct of the petitioner.[240] It does not interfere in favour of a party who does not disclose the entire case.[241] However, it interferes where it finds that an order impugned before it is perverse, in the sense that it is in conscious violation of a rule of law or procedure.[242] The scope of revision under section 115, CPC is very limited.[243] The Constitution Bench of the Hon'ble Supreme Court in a case[244] held that the high court cannot while exercising its jurisdiction under section 115, CPC correct errors of fact, however gross they may be, or even errors of law. It can only do so when the said errors have relation to the jurisdiction of the court to try the dispute. It is only in cases where the subordinate court has exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or has failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, or has acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, that the revisional jurisdiction of the high court can be properly invoked. The extension of time specified under the decree for specific performance of contract for deposit of amount could be appropriately granted by the court which passed the decree, and not by the high court in revisional jurisdiction.[245]

The view taken by the Supreme Court in SS Khanna's case has been legislatively adopted by Parliament by enacting sub-section 2, which provides that the high court shall not, under this section, interfere with any decree or order against which an appeal lies either to the high court or to any court subordinate thereto. It is submitted that an order passed by a court subordinate to the high court in its appellate jurisdiction, if it is not appealable, would be amenable to the revisional jurisdiction of the high court. A revision against an order which is not appealable either before the subordinate court or the high court is maintainable.[246] Insertion of sub-section (2) of section 115, Code of Civil Procedure in 1976 extends absolute prohibition against exercise of any discretion in an order revisable under section 115(1), even in a case where any appeal against the impugned order lies to the court subordinate to the high court. Sub-section (2) of section 115 CPC postulates prohibition of exercise of jurisdiction by the high court to vary or reverse any decree or order against which an appeal lies either to the high court or to any court subordinate thereto. However, it does not make any deviation from the fact that unless the order under challenge is appealable directly to the high court or to any court subordinate to the high court, from the purview of jurisdiction of the high court under section 115 CPC, on the ground of maintainability of the revision petition, merely because the order is ultimately challengeable in an appeal from the final decree, that is the consistent view taken by the Supreme Court.

But there was at one time a difference of opinion on the question of whether a revision was barred when an appeal lay against the decision not directly to the high court but to a subordinate court and a second appeal lay to the high court against the decision of that court. The controversy turned on the meaning of the words "appeal lies thereto". One view was that it was only when an appeal lay directly to the high court against the decision under challenge that a revision was barred and this view rested on a literal interpretation of the words "thereto".[247] The other view was that the appeal to the high court might be either direct and immediate or indirect and mediate a court subordinate to the high court and that a revision would be barred if the matter could be taken to the high court in second appeal.[248] Support for this view was sought in the broad statement of the law by the Privy Council in Venkatagiri Iyengar v Hindu Religious Endowments Board[249] that the provision for revision was intended to "prevent gross injustice in non-appealable cases." There was, however, no dispute that the high court was not competent to revise the decision of any appellate court if an appeal lay from that decision to the high court.[250] Dealing with the words "in which no appeal lies thereto" the Supreme Court has observed: "Nor is the expression in which no appeal lies thereto" susceptible of the interpretation that it excludes the exercise of the revisional jurisdiction when an appeal may be competent from the final order. The use of word "in" is not intended to distinguish orders passed in proceedings not subject to appeal from the final adjudication from those from which no appeal lies. If an appeal lies against the adjudication directly to the high court or to another court from the decision of which an appeal lies to the high court, it has no power to exercise its revisional jurisdiction, but where the decision itself is not appealable to the high court directly or indirectly, exercise of the revisional jurisdiction by the high court would not be deemed excluded.[251] This decision settled the controversy in favour of the second of the two views.

Since the section before its present amendment did not define the word "case", the question as to whether a given proceeding was a "case" for the purposes of this section arose in several matters. Thus, where an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis was granted, it was held that the order granting the permission was one which decided the "case", the case being the subject-matter of the application;[252] so too an order rejecting an application for review.[253] An order under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1899, staying a suit was also held to be "a case" decided under a special Act.[254] Likewise, passing of an ex parte decree was held to be deciding a "case".[255] The Supreme Court has construed the word "case" as follows: The expression "case" is not limited in its import to the entirety of the matter in dispute in an action. This Court observed in Major SS Khanna v Brig. FJ Dillon that the expression "case" is a word of comprehensive import: it includes a civil proceeding and is not restricted by anything contained in section 115 of the Code to the entirety of the proceeding in a civil court. To interpret the expression "case" as an entire proceeding only and not a part of the proceeding imposes an unwarranted restriction on the exercise of powers of superintendence and may result in certain cases denying relief to the aggrieved litigant where it is most needed and may result in the perpetuation of gross injustice. But it was not decided in Major SS Khanna's case[256] that every order of the court in the course of a suit amounts to a case decided. A case may be said to be decided if the court adjudicates for the purposes of the suit some right or obligation of the parties in controversy; every order in the suit cannot be regarded as a case decided.[257] Thus, allowing a question in the examination of a witness after overruling an objection, though an order is not a case decided.[258] An order under section 10 of the Code amounts to a case decided.[259] An order disposing of one challenge to a document without having the effect of disposing of the suit is not a case decided.[260] It would appear that to avoid any future controversy whether a given order is a "case" which has been decided, Parliament has provided the Explanation to this section and in doing so it appears that it has adopted the meaning given to the word "case" by the Supreme Court. Under the Explanation, the expression "any case which has been decided" includes any order made, or any order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding. The expression "in the course of a suit or other proceeding" negates the idea of the word "case" as meaning the matter in action in its entirety.

It may be noticed that in this position a change has been brought about by inserting sub-section (2) to section 115, CPC, providing that if an appeal lies either to the high court or the court subordinate thereto against the impugned order, no revision would lie. However, where any appeal lay either to the court subordinate to the high court or to the high court in respect of the impugned order, there is no change in the position under the law merely because the order is challengeable in the final order or the decree, the jurisdiction to entertain revision is not excluded. The limitation imposed on appeal has been extended to all the appealable orders where the appeal lay to the high court or to any court subordinate thereto but has not been extended to exclude the jurisdiction of the high court where no appeal lie against the impugned order itself. Such a position remains unchanged.[261]

A revision is maintainable against an order rejecting an application seeking stay of a suit on ground that an arbitration agreement is in existence between the parties.[262] In cases where the tribunal constituted under the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988 has passed excessive award of compensation throwing all settled principles to the wind or the quantum of compensation awarded is arbitrary, the insurer is not without remedy. It can, then, instead of resorting to the remedy of appeal which is not available to him under the Act, invoke revisional jurisdiction of the high court under section 115 of the CPC or supervisory jurisdiction under Article 227 of the Constitution of India.[263]

[s 115.26] Conversion of Appeal into Revision and Vice Versa — Impermissibility

The Karnataka High Court, however, is of the opinion that a revision cannot be permitted to be converted into an appeal.[264]

To appreciate the question for permission to convert the appeal into civil revision, it is necessary to consider the relevant provisions for necessary contents in memo of second appeal and memo of revision. As per sub-rule (2) of rule 1, O XLI, memorandum of appeal shall set forth, concisely and under distinct heads, the grounds of objection to the decree appealed from, without any argument or narrative; and such grounds shall be numbered consecutively. In second appeal, memorandum of appeal shall concisely set forth substantial question of law involved in appeal. In the aforesaid circumstances, the contents for memo of appeal in second appeal are based on different requirements, while the memo of revision has to contend the facts of the case and specific averments that the court either has exercised jurisdiction not vested in it by law or has failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, or has acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. Without such averments in the memorandum of revision, it will be incomplete, and the revisional court may not entertain a revision. In the circumstances, memorandum of appeal and memorandum of revision are based on different requirements. In the circumstances, memorandum of appeal cannot be treated as a memo of revision. The position is similar under O XLI, rule 3 of the CPC. If the memorandum of appeal is not drawn up in the manner prescribed under rule 1 of O XLI, the memorandum of appeal shall be rejected or returned to the appellant for the purpose of being amended within a time to be fixed by the court or be amended then and there. In the circumstances, it will not be just and proper to convert the memorandum of appeal into revision. However, appellants who had filed appeal much before the amendment in section 102, CPC, can be permitted to withdraw this appeal with liberty to file a revision or other proceeding as they choose in accordance with law. If the appellants find that the order is revisable as per section 115, CPC, they may file such a revision before the court by taking all the grounds as required for revision, by drafting appropriate memorandum of revision within a period prescribed. In the abovesaid peculiar circumstances, their revision may not be dismissed on the ground of limitation and will be heard and decided in accordance with law. But the appeal cannot be permitted to convert into civil revision.[265]

The nature, quality and extent of appellate jurisdiction exercised in first appeal and of revisional jurisdiction are very different. The exercise of revisional jurisdiction under section 115 is confined to the question of jurisdiction only.[266] A right to appeal carries with it a right of re-hearing on law, as well as fact, unless the statute conferring the right of appeal limits the rehearing in some way. On a reading of sub-section (1) and sub-section (2) of section 115, it is very clear that even if an appeal lies with the high court, no revision can be entertained. However, a revision may be converted to an appeal.[267] Where an appeal is preferred in a case in which no appeal lies, the high court may, in a proper case, treat the memorandum of an appeal as an application for a revision and deal with it on that footing.[268] This would be done in exercise of power under section 151. The court would be justified in passing such an order either in the interest of justice or for preventing abuse of the process of the court.[269] However, this cannot be done if the appeal is not maintainable only as to a part, as it will be inappropriate to treat the same matter in part as appeal and in part as revision.[270] Similarly, if an application for revision is made in a case in which an appeal lies, the application may be converted into an appeal.[271] Where the cause of justice so demands, the court can treat an appeal as a revision (where no appeal lies), provided the conditions of section 115 are satisfied.[272] In a particular case, the revisional court decided the case on merit and did not pass any order on the application to convert the revision into an appeal, though it observed that an appeal, and not a revision was maintainable against the impugned order. The decision of the revisional court could not be held to be void ab initio and non est.[273]

Where a revision petition is filed against an appealable order, the court has discretion to grant permission to convert the revision into appeal in exercise of inherent powers under section 151 of the Code.[274]

[s 115.28] Conversion of Revision in to Writ

Although the revision petition can be treated as a writ petition under Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution of India without an application on behalf of the petitioner, there must be a proper cause for the purpose. If no proper cause has been shown and it is not in the interest of justice, the revision petition cannot be treated as writ under Article 226 or Article 227 of the Constitution of India.

It has been held by the Supreme Court that since a civil revision is not maintainable against an interlocutory order, the high court, in appropriate cases, can permit the revision to be converted into an application under Article 227 of the Constitution.[275] PK BALASUBRAMANYAN, J, speaking for the bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> The respondents had filed the revision originally and during the pendency of that revision the High Court appears to have taken a view that an order in an appeal arising from a proceeding under Order 39, Rules 1 and 2 of the Code, could not be challenged under Section 115 of the Code since the order was in the nature of an interlocutory order. In such a situation, in our view, the High Court rightly decided to permit the revision petitioners before it, to convert the same as a proceeding under Article 227 of the Constitution of India. After all, the court could have done it on its own, even without a motion in that behalf by the petitioner.[276]

not restricted to the entirety of the proceedings in a civil suit. To interpret "case" as in entire proceedings, and not a part of proceedings, would be to restrict the exercise of supervisory jurisdiction of the high court, resulting in gross injustice to an aggrieved litigant. In the view that "case" includes a part of the case, there is no escape from the conclusion that a revisional jurisdiction may be exercised in respect of the question of whether an appeal lies from the ultimate order or decree passed in the suit.[278]

The question of whether proceedings by petition to a civil court under section 10 of the Religious Endowments Act, 1863, constituted a case for the purposes of this section arose before the Privy Council. Their Lordships in that connection observed:

No definition is to be found in the Code of the word "case". It cannot, in their Lordship's view, be confined to a litigation in which there is a plaintiff who seeks to obtain particular relief in damages or otherwise against a defendant, who is before the court. It must, they think, include an ex parte application such as that made in this case, praying that persons in the position of trustees or officials should perform their trust or discharge their official duties.[279]

The word "case" has also been held to include proceedings under the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890; Probate and Administration Act, 1881; Succession Certificate Act, 1889; Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920; Madras Agriculturists Relief Act, 1938, etc.[280] The word also includes election petitions when heard by a judge subordinate to the high court, when he can be held not to be persona grata, but a court; and, where the high court's power to revise has not been expressly taken away.[281]

The Bombay High Court has taken the view that the word "case" includes a part of a case and the high court has, therefore, power to interfere with interlocutory orders. There was divergence of opinion within the court on the question of whether the court should in exercise of its discretion interfere only in cases where there would otherwise be no remedy or whether it may interfere even if the injured party has another remedy, either by way of an appeal against the final decree under section 105 or by way of a suit. The Punjab and Haryana High Court held that the very purpose and object of section 115 would be defeated if the court was to take the view that the interlocutory orders passed by the civil courts are not revisable under section 115 of the CPC. The mere fact that such order can be challenged by way of an appeal against the decree under section 105 of the CPC, would not be sufficient to hold that the revisional jurisdiction of the court under section 115 cannot be exercised against such an order.[282]

The distinction between the decisions of the High Court of Allahabad, on one hand, and those of the other high courts on the other as to the meaning of the term "case", is brought out by the following case. A institutes a suit against B in court X. One of the issues in the suit is whether court X has jurisdiction to try the suit. The court holds that it has and the suit must proceed. B, thereupon, applies to the high court for revision of the order. Has the high court the power to interfere in revision with the order which is an interlocutory order?

According to the Allahabad decisions,[283] the high court has no such power as the order is not a decision of a "case", while, according to the other high courts[284] the high court has such a power, as the word "case" includes part of a case. They further held the high court can interfere if it comes to the conclusion that the order was wrong, although it can be challenged in an appeal against the final decree, for, if court X had no jurisdiction, it would result in unnecessary waste of time and money. The Allahabad view is no longer good law as the Supreme Court has decided that the word "case" is not restricted to a litigation in the nature of a suit but includes all proceedings in which the jurisdiction of a civil court is invoked for the determination of a claim or right legally enforceable and that revision is maintainable against interlocutory orders passed in a suit. A finding that a suit was not maintainable was held to be open to revision.[285]

The expression "case" is not defined in the CPC, nor in the General Clauses Act, 1897. It is undoubtedly not restricted to a litigation in the nature of a suit in a civil court — Balakrishana Udayar v Vasudeva Aiyar;[286] it includes the jurisdiction of the civil court in which the jurisdiction of the court is invoked for the determination of some claim or right legally enforceable. On the question of whether an order of a court which does not finally dispose of the suit or proceeding amounts to a "case which has been decided", there has arisen a serious conflict of opinion in the high courts in India and the question has not been directly considered by this court. One view which is accepted by a majority of the high courts is that the expression "case" includes an interlocutory proceeding relating to the rights and obligations of the parties, and the expression record of any case includes so much of the proceeding as relates to the order disposing of the interlocutory proceeding. The high court has therefore power to rectify an order of a subordinate court at any stage of a suit or proceeding even if there be another remedy open to the party aggrieved, i.e., by reserving his right to file an appeal against the ultimate decision, and making the illegality in the order a ground of that appeal. The other view is that the expression "case" does not include an issue or a part of a suit or proceeding and therefore the order on an issue or a part of a suit or proceeding is not a "case which has been decided", and the high court has no power in exercise of its revisional jurisdiction to correct an error in an interlocutory order.[287]

The word "case" in section 115 is of a very wide import and means any state of facts juridically considered, and therefore an interlocutory order deciding any substantial question in controversy between the parties so as to affect their rights, as distinguished from a purely formal or incidental order, amounts to a case decided within the meaning of section 115, even though such an order is passed in the course of the trial of a suit. Hence, an erroneous decision on a preliminary issue as to jurisdiction will be open to revision.

In State v Krishhnu Mal,[288] while dealing with the situation created on account of remand order having been passed by appellate court, it was held as under:

> The obvious answer to this contention is that this Court is seized of the matter in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction. The District Judge has created an impossible situation by rejecting the cross-objections, while remanding the appeal under a Rule which has no application. The powers of this Court, to remedy such flagrant errors, in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction, are unfettered. It can proceed even "suo motu" in the interest of justice.

In Mina Ram v Amlok Ram,[289] it was observed as under:

> The word "case", used in Section 115, Code of Civil Procedure is a word of comprehensive import and includes civil proceedings other than suits and a part of a proceeding and an interlocutory order directly affecting the rights and obligations of parties is a "case decided". It has been so held by the Supreme Court in a case [290] with respect to the interpretation of Section 115, Code of Civil Procedure which does not apply to him. But these observations apply with full force to the interpretation of clause (a) of paragraph 35(1) aforesaid.
> The order, therefore, of Subordinate Judge directing the petitioner to pay an additional court-fee is a case decided within the meaning of paragraph (35)(1), aforesaid and is revisable. Though the order is interlocutory it affects the rights of the petitioner.

In Sohan Singh and Co v Mohammad Aishak Tyagi,[291] again, while interpreting the word "case" in section 115 of the CPC, it was held as under:

> Held, the expression "case" used in Section 115 is a word of "comprehensive import" and is not restricted to the entirety of proceeding in a Civil Court. To interpret the expression "case" as an entire proceeding only and not a part of the proceeding would be to impose a restriction upon the exercise of power of superintendence, which is inherent in the phraseology of Section 115.

The expression "case" is a word of comprehensive import, it includes civil proceedings other than suits, and is not restricted by anything contained in the section to the entirety of the proceeding in a civil court. To interpret the expression "case" as an entire proceeding only and not a part of a proceeding would be to impose a restriction upon the exercise of powers of superintendence which the jurisdiction to issue writs, and the supervisory jurisdiction are not subject, and may result in certain cases in denying relief to an aggrieved litigant where it is most needed, and may result in the perpetration of gross injustice.[292]

It may be observed that the majority view of the High Court of Allahabad in Buddhulal v Mewa Ram,[293] founded upon the supposition that even though the word "case" has a wide signification, the jurisdiction of the high court can only be invoked from an order in a suit, where the suit and not a part of it is decided, proceeded upon the fallacy that because the expression "case" includes a suit, in defining the limits of the jurisdiction conferred upon the high court the expression "suit" should be substituted in the section, when the order sought to be revised is an order passed in a suit. The expression "case" includes a suit, but in ascertaining the limits of the jurisdiction of the high court, there would be no warrant for equating it with a suit alone.[294]

[s 115.30] Effect of the Amendments Made by Section 43 of the Amendment Act, 1976

Section 43 adds to the original section renumbered as sub-section 1 a new proviso. It also adds a new sub-section 2 and an Explanation. Even as the section stood before its amendment, the revisional power of the high court was limited in the sense that it could interfere only if the subordinate court by its impugned order (a) had exercised jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or (b) it had failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested; or (c) it had acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. These conditions of limitation of power are kept intact. The proviso deals with interlocutory orders only. It further reduces the revisional power of the high court in regard to such orders in that even if a case were to fall under clause (a), (b) or (c), the high court shall not, in exercise of its revisional power, vary or reverse any order made or any order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding unless the order in question is (a) one which, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding, or (b), which if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it has been made. The words "shall not" occurring in the proviso clearly indicate that the proviso is mandatory and prohibits the high court from interfering with the order unless the order is of the class which falls under its clause (a) or (b).[295] The effect of the proviso thus is that the order impugned in revision must not only suffer from some jurisdictional error but must further be of the category falling under either clause (a) or clause (b) of the proviso. Under clause (a) of the proviso, the high court cannot revise an order, even if it suffers from a jurisdictional error, if it is not such that had it been made in favour of the revision-petitioner it would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding. The result of such a restriction will presumably be that orders not falling under clause (a) can only be challenged in an appeal against the final decree under section 105 and until then, they would remain effective during the pendency of the suit or other proceeding. The question of whether an order is such as would result in failure of justice or irreparable injury to the party aggrieved by it would depend on the fact and circumstances of each case. An order dismissing an application under O XI, rule 1, has been held not to fall under clause (b) of the proviso on the facts of the case.[296] In a decision, the Delhi High Court has held that where leave to defend under O XXXVII, rule 2 has been refused and a decree has consequently been passed though the Order of refusal does not fall under clause (a) of the proviso since such an order, if passed in favour of the defendant, would not have finally disposed of the suit it would fall under clause (b) since barring a revision against such an order at the threshold would mean an automatic passing of a decree against the defendant. A revision against such an order is maintainable although an appeal would lie against the decree wherein the order could also be challenged.[297]

Sub-section 2 is a new provision. Its object is to limit revision applications. As the section stood unamended, the high court could entertain revision applications in cases in which "no appeal lies thereto." Though there was at one time a difference of judicial opinion as to the precise meaning of the word "thereto", that difference was finally resolved by the Supreme Court's decision in Major SS Khanna v Brig. FJ Dillon (supra) in which it was clarified that if an appeal lay against the adjudication directly to the high court or to another court from the decision of which an appeal lay to the high court, the high court had no power to exercise its revisional jurisdiction, but where the decision itself is not appealable to the high court directly or indirectly, exercise of the revisional jurisdiction by the high court would not be deemed excluded. The word "thereto" was construed to mean an appeal to the high court directly or immediately or indirectly or immediately. Sub-section 2 alters the position since it provides that the high court shall not vary or reverse any decree or order against which an appeal lies either to the high court or to any court subordinate thereto. The new sub-section lays down new restrictions to the exercise of the revisional jurisdiction of the high court. Read with sub-section (1), it means that even if a revision petition is maintainable under sub-section (1) the high court shall not vary or reverse any decree or order if against such decree or order an appeal lies either to the high court or a court subordinate to the high court. The sub-section is mandatory in that it prohibits the exercise of the power to vary or reverse such a decree or order. In Jokhi Ram Mohan Lal v Smt. Gita Devi,[298] the revision-petitioner in the suit against him for eviction filed, while the suit was pending, an application alleging that the parties had arrived at a settlement and that the suit should therefore be disposed of in terms of the settlement under O XXIII, rule 3. The trial judge, after an inquiry, dismissed the application finding that there was no settlement arrived at by the parties. Under O XLIII, rule 1 as it stood before the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976) an appeal lay before the district judge against such an order and the petitioner in fact filed an appeal in the district court which was pending when the Amendment Act was brought into force. The high court noticed its two earlier decisions, one in Tipan Prasad Singh v Secretary of State,[299] and the other in Maqbool Alam Khan v Khodaija Begum,[300] wherein two different views were taken on the construction of the word "thereto" in section 115 as it then stood (revised to sub-section 1). The earlier decision held that the word "thereto" meant an appeal either to the high court in which only a revision to it would be excluded and the latter case held that the word "thereto" meant an appeal either to the high court or the court subordinate to it and that in either case revision would not be maintainable. The high court after referring to these decisions observed that the new sub-section was enacted to remove this conflict of opinion and that its effect is that "if an appeal lies either to the High Court or to any court subordinate thereto the High Court shall not under this section exercise its revisional jurisdiction for reversing any order or decree". But in the final order it passed, the high court concluded that "the revision application is held to be not maintainable and it is accordingly dismissed". As stated earlier no change has been made in that part of the section which is renumbered as sub-section (1). That means that a revision is still maintainable under sub-section (1) in all cases where no appeal lies "thereto", i.e., the high court and if the decision suffers from any of the infirmities set out in clauses (a), (b) or (c) of that sub-section. Under sub-section (1), the exclusion of the revisional jurisdiction of the high court is limited to cases when an appeal lies to the high court and not to cases where an appeal lies to a court subordinate thereto. Sub-section (2) does not deal with maintainability of a revision but only prohibits the high court from varying or reversing a decree or an order against which an appeal lies to the high court or a court subordinate thereto. It is submitted that the proper construction to be placed on sub-section (2) as its language plainly means is that though a revision may be maintainable under sub-section (1) the high court shall not vary or reverse any decree or order if an appeal therefrom lies either before the high court or a court subordinate to it. Such a construction is preferable as it is in conformity with the words actually employed in sub-section (2). It is submitted that the proper order in Jokhi Ram's case should have been that though the revision was maintainable the high court declines to vary or reverse the impugned order.

The Explanation, as already stated earlier, is an inclusive and not an exhaustive provision in that any order made, or any order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding would be a case which has been decided [see commentary under Interlocutory Orders above]. The Explanation legislatively confirms the Supreme Court's view expressed in Major SS Khanna's case (supra). But the Explanation must be read along with the rest of the section. So read, although an order may be said to be a case decided, every such order would not be revisable unless there is a question of jurisdiction within the meaning of clauses (a), (b) or (c) of sub-section (1) and further it is an order as contemplated by clause (a) or (b) of the proviso.[301] The order also must be one which for the purposes of the suit decides some right or obligation of the parties.[302]

Sub-section 3 of section 97 of the Amendment Act provides: "Save as otherwise provided in sub-section (2), the provisions of the principal Act, as amended by this Act, shall apply to every suit, proceeding, appeal or application, pending at the commencement of this Act or instituted or filed after such commencement notwithstanding the fact that the right, or cause of action, in pursuance of which such suit, proceeding, appeal or application is instituted or filed, had been acquired or had accrued before such commencement." But for the purposes of this section, clause (O) of sub-section 2 of section 97 provides that "the amendment of section 115 of the principal Act by section 43 of this Act shall not apply to or affect any proceeding for revision which has been admitted, after preliminary hearing, before the commencement of the said section 43; and every such proceeding for revision shall be disposed of as if the said section 43 had not come into force." The amended section thus applies to all revision applications except only those which have been already admitted after preliminary hearing before the commencement of section 43.

The words "failure of justice" in section 115, proviso, impose an additional condition. They cannot be taken as merely duplicating the requirement of illegality or material irregularity. In an Andhra Pradesh case, the trial court issued an injunction, restraining a company from evicting an employee's wife and children from quarters allotted by the company. The employee had voluntarily terminated the lease and stayed elsewhere, due to differences with his wife. Rent was directed to be deducted from the maintenance payable by the husband to the wife. It was held that the high court in revision would not interfere with this interlocutory order. There was no failure of justice. The quarter was owned by a legal person and not by a natural person. It was meant to be used by the employees. The husband was under an obligation to provide shelter to his wife and children.[303] The husband and the company, acting in different ways, had been recognising, all these years, the occupation of the quarter by the wife, in her matrimonial right. Neither the company nor the husband would suffer any monetary loss by reason of the interlocutory order passed by the district judge, because the judge had directed a deduction of rental amount from the sum of maintenance payable by the husband to the wife and the children. It almost amounted to making a book transfer. There was no failure of justice.[304]

A petitioner applying for revision must show how the impugned order (if allowed to stand) would occasion failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to petitioner.[305] Refusal of the trial court to re-examine a witness present in court cannot be interfered with in revision unless a clear case of failure of justice or irreparable injury is made out.[306] Defendant's objection was as to the valuation of suit by way of application under section 11 of Rajasthan Court Fees and Suit Valuation Act, 1961. Court overruled plaintiff's preliminary objection to such application and directed defendant's application to be heard. Order would not be interfered within revision. It did not dispose of the suit. Nor did it occasion injustice.[307] Where the trial court rejected a prayer for amendment of written statement, the order amounts to stopping the trial of a case which a party wants to put up. It falls under section 115(2) and is revisable.[308] The trial court in an Allahabad case, rejected the application for summoning original rules and bye-laws and kept the issue alive whether photostat copy of the rules could be admitted in evidence. It was held that if the photostat copy had been outright rejected, plaintiffs' interests would have been adversely affected.[309]

[s 115.32] Explanation — Any Case Which Has Been Decided

There can be no controversy about the meaning of the expression "any case which has been decided" in view of the Explanation inserted in the section which states that a case decided includes an order made or an order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding. However, as the Supreme Court observed in Baldeodas Shivlal's case, every order in a suit cannot be regarded as one deciding a case. For instance, the high court cannot interfere with an order which decides that certain evidence is inadmissible.[310] Such an order does not decide an issue in the suit or the proceeding or part of such proceeding. Similarly, passing of an ex parte interim order, though made in the course of a suit, is not deciding a case.[311] An order which decides a case must be one which determines some legal right or obligation of one of the parties to the suit or the proceeding as the case may be.[312] For example, in a case, the plaintiff, after dismissal of his suit for injunction, filed an application for: (i) stay of the operation of the judgment and decree; and (ii) for allowing the present status quo for a reasonable time to enable the plaintiff to get copies, prefer an appeal and obtain further orders. The order passed simply stated that time had been granted till a certain date for counter and, in the interest of justice, up to that date status quo has to be maintained. It was held that: (i) taking into consideration the fact that, in case the plaintiff: (a) obtained a copy of the judgment and decree in the suit well before the date till which time for filing counter affidavit was granted; and (b) also happened to file an appeal and obtained appropriate orders from the appellate court, there may not be any need for further pendency of the application filed by the plaintiff; and (ii) in such circumstances, the petition itself may become infructuous before the date fixed for filing the counter, the order was a final one, hence, revision was maintainable.[313]

In a case, the issue before the court was whether a temple is a private trust or a public trust. That issue was finally decided on merits after hearing both parties and the matter was not opened for further hearing by trial court. It was held by the Allahabad High Court that it would come under the expression "any case which has been decided" and as such revision against such order would be maintainable.[314] But an order directing issue of notice on an application for temporary injunction, though it may come within the ambit of the expression "case decided", it would not amount to disposal of the application for injunction and as such revision against the order is not maintainable.[315]

An order rejecting an application for issuance of commission does not amount to "case decided" as neither any issue is decided nor any rights of parties are adjudicated upon. Hence, revision against such an order is not maintainable.[316]

Where an application for appointment of receiver was allowed subject to certain conditions and one of the conditions was that the parties were directed to give names of two persons for appointment as receiver, it could be said that the issue with regard to appointment of receiver was not finally decided. The order would be appealable under O XLIII, rule 1(s) of the Code but it is not revisable.[317]

Similarly, where a lower court decides a question of court fees payable on plaint, against the defendant, defendant's revision against the order is maintainable.[318] Order rejecting application for adjournment at the stage of recording of evidence amounts to "case decided". Ordinarily, a court exercising revisional jurisdiction does not interfere with an order refusing adjournment. However, it may do so if there is absence of any reason for rejection of the application. In a particular case, an adjournment was sought as material witnesses could not be summoned. The application was rejected while a similar application of opposite party had been allowed. It was held that the court, in a revision, can interfere in such peculiar circumstances.[319] However, in another case, where the party was prevented by an order of the civil court from taking the benefit of an independent remedy or a special or different procedure prescribed by the legislature, the order amounted to a "case decided" and was open to revision. The question involved was one of jurisdiction.[320]

Mere refusal to frame additional issues does not give a right to the parties to prefer a revision. As no right or obligation of a party is determined by refusal to frame additional issues, it cannot be held to be "deciding a case", so as to attract the expression "case which has been decided" in section 115.[321] A case is said to be decided within section 115 if the court adjudicates, for purposes of the suit, some vital right or obligation in controversy. The mere fact that any of the parties can ultimately challenge the findings before an appellate court, cannot be treated as an absolute bar to the maintainability of a revision petition.

A decision, in order to amount to a "case decided", need not dispose of the suit as a whole. It is sufficient if it decides a vital matter in controversy between the parties.[322] For example, certain lands were acquired by the government for a university. However, certain persons had purchased some lands from the original owner after the acquisition. They filed a suit for permanent injunction against the university by alleging title on the basis of adverse possession. Their applications for temporary injunctions were allowed. It was held that the order granting temporary injunction was liable to be set aside, as the same was passed without considering:

The "case decided" referred to in section 115 of the CPC does not mean the entire case or suit. If the entire case or suit is decided on merits in one way or the other, a statutory appeal is provided under section 96 of the CPC to challenge the said judgment and decree. Section 104 read with O XLIII provides for appeals against orders passed on interlocutory applications, enumerated in the said provision. The Explanation to section 115, CPC, which was introduced by way of Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (Act 104 of 1976), makes it clear that the expression "any case which has been decided" includes any order made, or any order deciding any issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding, setting at rest the controversy regarding the interpretation to the phrase "case decided". Therefore, section 115 of the CPC which confers a supervisory role on this court, has to be exercised at an interlocutory stage prior to judgment and decree and against orders which are not covered under O XLIII, CPC, and would have the effect of deciding the case between the parties. Therefore, it necessarily follows, it has to be against an interlocutory order passed in a suit. From the stage of institution of the suit till its final disposal by way of a judgment and decree there are various stages in a suit where the court is called upon to decide several important rights of the parties. The said rights may be substantial or procedural. If in deciding such rights interlocutory orders are passed, if those orders tend to decide the rights of the parties conclusively and finally, then the correctness or the legality of the order as set out in section 115 has to be gone into by this court in its jurisdiction under section 115 of the CPC. If in passing such orders if the trial court has not violated any of the conditions stipulated in section 115 then it can be legitimately said against such orders no revision lies. Therefore, the word case decided cannot be limited in its import to the entirety of the matter in an action. Any interpretation contrary to this on the said word imposes an unwarranted restriction on the exercise of the powers of superintendence by this court. Otherwise, section 115 of the CPC would be otiose and certainly that was not the intention of the legislature in providing remedies as contained in sections 115, 96 and 104 read with O XLIII of the CPC.[324]

A division bench of the Patna High Court has held that interlocutory orders made in course of hearing of suit or proceeding is not amenable to revisional jurisdiction if such an order does not put an end to the proceeding. There are several applications which require independent adjudication relating to maintainabiliry of suit and once the said adjudication is complete there can be no doubt that the proceeding comes to an end in as much as it would have an effect of finally disposing of proceedings.[325]

Every order in the suit cannot be regarded as a case decided. A case may be said to be decided if the court adjudicates, for the purpose of the suit, some right or obligation of the parties in controversy. A complete and exhaustive definition of case is not possible. It is something wider than suit, but at the same time it is not so wide to include every order passed during the trial of a suit or a proceeding. It is, however, no longer possible to claim that a case decided relates only to main suit and not any other proceedings between the initiation of the suit and its final adjudication. From the inception to the final disposal of the suit, certain proceedings may crop up and they have to be decided in such proceeding. If in such proceedings, some right or obligation of the parties in controversy gets decided, it would amount to the case being decided. A large number of rights and obligations do crop up and they have foundations both, in substantive law as well as in procedural law. If they get decided by interlocutory orders, they are revisable.[326] The Calcutta view is, however, different. According to this view in order to be a "case decided" an order passed in course of suit or other proceedings need not be an order whereby some right or obligation of the parties in controversy has to be decided for the purpose of the suit of that proceedings.[327] The expression "case decided" includes interlocutory orders also if in exercising its revisional jurisdiction, a revisional court is satisfied that if the order impugned is allowed to stand it would occasion failure of justice or would cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made.[328] The object behind the enactment of section 115, CPC, is to provide means to secure correction or rectification of non-appealable order. The expression "case decided" means even if a part of the case and as such even on the fulfilment of the provisions laid down in proviso (b), the interlocutory order[329] can be interfered with. Thus, where an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis was granted, it was held that the order granting the permission was one which decided the "case", the case being the subject-matter of the application;[330] an order rejecting an application for review will also decide a case.[331] Likewise, passing of an ex parte decree was held to be deciding a "case".[332] Allowing of a question in the examination of a witness after overruling an objection, though an order, is not a case decided.[333] Thus, in a particular case, an application for summoning the witnesses for cross examination, when they have already filed additional affidavits, was found to be vague and it did not contain bona fide reasons. It was held that the interlocutory order refusing to summon the witnesses for cross examination after giving cogent and convincing reason would not require indulgence under section 115.[334] Similarly, the order of the trial court refusing to mark the affidavit in evidence amounts to "case decided",[335] the closure of the evidence of the party on the ground that witnesses were not present, though the absence of the witness was on account of inaction of the part of the nazarat of the court, causes failure of justice and can be interfered in revision.[336] The view of the court that it has right to direct a party to subject himself to medical examination involving blood group test is a case decided and can be interfered with in revision.[337] An order under section 10 of the CPC amounts to a case decided.[338] An order disposing of one challenge to a document without having the effect of disposing of the suit is not a case decided.[339] Similarly, an order rejecting an application for issuance of summons to produce documents is not a "case decided".[340] However, an order attaching bank guarantee under O XXXVIII, rule 5 is revisable under section 115.[341] A revision against an order passed by the lower court referring dispute for arbitration in suit filed under section 20 of Arbitration Act, 1940 (replaced by Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996) is maintainable.[342] Order of postponement of decision of issue to a later date, after recording evidence of parties does not amount to "case decided". So, revision against that order would not be maintainable.[343]

It is to be noted that prior to the amendments to the CPC by the old Amendment Act, 1976, the power of revision was wider. By the amendment, certain positive restrictions were put on the high court's power to deal with revisions under section 115. Prior to the said amendment, it was not strictly necessary that the impugned order would have the result of finally deciding the lis or the proceedings in the lower courts. In fact, the power could be exercised in any case where jurisdictional error was committed by the original court or where substantial injustice had resulted. By the old amendment Act, the condition of finally deciding of lis and the proceedings in the subordinate courts was introduced. The proviso which was introduced contains qualifications which are pre-requisites before exercise of power under section 115. They were clauses (a) and (b) of the proviso. Logically, the high court has suo motu power to revise an order where total failure of justice would have occasioned or where irreparable loss would have been caused to the parties against whom it was made. These powers were retained by clause (b). Though after 1976, the exercise of power was somewhat circumscribed, it was not totally curtailed. In other words, the high court could, even after the 1976 Amendment, interfere in cases where there was failure of justice or irreparable loss caused, the nature of the proceedings was substantially changed and the suo motu power of the high court was retained. It was in the nature of power of superintendence of the high court over the subordinate courts. Changes were related to indicating limitations in exercise of power.[344]

The proviso to sub-section 1 speaks of interlocutory orders which are subject to revision under section 115. In order that the high court has jurisdiction to revise an interlocutory order, it is necessary among other things that it must, firstly, be a "case" decided within the meaning of this section and, secondly, that no appeal must lie to the high court from that order. For the purposes of this section, interlocutory orders fall into two classes, namely:

(a) those from which an appeal lies under section 104(1). These are orders made by the court of first instance;

(b) those from which no appeal lies. These may be:

  (i) orders made by the court of first instance from which no appeal is allowed under section 104(1); or

  (ii) orders passed in first appeal from which no second appeal lies having regard to the provisions of section 104(2).

As regards interlocutory orders falling under class (a), the high court has no jurisdiction to revise them as they are appealable orders.[345]

As regards interlocutory order falling under class (b), there has been a conflict of opinion whether they were subject to revision. The conflict turned mainly on the word "case" and the word "may" in the section. The point under question was if the word "case" includes an issue or part of a case. If it did not, the passing of an interlocutory order was not deciding a "case" and therefore, not capable of revision. Some high courts held that the word "case" included part of a case and some others that it did not.

The other part on which the conflict arose was that even if the word "case" included interlocutory orders and, then, the high court could revise such orders. It was not bound to do so as the section by using the word "may" gave discretionary power. The question which arose was, and on this point there was another divergence of opinion, in which cases was it proper for the court in the exercise of its discretion to revise interlocutory orders? To appreciate the different views on the subject, it is necessary to bear in mind that though an interlocutory order may not be appealable under section 104, it may be challenged in the appeal from the final order under section 105, provided the order is one "affecting the decision of the case". Again, there are some interlocutory orders from which an injured party has a right of suit to set aside the order as stated in the note below, "Alternative remedy by way of suit or otherwise". Some cases have held that if a party aggrieved by an interlocutory order has an alternative remedy of challenging that order in an appeal from the final decree under section 105, or if he has the alternative remedy by way of suit, the high court should not in the exercise of its discretion interfere in revision with such order, the power of revision being exercisable only where there is no other remedy. For instance, no appeal lies from an order of a district court made on appeal granting a temporary injunction (section 104(2)). Further, any error in such order cannot be objected to in an appeal from the final decree, as it cannot possibly affect the decision of the case within the meaning of section 105 nor does a suit lie to set aside such an order. The high court, may, therefore, interfere in revision with the order.[346] Similarly, where a court asks a plaintiff to pay additional court fee before his suit can be entertained, the high court may interfere in revision as the order in effect amounts to a denial of jurisdiction.[347] The question posed in a large majority of cases was, why should the discretion of the high court be fettered with such a hard and fast rule and why should the high court refuse to interfere in every case merely because the injured party has another remedy open to him even if its non-interference might lead to failure of justice or irreparable injury? This last consideration weighed with many judges and it has accordingly been held in some cases that the high court may in a proper case interfere in revision even if there is another remedy open to the aggrieved party. Effectively, revision over jurisdiction of the subordinate courts and its scope is almost similar to the power of court under Articles 226 and 227. A division bench of Allahabad High Court held that an order refusing to allow a partner of the defendant's firm to cross-examine was a "case" decided and, therefore, subject to revision.[348] However, where the application for cross examination is moved at a belated stage with a sole object to avoid early disposal of an injunction matter, the interference of the high court in revision is not called for.[349] An order declining the request of the petitioner to produce additional evidence when the main suit is yet to be decided is not revisable in view of proviso (a) of section 115.[350] The final decision of the court to permit or not to permit the secondary evidence, if it is based on erroneous consideration of admissibility of primary evidence, will be an illegality and irregularity in the manner of exercise of its jurisdiction. In such cases, it will be open to the court to exercise power under section 115 of the CPC.[351]

The Allahabad High Court held the view at one time that an interlocutory order was not subject to revision.[352] A full bench of the same high court has since, then, held that though no revision lay from orders disallowing amendment of pleadings, since they are discretionary. However, an independent proceeding arising out of a case such as one to restore a case dismissed for default, or to set aside an ex parte decree, or where the amendment comes under some other order of the court, for example, the addition or substitution of parties, or the striking out of a pleading may be a "case decided" and subject to a revision.[353] The view of maintainability of a revision against the order passed under O VI, rule 17 is settled by the Honourable Supreme Court which held that the high court's interference with an exercise of discretion by the trial court in disposal of an application under O VI, rule 17 must be confined to exceptional cases.[354] The order by which the amendment was allowed could not be said to have finally disposed of the case and, therefore, it would not come under clause (a). From the facts it would appear that appellants only wanted to bring to the notice of the court the subsequent facts and after amendment of the plaint, respondent would get opportunity to file written statement and he would be able to raise all this defence. Ultimately if the suit is decided against the respondent he would have a chance to take up these points before the appellate court. It cannot be conceived of a situation that the proposed amendment if allowed would cause irreparable injury or failure of justice as the remedy of the respondent as stated above, is by way of an appeal; therefore, the view that the order allowing the amendment would not come under clause (b).[355] Unless, there is an error in exercise of jurisdiction by the trial court in disposal of an application for amendment, the high court cannot interfere with the order in exercise of its revisional jurisdiction.[356] An order under section 10 of the Code staying or declining to stay the trial of the suit[357] and an order striking out the defence for non-payment of costs[358] have been held to be "cases decided". An order on the question of valuation of suit properties and the court fees payable thereon is, however, excluded.[359] The Hyderabad High Court has held that only those orders made in a pending action are revisable which are not open to appeal either directly or indirectly and are made in a proceeding which can be regarded as independent of the suit.[360] The Chief Court of Oudh has held that revision of an interlocutory order is not competent.[361]

The High Courts of Bombay,[362] Calcutta,[363] Madras,[364] Patna,[365] Nagpur,[366] Orissa,[367] Rangoon,[368] Andhra Pradesh,[369] Assam,[370] Gujarat,[371] Kerala,[372] Madhya Pradesh,[373] the chief court[374] took a contrary view and held that the word "case" was wide enough to include an interlocutory order, and that the words "record of any case" include so much of the proceedings in any case as relate to an interlocutory order. It held that the high court, therefore, has the power to interfere in revision with the orders passed at any stage of a suit, though there may be another remedy open to the injured party, for example, by making the order a ground of appeal from the final decree under section 105, subject, however, to this limitation that the high court will not interfere unless its non-interference might lead to failure of justice or irreparable injury. That is also the view taken by the other courts in the undermentioned cases.[375] Following this principle, the High Court of Calcutta set aside an order of the subordinate court framing additional issues on the ground that their trial would entail an expenditure of time and money disproportionate to the matter in dispute and cause irreparable injury to the plaintiff.[376] A finding on a preliminary issue as to jurisdiction is revisable,[377] so also a finding as to the maintainability of an appeal.[378] In another case, where the question was whether an election petition was maintainable at all, and the lower court held that it was, the Madras High Court set aside the order in revision and dismissed the petition. The court observed that if the petition did not disclose any ground for an enquiry, the lower court would by holding the inquiry exercise a jurisdiction not vested in it by law.[379] An order holding that a document was insufficiently stamped and impounding it under section 38 of the Stamp Act, 1899 amounts to a decision of a case.[380] An order refusing an application to bring on record the legal representatives of a deceased defendant under O XXII, rule 4 is open to revision.[381]

In Shiva Nathuji v Joma,[382] a full bench held that though the high court will not ordinarily interfere in revision where the aggrieved party has another remedy, it will interfere if that remedy is manifestly ineffectual and non-interference would result in a defeat of law and a grave injury to the aggrieved party. Later, a division bench in Motilal v Nana,[383] held that the high court should not, in its discretion, interfere with interlocutory orders except where the injured party has no other remedy. No reference was made in the judgment to Shiva Nathuji's case. The decision in Motilal v Nana was disapproved in Secretary of State v Narsibhai,[384] where following Shiva Nathuji's case, it was observed that the section did not make the absence of another remedy a necessary condition to inapplicability. Subsequently, another division bench distinguished Secretary of State v Narsibhai, stating that it involved a question of jurisdiction and observed that the overwhelming balance of authority supported the view that a finding of an interlocutory matter followed by an order is not a "case decided". It also stated that the high court cannot interfere in a case where the aggrieved party has another remedy by way of appeal.[385] This view was again dissented from another case, where the court remarked that this case went too far and followed Narsibhai's case.[386] In Ganesh Lakshman v Prem Chand case[387] an order refusing to require the judgment-debtor to furnish security before granting stay was set aside alongwith an order framing an additional issue on the condition that the defendant deposit costs.[388]

The Patna High Court has held that an order of the small cause court returning the plaint for presentation to the proper court[389] and an order refusing to stay a suit under section 10 of the Code[390] are revisable. The same view has been held by Punjab,[391] Andhra Pradesh,[392] Nagpur,[393] and Orissa,[394] High Courts.

On the other hand, the Andhra High Court has set aside an order refusing to examine a witness.[395] In another case, the order appointing a hand writing expert as a commissioner for comparing disputed signature of executant of gift deed with that of his admitted signatures was held to be outside revision.[396] The high court, in a revision at the interim stage, is not justified in interfering with the appellate court's order granting additional evidence by way of examination of hand writing expert, when the appeal is pending for the final hearing before the appellate court.[397]

The revisional court has the power to a grant relief in view of subsequent change of circumstances during the pendency of a revision petition.[398] The Punjab High Court has held that an order deciding the question of privilege under section 123 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 is revisable.[399] The Punjab High Court has, however, observed that an opinion given by the court under section 13(b) of the Arbitration Act, 1940 (replaced by Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996) is not a "case decided", it being purely advisory in character.[400] In another case, the Gujarat High Court set aside an order consolidating the trial of two suits.[401] The grant of leave to defend under O XXXVII of the CPC, on the acceptance of the offer of the plaintiff, if the defendant is ready to furnish bank guarantee is not considered a revisable order.[402] On the failure of the authorities to show that the injunction restraining the authorities from demolishing illegal constructions, would occasion failure of justice or it could cause irreparable injury to authority, the revision against the order is not maintainable.[403] Merely allowing a party to produce a document may not result in violation of justice sufficient enough to invite the mischief of section 115, as the real justice will be meted out when the document is received in evidence in accordance with the provision of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.[404] Where the order of consolidation is passed under section 151 of the CPC, such an order is not appealable, hence, revision is maintainable against such order.[405]

In Chappila v Chemmaran,[406] the facts were that during the pendency in the district court of an appeal against a decree in a partition suit, the appellant who was one of the plaintiffs applied to withdraw the same. The respondents who were co-plaintiffs in the suit, then, applied to transpose themselves as appellants. That application was dismissed and it was followed by an order dismissing the appeal. A revision was then preferred to the high court against the order refusing transposition. Regarding, question of whether the revision was maintainable in view of the order dismissing the appeal, it was held by the High Court of Kerala, on the analogy of an appeal against a preliminary decree after the passing of a final decree, that it was competent. In Pathak Sharma v Renuka Debi,[407] it was held that an order passed before the commencement of proceedings could not be said to be an interlocutory order and that such an order could not be collaterally challenged in a revision petition against a subsequent order.

been amended by Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999). It is clear that this amendment has been brought on the basis of the report of Malimath Committee. The Committee had agreed in principle that scope of interference against interlocutory orders should be restricted and it was felt that this object can be achieved more effectively without demanding the high court of the power of revision and with a view to achieve the object, section 115 has been suitably amended with a view to expedite the disposal of civil suits and proceedings so that justice may not be delayed, which appears to be paramount object behind this amendment. Therefore, in the light of the aforesaid object, the language of the amended proviso is extremely clear, according to which, the high court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any order made or any order deciding an issue, in the course of a suit or other proceeding, except where the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings.[408]

The effect of the same is that it has narrowed down and reduced the scope of civil revisions. Therefore, no orders can be passed even in pending civil revisions varying or reversing any order made, or any order deciding an issue in the course of a suit or other proceedings, except where the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings. Therefore, revision would only lie against such interlocutory orders which would finally dispose of the suit or other proceedings and no revision would lie against any other interlocutory orders which would not finally dispose of the suit or other proceedings, and no orders can be passed in pending cases in which other interlocutory orders are under challenge. Thus, rightly so, the scope of revision has been restricted by legislature by substituting proviso by amendment in the principal section 115 of the CPC by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), with effect from 1 July 2002.[409]

A plain reading of section 115 as it stands makes it clear that the stress is on the question of whether the order in favour of the party applying for revision would have given finality to suit or other proceeding. If the answer is "yes", then the revision is maintainable. But on the contrary, if the answer is "no", then the revision is not maintainable. Therefore, if the impugned order is interim in nature or does not finally decide the lis, the revision will not be maintainable. The legislative intent is crystal clear. Those orders, which are interim in nature, cannot be the subject matter of revision under section 115. There is marked distinction in language of section 97(3) of the old Amendment Act, 1976 and section 32(2)(i) of the Amendment Act. While in the former, there was clear legislative intent to save applications admitted or pending before the amendment came into force, such an intent is significantly absent in section 32(2)(i). The amendment relates to procedures. No person has a vested right in a course of procedure. He has only the right of proceeding in the manner prescribed. If by a statutory change the mode of procedure is altered, the parties are to proceed according to the altered mode, without exception, unless there is a different stipulation.[410]

The revision petition before the high court is wholly incompetent in view of the amended provision of section 115 of the CPC, if the revision petition was entertained at a stage of an interlocutory proceedings.[411] An order interim in nature or which does not finally decide the lis, cannot be challenged by way of a revision under section 115.[412]

Where Supreme Court carefully examined various provisions of CPC and found that no provision is available to the appellant to file an appeal against the order made by the trial court on an application filed under section 151, CPC, therefore, revision against dismissal of application made under section 151 is maintainable.[413]

According to this proviso, therefore, the order cannot be varied or reversed in the exercise of powers under section 115, CPC, for the reason that had the order been made in the favour of the revisionist it would not have finally disposed of the suits.[414]

Before the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), clauses (a) and (b) of proviso to sub-section (1) of section 115 of CPC were invoked for filing a revision before the high court. Thus, a party approaching the high court under section 115 by way of a revision has to necessarily satisfy the requirements specified thereunder. However, after the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) the position is changed. Clause (b) of sub-section (1) has been totally withdrawn. With the result, the only ground available for approaching the high court under section 115 is clause (a) of sub-section (1) viz, "if the order has been made in favour of the party applying for revision would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings". The effect of the provisions under section 115 of CPC after amendment is that a revision petition is maintainable only if the impugned order has got the effect of disposing of the suit or proceedings finally. In all other cases where if the impugned order is interim in nature or does not finally decide the lis, the revision will not be maintainable.[415]

After 1 July 2002, the legislative intent to prohibit such interference in revision is made abundantly clear by the Amendment Act and the provisions of the section. It will be seen that by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), the proviso to section 115(1) was substituted. Clause (b) of the proviso was deleted. Section 115(2) was maintained and clause (3) was added to section 115. As long as the clause (b) of proviso existed on the statute book, it was possible for the high court to interfere in its revisional jurisdiction even if the order is of interim or interlocutory nature provided if such order is allowed to stand, it would result in failure of justice or irreparable loss. Conscious deletion of this provision by the legislature is, therefore, a positive indication of the intent of the legislature that even if the interlocutory order if allowed to stand caused failure of justice or irreparable loss, it should not be interfered with because it is of interim nature and parties can always be relegated to their rights by the appropriate final adjudication of the lis between the parties which will be decided only when the suit from which this arises is decided. That being the clear intent of the legislature, to severely restrict the scope of revisional powers of the high court, to interpret the proviso in a manner which will require reading into that proviso the contents of clause (b) which was definitely and positively eliminated by the legislature by restructuring the proviso, is impermissible in law. It will have, therefore, to be held that the revision application against orders under O XXXIX, rule 1, whether passed by the trial court or in appeal by the appellate authority under O XLIII, rule 1, are not liable to be revised under section 115, CPC, after 1 July 2002.[416]

The reading of the present provisions of section 115 of the CPC is that with effect from 1 July 2002, when the amended provisions have come into force, the revisional jurisdiction of the high court has been materially restricted. In order to invoke the revisional jurisdiction of the high court, the party concerned is not only to satisfy the high court that by the order impugned subordinate court exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law or failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law or acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, but, also, to satisfy the high court that if the order had been made in his favour that would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding. It is not meant to be suggested for a moment that the interlocutory orders or orders passed in supplemental proceedings cannot be challenged under present section 115 of the CPC. The section does not make any differentiation between the classes of orders, which can be challenged. It only provides that for invoking the revisional jurisdiction of the high court, the petitioner must satisfy the requirements of the proviso to section 115. The legislature in its wisdom introduced amendments for imposing restrictions on the powers of revision by the high court. In view of deletion of clause (b) from the proviso, which was introduced by 1976 Amendment, the revisional power can be exercised by the high court only when the order impugned, if had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding. By the proposed amendment, the legislature suggested that no revision would lie against such orders, which do not finally decide the lis. The high court can, therefore, revise any order of any court subordinate to it when it appears to the high court that the said court has exceeded jurisdiction vested in it by law or refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law or acted illegally and with material irregularity in the exercise of the jurisdiction, but in invoking the revisional jurisdiction it is incumbent, as required by the proviso, that the impugned order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding. The legislature consciously deleted the power of the high court to interfere with any kind of order, which, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made.

In exercising the revisional power, the high court cannot ignore the proviso to the main section. The proviso will prevail as it speaks the last intention of the makers. Moreover, the Supreme Court in the case of Prem Bakshi v Dharam Dev,[417] while considering the power of the high court under section 115 of the CPC as it stood prior to amendment of 1999, observed as under:

> The proviso to sub-sections (1) and (2) with Explanation was added by the amending Act of 1976. By this amendment the power of the High Court was curtailed; the intention of the legislature being that the High Court should not interfere with each and every interlocutory order passed by the trial court so that the trial of a suit could proceed speedily and that only the interlocutory order coming under clause (a) or (b) of the proviso would be entertained by the High Court.

Therefore, it can never be suggested that the high court can interfere with each and every order passed by a court subordinate to it only if the requirements of sub-section (1) of section 115 are satisfied or for ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the court can refuse to look into the proviso to said sub-section (1). The amendment was introduced by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) to restrict the power of revision only in respect of cases where the order would have finally disposed of the suit or the proceeding if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision.[418] provisions of section 115, CPC, and considering the fact that the impugned order rejecting the application has not disposed of the suit or the proceeding and hence the revision does not lie.[419]

In the past, i.e., before the Code Of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 2002, (Act No. 22 of 2002), came into force, an order which suffered from jurisdictional error, could have been interfered with by the high court in exercise of its revisional jurisdiction under section 115 if the order under challenge was likely to cause failure of justice or irreparable loss or injury to the party approaching the revisional court, but with clause (b) of the proviso to section 115(1) having been deleted under the new Act, the implication is that even if an order suffers from jurisdictional error or causes failure of justice or irreparable injury to the party approaching the court, the order will not be interfered with in revision unless the order, which is sought to get revised, is such that had the order been made in favour of the party applying for revision, it would have terminated the suit or the proceeding.

It is of immense importance to note that a careful reading of the proviso to section 115(1) will show that this proviso applies in the case of orders, which are interlocutory in nature and not final orders concluding the proceeding or determining the suit. If during the course of progress of a suit or proceeding, an order is made, which suffers from jurisdictional error, the party aggrieved may apply under section 115(1) for revision, but such an order will not be interfered with in revision, even if the same is ex facie without jurisdiction, unless the order is such, which would have, if the order had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, finally disposed of the suit or the proceeding. If the order is such, which even if interfered with, will not terminate the progress of the suit or of the proceeding, the order will not be interfered with. It, therefore, logically follows that a final order, which disposes of the suit or the proceeding, cannot fall within the ambit of the proviso to section 115(1). To a final order, the limitations imposed by the proviso to section 115(1) on the revisional exercise of powers will not apply.

Thus, the proviso to section 115(1) will apply to interlocutory orders alone. In Prem Bakshi's case,[420] the Supreme Court has observed thus:

> Under Clause (a), the High Court would be justified in interfering with an order of a subordinate court if the said order finally disposes of the suit or the proceeding. By way of illustration, we may say that if a trial court holds by an interlocutory order that it has no jurisdiction to proceed with the case or that suit is barred by limitation, it would amount to finally deciding the case and such order would be revisable.[421]
> If on the facts and circumstances of the case, it cannot be said that the application made by the present applicant in revision, had it been granted by the trial court, would have disposed of the suit. Under the circumstances, it must be found that High Court cannot "vary or reverse any order made, or any order deciding an issue".

It necessarily follows that the present revision is not maintainable and/or incompetent.[422]

Admitted facts reveal of a suit between an Indian citizen and United States company based in California. Request to record the evidence either by way of commissioner or audio-video link was sought for and the same had been rejected. There was a time schedule in the case on hand. If these witnesses were not examined in time, though an order would be passed by the learned judge, it would virtually amount to a disposal of the suit without evidence. It also would result in finally disposing of the proceedings itself. Interest of justice requires that a very narrow interpretation is not to be placed on the proviso and the order is to be understood in the light of its effect resulting in virtual final disposal of the suit itself. If a party is not permitted to lead evidence in terms of an order of court, nothing survives, except factually deciding the suit itself without the support of evidence. Therefore, this order would almost result in virtual final disposal of the suit itself and hence notwithstanding section 115(1) proviso, the matter requires the high court's interference. The Supreme Court also ruled that if an order under rule suffers from any specific injustice, courts have to step in to render justice to the parties.[423]

The Supreme Court has considered the scope of section 115 as under:

> The proviso to sub-section (1) of Section 115 puts a restriction on the powers of the High Court inasmuch as the High Court shall not, under this section vary or reverse any order made or any order deciding a issue, in course of a suit or other proceedings except where (i) the order made would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings or (ii) the said order would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it is made. Under clause (a), the High Court would be justified in interfering with an order of a subordinate court if the said order finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings. By way of illustration we may say that if a trial court holds by an interlocutory order that it has no jurisdiction to proceed the case or that suit is barred by limitation, it would amount to finally deciding the case and such order would be revisable. The order in question by which the amendment was allowed could not be said to have finally disposed of the case and, therefore, it would not come under clause (a). Now the question is whether the order in question has caused failure of justice or irreparable injury to respondent no 1. It is almost inconceivable how mere amendments of pleadings could possibly cause failure of justice or irreparable injury to any party. Perhaps the converse is possible, i.e., refusal to permit the amendment sought for could in certain situations result in miscarriage of justice. After all amendments of the pleadings would not amount to decisions on the issue involved. They only would serve advance notice to the other side as to the plea, which a party might take up. Hence, we cannot envisage a situation where amendment of pleadings, whatever be the nature of such amendment, would even remotely cause failure of justice or irreparable injury to any party. From the facts extracted above, it would show that appellants only wanted to bring to the notice of the court the subsequent facts and after amendment of the plaint, respondent no 1 would get opportunity to file written statement and he would be able to raise all his defence. Ultimately if the suit is decided against the respondent no 1, he would have a chance to take up these points before the appellate court. It cannot be conceived of a situation that the proposed amendment if allowed would cause irreparable injury or failure of justice as the remedy of the respondent no 1, as stated above, is by way of an appeal. We are, therefore, of the view that the order allowing the amendment would not come under clause (b).[424]

No revision would lie unless the order sought to be revised, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings. Borrowing terminology from the precedents laid down under section 397(2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, not only interlocutory orders but also intermediate orders are not amenable to revisional correction under the amended section 115 of the CPC. All available indications compellingly point to that conclusion that only final orders sensu stricto will be revisable.

The contention that the words "other proceedings" appearing twice in the amended proviso to section 115(1) in the expression "suit or other proceedings" must be expanded to include interlocutory proceedings also, cannot be accepted and would hence be revisable.

Such introduction of the words "interlocutory" in front of the word "proceeding" in the proviso would defeat the very purpose of the proviso. If such a construction were accepted, it would be impossible to locate any order to which the bar under the proviso would apply. That contention is nothing but civil.

The argument that the expression "any case which has been decided" appearing in section 115 (1), as clarified in the Explanation of section 115, and as explained in some binding and persuasive precedents, must persuade the high court to water down the apparent rigour of the amended proviso to section 115 (1), cannot obviously be accepted. The prohibition in the amended proviso does not permit this court to accept such a course. The width and the amplitude of the expression "any case which has been decided" must be appreciated and understood in the light of the very specific prohibition introduced by the amended proviso.

It follows from the above discussions that an order will not be revisable under the amended section 115 unless such order if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings in which such order is passed. The plain reading of the amended statutory provision cannot lead to any other conclusion. The circumstances under which the amendment is brought about cannot also persuade the high court to take any other view.[425]

[s 115.35] Sub-section (1) — Proviso — Pending Matters

Provisions of sub-section (2) of section 32 with its sub-clause (i), the repeal and savings clause, makes it clearer as it starts from a clause which prevails over other clauses, "Notwithstanding and without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897" and under sub-clause (i) it has only saved the revision which had been finally disposed of. These provisions of repeal and savings of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) have already taken care of the provisions of General Clauses Act, 1897. In fact, there is no provision in this amendment in favour of pending proceedings. Therefore, it is clear that there is no substance in the submissions made in this regard, that section 6 would save the pending cases. Thus, from the plain and combined reading of this substituted "proviso" and the provisions of repeal and savings of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), it has only saved the finally disposed of revisions and not the pending revisions, therefore, it is clear that revisional power can only be exercised in accordance with the provisions of law in force at the time when the power is sought to be exercised and when the high court shall vary or reverse any order made. The legislature has clearly intended to limit the jurisdiction of the high court in exercising the powers under revision and those can only be exercised in cases where the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings otherwise not. Therefore, the clear meaning is that no revision would be maintainable against any interlocutory order if it would not have the effect of finally disposing of the suit or other proceedings.

In view of the aforesaid discussion, it is clear is that in the presence of repeal and savings clause (i) of sub-section (2) of section 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), and also according to the full bench decision,[426] the substituted "proviso" of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) is very clear and the effect of the same is that it will not save those pending civil revisions which would be outside the scope of amended proviso.[427]

Clause (i) of sub-section (2) of section 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) is very specific in its intendment, according to which, the amended provisions will not apply only to revision petitions which have already been disposed of. This by necessary implication, means that the amended provisions touching upon the jurisdiction of this court will have its full application to all such revision petitions which are pending before high court irrespective of its stage.[428]

It is very evident from the language of section 32(i) of the Amendment Act that the amendment shall apply to and affect all proceedings for revision which had not been finally disposed of before 1 July 2002. These revisions belong to that category of revision petitions which have not been finally disposed of prior to the date of the amendment (1 July 2002). The language of section 32(i) makes it crystal clear beyond controversy that the amended section 115 of the CPC will apply to pending proceedings for revision which have not been finally disposed of prior to 1 July 2002.[429]

It should be borne in mind that the Orissa Amendment came into operation with effect from 7 November 1991, vide Orissa Act, 1991, whereas the provision of section 115, CPC is as per the Act 46 of 1999 which came into force with effect from 1 July 2002. The relevant portion of section 32 of the Amendment Act 46 of 1999 which prescribes for repeal and savings, reads as hereunder:

> Repeal and savings:- (1) Any amendment made, or any provision inserted in the principal Act by a State Legislature or High Court before the commencement of this Act shall, except insofar as such amendment or provisions is consistent with the provisions of the principal Act as amended by this Act, stand repealed.
> (2) Notwithstanding that the provisions of this Act have come into force or repeal under sub-section (1) has taken effect, and without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 (10 of 1897)-
>
> (a) to (h)
>
> (i) the provisions of Section 115 of the principal Act, as amended by Section 12 of this Act, shall not apply to or affect any proceeding for revision which had been finally disposed of.

In view of the provision in Article 254 of the Constitution of India, if any provision of the state law, if repugnant to any provision of law made by the Parliament, then, to the extent of the inconsistency or repugnancy, the law made by the Parliament shall supersede and prevail, and to that extent the law made by the state legislature shall not be enforceable. Therefore, on a comparison of section 115, CPC, after the aforesaid amendment in the year 1999 and the Orissa Amendment Act of 1999, section 115 which has been made in the year 1991, though the Orissa Amendment is enforceable but only to the extent it is consistent with the law made by the Parliament. Therefore, clause (ii) to the second proviso below clause (c) of section 115 of the Orissa Amendment, i.e., "the order if allowed to stand would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made" is no more enforceable, being repugnant to section 115 as it stands. It is needless to say that the remaining part of section 115 of the Orissa Amendment shall still be operative being not repugnant to the existing provision of section 115, CPC.[430]

Regarding the expression "other proceeding" referred to in the proviso to sub-section (1) of section 115 of the CPC, from a reading of the statute, it was never the intention of the makers of the law that by inclusion of the expression "other proceeding" they intended to vest the high court with the power of revision even in respect of order that may be passed in interlocutory or supplemental proceeding to a suit. The expression "in the course of a suit" is sufficient to vest the high court with the power of revision against the interlocutory orders passed by the court subordinate to it provided, however, the requirements of the proviso are satisfied. It appears that by insertion of the expression "other proceeding", the legislature intended to vest the high court with the power of revision in respect of order passed in the civil proceedings, which are registered other than suits. The expression "other" indicates different and distinct proceedings from those, which are registered as suits. A full bench, in the case of Deb Narain Dutt v Narendra Krishan,[431] held that "the word 'proceeding' is a very general one, it is not limited to proceedings connected with civil suits, but includes, I suppose, proceedings other than civil proceedings, and civil proceedings other than suits."

If the interpretation, that in view of the insertion of the expression "other proceeding" all types of orders passed in interlocutory or supplemental proceeding can be revised by the high court, the very purpose of the introduction of the amendment will be frustrated inasmuch as the whole purpose behind introduction of the amendment by Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) in respect of the exercise of the revisional power was to curtail the power of revision in order to avoid delay in disposal of the suit or the proceeding.[432]

Even after the amendments in 1976, in 1999 and prior to the amendment in 1976, the revision power was exercisable in a case where the order or the decree, as the case may be, was not appealable.

Sub-section (2), which was introduced by the old Amendment Act and retained even after present amendment, provides that the high court shall not interfere where the order or the decree is appealable in courts subordinate to the high court.[433]

The Supreme Court[434] has held that even if there is a procedural irregularity in the process of passing such order, if the order passed is a decree under law, no revision lies under section 115 of the Code in view of the specific bar under sub-section (2) thereof. It is only appealable under section 96 read with O XLI of the Code. The order passed by the trial court was found to be a composite order on rejection of the plaint as there was no cause of action and dismissal of the suit was not maintainable on the ground of res judicata. Both aspects were held to be covered by the definition of decree under section 2(2) of the Code and, therefore, the remedy was held to be only appeal and not revision even if there is any irregularity in passing the order.

Section 115 must be read as a whole and the principle of harmonious construction must be applied to avoid inconsistency or repugnancy between sections 115(1) and 115(2). The bar under section 115(2) is on the exercise of revisional power, where the party is provided with the right of appeal to the high court or the subordinate court against the impugned order. It is not a bar to exercise revisional power under section 115(1) against an appellate order. Where an objection against a preliminary decree passed in the suit for dissolution of partnership and accounts is rejected by the trial court and the final decree is passed, the order rejecting the objection having been merged in final judgment and decree, no revision lies against that order in view of specific and mandatory provision of section 115(2). The only remedy available is to vindicate the grievance against the order rejecting the objection in the regular appeal against the final judgment and decree.[435] In a particular case, the first appellate court rejected a prayer for amendment of pleading, so as to add a new ground for asserting the legitimacy of the plaintiff in a partition suit. It was held that such an order cannot be challenged, by way of a revision, as it does not fall within the section 115, proviso. However, the question of acceptance or rejection of the amendment is a substantial question of law which can be raised in second appeal.[436] The order declining to set aside the local commissioner's report does not result in failure of justice nor does it cause irreparable injury to the petitioner, where it is meant only for preparation of inventory. Therefore, a revision against the same order is not maintainable.[437] A revision is not maintainable against the refusal to grant leave to defend a summary suit. After the judgment is passed, the defendant may assail the decision by way of an appeal. In the event that conditional leave has been allowed to the defendant, he must abide it and perform the obligations cast upon him or face the inevitability of a judgment being pronounced against him because of non-compliance of the conditions. It would be incongruous if he were to be better placed than the defendant who has been denied leave to defend altogether.[438]

When the admitted position is that section 132 of the Karnataka Panchayat Raj Act, 1993 provides for appeal to the district judge against the order passed under section 17 of Karnataka Panchayat Raj Act, 1993, rejecting application for rejecting election petition in the presence of a provision for appeal, the civil revision petition is clearly misconceived.[439] Upon determination of the question of title under sub-rule (2) of rule 58 of O XXI, the court below has disallowed the objection of the petitioner. The court having done that, the order amounts to a decree in sub-rule (4), and can be challenged only in appeal. Thus, the challenge made to the impugned order in this revision under section 115, treating it as an interlocutory order, is not maintainable.[440]

Section 2(2) of the CPC defines "decree". It is made clear therein that it shall be deemed to include the rejection of a plaint and the determination of any question within section 144. The order rejecting the plaint is therefore a decree in the eye of law and as such appealable in nature. For that reason, section 115 of the CPC relating to revisional jurisdiction cannot be applied to that case.[441]

In a suit, a preliminary decree for partition and redemption was passed. Though application for final decree was filed, the same was dismissed without passing any judgment even in respect of the preliminary decree providing for partition. The order, not being a final order or decree, revision against the same is maintainable.[442]

Revision against an order refusing to grant temporary injunction is not maintainable. The aggrieved party can file appeal under O XLIII, rule 1(r) of the Code. The decision of the apex court in Vidya Vati v Devi Das[443] is not applicable with effect from 1 February 1977 when sub-section (2) was inserted in section 115 by Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976). Sub-section (2) of section 115 clearly provides that under revisional jurisdiction, the high court shall not vary or reverse any decree or order against which an appeal lay either to the high court or any court subordinate thereto.[444]

A new sub-section (3) has been added in section 115 by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), which states that revision shall not operate as a stay of suit or other proceeding before the court except where such suit or other proceeding is stayed by the high court.[445]

If the impugned order is an order under rule 3 of O XXXIX and no appeal lies against that order under O XLIII, rule 1 of the CPC, and since no appeal lies against this order, the bar of section 115(2) is not applicable in the case.[446]

[s 115.40] Alternative Remedy by Way of Suit or Otherwise

The powers conferred upon the high court by this section are discretionary. Hence, though a party may not have a remedy by way of an appeal, the high court may, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse to interfere under this section if there is any other remedy open to the party. In exceptional circumstances, depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case, the high court is not prohibited from entertaining a revision petition under section 115 of the CPC.[447] The special and extraordinary remedy by invoking the revisional powers of high court should not be exercised unless as a last resource for an aggrieved litigant.[448]

The other remedy open to the applicant must be a certain and conclusive remedy allowed by law.

Upon the principle stated above, no application would have been entertained to revise an order made under O XXI, rules 60, 61, or 62 as no appeal lies from such order. However, the party against whom the order is made has a special remedy by way of suit under O XXI, rule 63.[449] That is so, also where a remedy by way of suit is available under section 73(2) against an order allowing rateable distribution of assets of a judgment-debtor.[450] Similarly, no application can be entertained to revise a decree passed in a suit for possession instituted under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877. However, though no appeal lies from a decree passed in such suit, the party against whom the decree is passed is not precluded from instituting a regular suit to establish his title to possession.[451] The High Court of Mysore has held that the high court will not interfere in a revision with an order passing an ex parte decree since the defendant can apply to have such a decree set aside or appeal against it.[452] If the remedy is a doubtful one, the high court may interfere by way of a revision under this section.[453] Even if the remedy is certain and conclusive, the high court may, in an exceptional case, interfere by way of revision under this section.[454] The High Court of Nagpur in this regard held, "No doubt the ordinary rule is that where an aggrieved party has other remedy available, this court is unwilling to interfere, but it is unquestionable, that even if there be such remedy, this court may interfere in exceptional cases".[455] Thus, even where another remedy is open, the high court should interfere, where non-interference will result in multiplicity of proceedings, delay and unnecessary expense to the parties.[456] In a case where the lower court refused the application of a decree holder for rateable distribution under section 73, on the ground that there was another property of the judgment-debtor available for the satisfaction of his claim, the High Court of Madras interfered in revision under this section, even though the applicant had clearly a remedy by suit. Justice Miller in that case, said:

> I do not depart from the view...that where a party has a remedy elsewhere than in the High Court, the High Court should not except in special cases interfere [under this section]. But here we have a case in which there is no doubt as to the rights of the parties, and no remedy if I do not interfere, except by a suit to which there can be no defence, and which therefore, would merely multiply proceedings. In such a case the lesser evil, at any rate is interference under [this section].[457]

When the court, on an erroneous view of the law, refused to proceed with the suit until the court fee was paid, the High Court of Madras interfered with the interlocutory order, as it would give more complete and efficacious relief and avoid unnecessary multiplicity of proceedings.[458] However, the court cannot interfere unless the particular point can be shortly and conveniently disposed off.[459] In a Patna case, MANUK, J., said:

> When the High Court can by interfering under section 115 in appropriate cases terminate the litigation the mere fact that another remedy by suit only lies should not per se be a reason for non-interference.[460]

The following are instances of exceptional cases which have been held to justify revision, although a remedy by suit was available:

(i) an order refusing to inquire into an objection to an attachment when the applicant was under the impression that the attachment had ceased and that it was not necessary to file a suit under O XXI, rule 63;[461]

(ii) an order dispossessing a judgment-debtor under O XXI, rule 98, although the decree-holder purchaser had agreed to allow him to remain in possession;[462]

(iii) a decree under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, when the court had no jurisdiction at all, the summary suit being barred by the provisions of the Agra Tenancy Act, 1901;[463]

(iv) when the court actually refused jurisdiction to entertain an application for a review based on an allegation of fraud.[464]

(v) if the facts and circumstances show that the trial court has disposed of the case on an obvious misapprehension as to the legal position.[465]

An order refusing an amendment or refusing to frame an issue can be interfered with in revision, even though the order under section 105 could have been made a ground of objection in the appeal.[466] These exceptional cases are so numerous that a full bench of the High Court of Allahabad has said that it cannot be laid down as a general proposition that the high court has no power of intervention when there is another remedy, by way of a suit. It has held that each case must be considered on its merits.[467]

[s 115.41] Whether High Court May of Its Own Motion Call for Record

The high court may, of its own motion, call for any record under this section, if it appears desirable to do so.[468] However, such an exercise should be in any case which has been decided by the court subordinate to it and the court should have decided it in contravention of the clauses (a)–(c) of sub-section 1 of section 115. necessity for the high court to invoke its suo motu powers. Therefore, the revision petition not filed against any order or decision of the court will not be maintainable.[469] It is not necessary for the exercise of its powers, under this section that it should be put into motion by the party aggrieved by the proceedings complained of. It has been so held by the High Courts of Calcutta, Allahabad and Madras.[470] A party dying during the pendency of a revision application does not put an end to such revision, for the high court can always call, even suo motu for the record and satisfy itself about whether the impugned order requires its interference.[471] In a Bombay case, however, where a collector applied to the high court to revise a decision of a Mamlatdar, the high court declined to interfere, stating that in so doing it was following the established practice of the court. It further held that the defendant, if he felt aggrieved, could himself apply to that court.[472]

[s 115.42] Subordinate Court

A high court has no power of revision under this section unless the case is decided by a "court", and further, it is decided by a court "subordinate" to the high court. The word "court" means a court of civil judicature. Thus, a Debt Settlement Board is not a "civil court".[473] The district judge, having jurisdiction to hear the election petition under rule 80 of the Rajasthan Panchayati Raj (Election) Rules, 1994, is an authority according to section 117 of the Rajasthan Panchayati Raj Act, 1994. The decision of this authority cannot be called in question by way of appeal. The term "court" used in various headings of the Rules of 1994 is meant only to show that while hearing the election petition the judge functions as a "judicial tribunal" and that it is only in that sense that the word seems to have been used. The judge is not made identical with the civil court. It is, therefore, apparent that intention of the legislature in enacting the relevant provisions was to create an "election tribunal" and not a "civil court". Thus, the judge acting under rule 80 of the Rajasthan Panchayati Raj Election Rules, 1994 is a persona designata and his action in dealing with the election petition cannot be revised by the high court under section 115, CPC.[474] The word "civil court" also excludes:

(i) a tribunal appointed under Displaced Persons (Debts Adjustment) Act, 1951;[475]

(ii) an authority constituted under section 15 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936;[476]

(iii) an arbitrator appointed under section 19(2) of the Defence of India Act, 1939;[477]

(vii) The district judge having jurisdiction to hear the election petition under rule 80 of the Rajasthan Panchayati Raj (Election) Rules, 1994.[481]

However, an order passed by the district judge in an appeal under section 17 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936 is open to a revision.[482] So also an order under section 20 of the Minimum Wages Act, 1948 has been held to be revisable under that section.[483] The motor accidents claims tribunal is a court subordinate to high court and also subordinate to it under section 115 of the CPC.[484]

When a judicial officer is given the right to determine certain matters of a judicial or a quasi-judicial nature, unconnected with the ordinary jurisdiction which he exercises under the law, a question will arise whether he acts as a court or as a persona designata. In the latter case, no revision will lie to the high court. Where the word used in the enactment giving the special jurisdiction is not "court" but "judge" the entire enactment is to be looked into to find out whether the matter is to be decided by him as a court or in his personal capacity.[485] The deputy commissioner, under Scheduled Districts Act, 1874, is clothed with the revisional power of high court and the same must be exercised in conformity with power under section 115.[486] In Shyam Sundar Agarwal's case, the Supreme Court clarified that the revisional powers provided under rule 36A of the Administration of Justice and Police (in Khasi and Jaintia Hills) Rules, 1937, has to be exercised in conformity with revisional powers as contained in section 115 of the CPC. Full bench of the Meghalaya High Court has held that the judgment of the hon'ble apex court in Shyam Sundar Agarwal's case alone would govern the field.[487] A civil revision petition, under section 115 of CPC, is maintainable before the high court against the order passed by the appellate authority under section 113 of the Kerala Panchayat Raj Act, 1994 or under section 189 of Kerala Municipality Act, 1994.[488] A court of exclusive jurisdiction is not subordinate to the high court.[489] A district registrar is not a "court" within the meaning of this section,[490] nor is a collector dealing with an application under section 18 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894.[491] The term also does not include the rent controller of Rangoon;[492] neither does it include a district judge acting under section 4 of the Bombay Act 12 of 1850.[493] When a district judge acts under the powers conferred on him by section 139 of the Madhya Pradesh Municipalities Act, 1961, he acts as a court and not as a persona designata and therefore, a revision in a suitable case lies against his order.[494] Similarly, the chief judge of the small cause court at Bombay acting under the powers granted to him by section 33 or section 218 of the Mumbai Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, is not a court subordinate to the High Court of Bombay;[495] nor is a district judge acting under section 23 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1873, a court subordinate to the High Court of Bombay.[496] The term "court" does not also include a judge acting under section 15 of the Bombay City Municipalities Act, 1925,[497] nor a chief judge of the small causes court at Rangoon acting under powers conferred by section 14 of the City of Rangoon Municipal Act, 1922.[498] The term also excludes a district judge giving an opinion under the Mandalay Municipal Election Rules.[499]

A district judge deciding a rent suit under United Provinces Tenancy Act, 1939, is a revenue court and so not subordinate to the high court.[500] The chief judge of small causes court, acting under the Madras City Municipal Corporation Act, 1999,[501] or a subordinate judge acting as an election commissioner under the Tamil Nadu District Municipalities Act, 1920,[502] or exercising powers under section 15 of the Rangoon Rent Act, 1920[503] is a persona designata and not a court subordinate to the high court, so also, an assistant judge deciding an election petition under the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Act 18 of 1925) will fall under the same category.[504] A full bench of the High Court of Madras has held that the high court has no power to revise orders passed by a board of revenue under section 11,[505] or section 205[506] of the Madras Estates Land Act, 1908. An order of the Calcutta Improvement trust tribunal acting as a court under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 is subject to revision.[507] district judge acting under section 57 of the Madras Local Boards Act 14 of 1920 has been held to be a court within the meaning of this section.[508] The same applies to a district judge exercising powers under section 40A of the Bengal Agricultural Debtors Act, 1936[509] as also to a district judge exercising powers of a kazi,[510] or a commissioner exercising powers under section 3(1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923.[511] In this case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, it was said that the use of the term "judge" instead of "court" is not sufficient to imply that he acts as a persona designata; but in the case of Sholapur Municipality v Tuljaram,[512] Patkar, J, said that when a judge or presiding officer of a court, as distinguished from the court itself, is directed to perform any function of an authority created by statute, he should be considered a persona designata and not a court.

The High Court of Kumaun is not a court subordinate to the High Court of Allahabad.[513]

A collector exercising judicial functions under the Bombay Mamlatdars' Court Act, 1906 is a court within the meaning of this section,[514] and so is a civil court acting or purporting to act under the provisions of section 10 of the Religious Endowments Act, 1863.[515]

It has been held by the High Courts of Madras, Allahabad, Bombay, Rangoon and Nagpur and Gujarat that when an application is made to the collector for a reference to the civil court under section 18 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, and the application is rejected, the collector does not act as a court and his order is not subject to revision by the high court.[516] A contrary view was taken by the Oudh court,[517] and at one time by the Calcutta High Court[518] but a different view has since been expressed by it on the questions as to whether the land acquisition collector is a court subordinate to the high court[519] and the full bench of the same court has overruled the earlier decisions.[520] The Patna[521] and Calcutta[522] High Courts have held that a collector acting under the second proviso to section 49 of the 1894 Act is a "court", and an order made by him refusing to refer to the civil court a question under that proviso is subject to revision by the high court. The High Court of Calcutta has held that a collector acting under section 11 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 is not a "court" within the meaning

[s 115.43] Decision of a Single Judge of a High Court

A judge of a high court sitting alone is not a court subordinate to the high court, but performs a function directed to be performed by the high court. There is, therefore, no revision from his decision under this section.[541]

The expressions "court below" and "court subordinate" have different connotations. While a single judge of a high court is a "court below", in relation to a bench hearing an appeal under the Letters Patent, he is not a "court subordinate" to the high court within this section.[542] As to whether a non-appealable order of a single judge can form the subject matter of a review and reconsideration by division bench, has been discussed in detail in Issardas v Hari.[543]

[s 115.44] Decision of a Single Judge of the Chief Court of Oudh

The court of a single judge of the chief court of Oudh determining a suit of more than Rs 5 lacs in value as provided by section 7 of the Oudh Courts Act, 1925 (4 of 1925), is not a subordinate court to the chief court which is the high court referred to therein and, therefore, no revision lies against its order.[544] A single judge of a high court is not "subordinate" to the division bench merely because there is provision for letters patent appeal. Article 214 of the Constitution makes it clear that the high court is one court.[545]

[s 115.45] The Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 Sections — 195(3), 476A [Now Section 340(2)], 476B [Now Section 341(1)] and "court subordinate"

For the purpose of section 195(3) (revised to section 195(3)), a civil court is subordinate to that court to which appeals ordinarily lie. Under the Punjab Courts Act, 1918, appeal lies ordinarily from the subordinate court to the district court or high court. The court of the Additional District Judge is different from the district court.

A moved court B, which succeeded court C, which had heard the original suit for filing a complaint under sections 193 and 471 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860. That was transferred to court D, which directed a complaint to be filed. An appeal against this order was referred to the district court and that was transferred to the court of the Additional District Judge, who reversed the order and dismissed the petition. This order was, in turn, set aside by the high court in a revision. It was held by the Supreme Court that court D was not competent to sanction the prosecution as it was neither the original court nor its successor; that the order of the Additional District Judge was without jurisdiction as the court of the subordinate judge was not subordinate to him. The order of the high court was right in so far as it set aside the order of the Additional District Judge but was wrong in upholding the order of the subordinate judge as he had no jurisdiction to make the complaint.[546]

The word "jurisdiction" originally seems to mean the entitlement "to enter upon the enquiry in question".[547] But as MATHEW, J, described the word,[548] it is "a verbal cast of many colours". It is not confined to the jurisdiction to entertain a suit or an appeal. A court may have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or an appeal, and yet it may have no jurisdiction to pass a particular order in the suit or the appeal. If it does so, the case falls under clause (a) of sub-section 1 and the high court will be entitled to interfere in a revision. This follows from the decisions of the Privy Council in Lachmi Narain v Balmukund,[549] and Brij Mohan v Rai Uma Nath.[550] A contrary view expressed by a full bench of the Patna High Court in Dominion of India v Hazari[551] is, it is submitted, not correct in as much as the trial court there had no jurisdiction to proceed with the suit and pass the decree against the railways without there being a notice under section 77 of the Railways Act, 1890, which is mandatory under that section.

Since the question of jurisdiction touches the root of the matter, it can be raised in a revision for the first time even if it has not been taken in the lower court.[552] Where the court below decides that the suit has abated only against one of the defendants and that it would proceed against the remaining defendants, the order results in terminating a part of the controversy involving the question of jurisdiction. Hence, a revision against such an order is maintainable.[553] The high court cannot, in its revisional jurisdiction, travel beyond the scope of section 115 and go into matters which are not relevant for the purpose of testing the jurisdictional error committed by the court below.[554] In a particular case, the lower court decided the question of court fee payable on the plaint against the defendant's contention. The matter involved the question of pecuniary jurisdiction. It was held the defendant's revision against the lower court's order was maintainable.[555] In another case, it was held that the decision on the question of whether the building in dispute had been a construction of more than 10 years on the date of the suit, was the determination of the jurisdictional question under Uttar Pradesh Urban Buildings (Regulation of Letting, Rent and Eviction) Act, 1972, upon which the jurisdiction of the court depends. Therefore, it was open to the high court in exercise of its revisional jurisdiction to review the findings.[556]

In the High Court of Patna, the settled practice is that where two distinct matters are dealt with by one order of the court below, then the party aggrieved thereby must file a separate revision application, challenging in each case the two distinct matters in regard to which the revision is sought.[557] The order of attachment by the executing court, if passed without jurisdiction, can be set aside by the high court in a revision.[558] In a Madhya Pradesh case, eviction of a tenant had been ordered. The tenant had failed in the apex court. Legal representatives of the tenant filed a suit on the ground that the eviction was obtained by fraud. An application for temporary injunction, for restraining the decree holder from execution of the decree, was rejected. It was held that no error of jurisdiction had been committed by the court and the order of rejection was not amenable to interference in a revision.[559] An order of interim custody under sections 12 and 25 of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890, passed by the trial court, cannot be interfered with in a revision where there is no error of jurisdiction.[560]

An order granting conditional leave to defend in a summary suit is a jurisdictional question and revision against such order is maintainable. However, where conditions are not fulfilled in terms of the order granting leave to defend and the suit is decreed, the grant of conditional leave can be challenged in appeal against the decree.[561] SINHA, J, speaking for the bench in the above case, explained the legal position as follows:

> 17. We fail to persuade ourselves to agree with the contention of Mr. Chitale that although a revision from an order granting conditional leave was maintainable, the same could not have been a subject-matter of challenge in an appeal from a decree as envisaged under Section 105 of the Code of Civil Procedure.
> 18. A statutory right conferred on a litigant cannot ordinarily be taken away. A civil revision application might have been maintainable as against the order dated 27.11.2002 granting conditional leave. The said remedy was also available where leave to defend a suit is refused. Leave to defend a suit, as noticed hereinbefore, should ordinarily be granted. It was, therefore, permissible for the defendant to raise the said contention in the appeal although it had asked for time to comply with the conditions.[562]

In a case, order of the court recalling an earlier order, directed specimen signatures of the defendants to be taken in court. The signatures had already been taken in the court. The revision was held to be not maintainable against the order. The court could not be said to have committed any jurisdictional error in passing the order and could not be said to be "a case decided" within the meaning of section 115. Even on the merits, the order seemed to be correct.[563] If a subordinate court has jurisdiction to decide a question before it, it may decide it rightly or wrongly. Whether the question be one of law or of a fact, such a wrong decision would not bring the case within the purview of any of the three clauses of section 115(1). It is only where the error of law or of a fact has relation to the jurisdiction of the subordinate court to try the dispute that the section would be attracted.[564] In a particular case, an appeal was filed under section 102 of the Kerala Land Reforms Act, 1963. A plea as to maintainability of the appeal was not raised before the appellate authority. It was, however, raised for the first time in revision. It was held that being a pure question of law touching the jurisdiction of the appellate court, it could be raised in a revision.[565]

An appellate court has no jurisdiction to pass an order of mandatory injunction in respect of constructions made after the disposal of the original suit. In a case, the impugned order had not only been passed without jurisdiction, but also there had been glaring miscarriage of justice. It was held that the case was fit for interference in revision.[566] Where a trial court accepts a written statement at the end of the trial, there is no jurisdictional error nor is there any final disposal. Such a course causes no irreparable injury to the plaintiff and is not subject to a revision.[567] In another case, a document which merely recorded a mortgage was assessed to stamp duty under the Stamp Act, 1899, in the erroneous belief was that the document created a mortgage. It was held that erroneous belief as to the applicability of the Stamp Act, 1899 to the document resulted in assumption of jurisdiction not vested and the order could be set aside in a revision.[568] Section 115 is not attracted against a conclusion of law or of a fact, in which the question of jurisdiction is not involved. However, where the execution court has dismissed the execution application on the ground of limitation (apart from other grounds), the question of limitation is a question of jurisdiction. Therefore, it is a fit case for interference in a revision.[569] Where the question of court fee raised by defendant is not a question of court fee simpliciter, in case of a combined question of court fee and jurisdiction, the defendant can request the high court to interfere in a revision with the impugned order of the lower court.[570]

In its application to the State of Uttar Pradesh, the amendment brought about in section 115 of the Code incorporates the valuation of the suit for determining the jurisdiction of the forum where revision can be filed. In a case from Uttarakhand, wherein the valuation of the suit was Rs 50 lakhs, it was held that the district judge did not have any jurisdiction to receive or entertain the revision petition or to deal with the same. It was held that the concept of valuation, as finds mention in section 115 CPC, is relatable to the valuation of the suit as it has been pegged in the plaint originally filed. This valuation has nothing to do with the valuation sought to be varied or changed through an amendment.[571] instituted in it, is not vested in it by law, the high court to which such court is subordinate has power under clause (a) to interfere in revision under this section. It will not, however, do so unless the facts from which absence of jurisdiction may be inferred are patent upon the face of the record.[572] If the agreement entered into by the petitioner and the respondent does not contain the estimated value of the land described therein, the provision of rule 2 of O XXXVI would not have been fulfilled and as such the court would not have assumed jurisdiction in view of rule 3 of O XXXVI. Consequently, the judgment and decree passed by the learned trial court is without jurisdiction and liable to be interfered in exercise of revisional power under section 115 of the CPC since the learned trial court assumed jurisdiction quite illegally in deciding the reference.[573] Where a civil judge exercised jurisdiction not vested in him by a statute and molated the procedure laid down by the statute and thus, committing an illegality in exercise of its jurisdiction, the high court must rectify the error by the exercise of its revision jurisdiction.[574] Similarly, the high court has power to interfere in a revision under clause (a), if the lower court decrees a suit for possession under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, when the plaintiff has not been dispossessed otherwise than in due course of law.[575] Such a power lies if the lower appellate court entertains an appeal from an order from which no appeal lies,[576] or if a testamentary court appoints a receiver.[577] The high court can also exercise such a power if the lower court inquires into a question into which it has no jurisdiction to inquire;[578] if the lower court demands search fee on an application for copies of records in addition to the stamps for copies[579] or dismisses a suit for non-production of document;[580] or if the lower court allows an application to withdraw a suit contrary to the provisions of O XXIII, rule 1.[581] In a suit where an insolvency court ordered a distribution of assets after the insolvency had been annulled, the court was held to have acted without jurisdiction.[582] The rules of the High Court of Calcutta had empowered a single judge to hear revisional applications in cases of the value of Rs 1,000, and so when a single judge granted a rule for the revision of an order in a suit of more than that value, the rule was discharged for want of jurisdiction.[583] Where a small cause suit was tried by the munsif on the original side and his decision was reversed on an appeal, the high court set aside the decree of the appellate court on the ground that the appeal was incompetent.[584] Where the lower court set aside an execution sale on the ground that the decree was passed on a debt and that in consequence the land was not liable for sale under section 43(4)(e) of the Abolition of Proprietary Rights Act, 1951, the high court set aside the order in revision on the ground that the decree was for damages of breach of contract and the lower court had no jurisdiction to set aside the sale.[585] In another case, an amendment was sought in suit for specific performance before civil judge for enhancing the valuation of the suit which was allowed, irrespective of the fact that the suit in question stood transferred in view of amendment in Karnataka Civil Courts Laws (Amendment) Act, 1989. It was held that though the civil judge did not have the jurisdiction, since no prejudice was caused to the parties nor it resulted in the failure of justice, the order could not be interfered with by the high court in civil revision.[586]

[s 115.48] Failure to Exercise Jurisdiction

Where a court having jurisdiction to act in a matter declines jurisdiction, clause (b)[587] applies. When a court refuses to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by law under a misapprehension of the law or an erroneous construction of the statute, or a misconstruction of a document, eg, reference to an arbitration, the high court will interfere in revision under clause (b). The same situation arose where a suit is dismissed without a trial on a misapprehension of the scope of section 9 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963;[588] then the executing court flatly refused to exercise jurisdiction vested in it. Hence, the order can be brought within the purview of section 115, CPC.[589] The principle is that once a court rightly assumes a jurisdiction, it does not exercise its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity simply because it decides a question of law or of a fact erroneously. However, if a question of jurisdiction is involved in its conclusion of a fact or law, then the high court can interfere, in the event of such conclusion being erroneous, because it would amount to illegal assumption or exercise of jurisdiction.[590] Thus, a plea of limitation or of res judicata is one of law which concerns the jurisdiction of the court which tries the proceedings. A finding of these pleas in favour of the party raising it would oust the jurisdiction. An erroneous decision on these pleas, therefore, is concerned with the question of jurisdiction.[591] Merely because the court has rejected and refused to grant permission it cannot be said to be a case of failure to exercise jurisdiction. When jurisdiction can be said to have been refused to be exercised by the court, and the expression "the failure to exercise jurisdiction" means that court has refused to consider the application on merits on some technical ground, but in a case where the court has considered the application on its merits, looking to the facts and circumstances mentioned, the court cannot be said to have failed to exercise jurisdiction, merely because it has not granted the permission. The court has come to a conclusion, either to grant the application or to refuse the application on its merits and if it is done one way or other it cannot be said to be a case of failure or refusal to exercise the jurisdiction vested in it. So, even if there was some error or some error was committed by the court below, every error cannot be said to amount to jurisdiction error, to make out a case within the purview of section 115, for invoking the jurisdiction of high court.[592]

The Patna High Court has held that where the subordinate court fails to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it or where it has acted in exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, the high court can interfere in its revisional jurisdiction.[593]

On the other hand, an erroneous construction of section 12 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging Houses Rates Control Act, 1947 does not involve any question of jurisdiction.[594] A jurisdictional question of law or of a fact means the collateral question which the court has sometimes to decide to ascertain whether it has jurisdiction and has nothing to do with the merits of the case.[595] The simplest case where the point of jurisdiction is involved is where a preliminary issue is raised, whether the court has jurisdiction or not.[596] An erroneous decision on the question of estoppel would lead to failure to exercise jurisdiction.[597] Thus, where a court has jurisdiction to accept a plaint,[598] or an application,[599] or to execute a decree,[600] or to review its judgment,[601] but it refuses to accept the plaint or application or to execute the decree to review its judgment, on the ground that it has no jurisdiction, the high court will interfere under this section. In a case where the lower court had ignored the provisions of section 59 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881 and had shut out the defence, the high court interfered in revision;[602] similarly, the high court can interfere where a condition upon leave to defend is imposed in spite of the existence of a triable issue raised bona fide and in good faith.[603] When a subordinate judge refused to allow an assignee to execute a decree, the High Court of Allahabad held that there was a failure to exercise jurisdiction because the judge did not exercise his own judgment but followed a ruling which was not applicable.[604] An order refusing to make an inquiry under O XXI, rule 2, is open to a revision.[605] Again, when the lower court made an order on the petition "that the petition will be recorded", this was said to be no order at all, and the court was directed in a revision to hear and dispose it off on merits.[606] Similarly, where a court refused to confirm a sale under section 312 of the CPC 1882 (O XXI, rule 92), believing that it had no power to do so if the purchaser objected to the sale on the ground of misrepresentation, it was held by the Privy Council that the case was one in which the court had failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law and that the decision was, therefore, subject to a revision under the present section.[607] In another case, when a court refused to entertain an application to set aside an ex parte decree under O XXXIV, rule 6, on the erroneous ground that it was an execution proceeding, the order was subject to a revision.[608] The rejection of an application for fixing a standard rent, on the ground that the provisions of the Calcutta Rent Act, 1920, were not applicable to the case, is a refusal by the rent controller to exercise a jurisdiction conferred upon him by the Act, and is accordingly a proper case for interference under this section.[609] An order returning a memorandum of appeal for presentation to another court is also open to a revision.[610] Interference under this section is also appropriate where a court has no discretionary power to refuse a relief, but refuses the relief, believing that it has a discretionary power to do so. Thus, where a court refused the application of a decree-holder for a rateable distribution under section 73, though according to its own finding he was clearly entitled to such distribution, on the ground that there was other property of the judgment-debtor available for the satisfaction of his claim, the High Court of Madras interfered under this section.[611] However, where a court has discretion in a matter, a wrong exercise of such a discretion is not a proper ground for interference under this section.[612] On the contrary, an order erroneously construing a provision as obligatory, instead of discretionary, would be subject to revision by the high court.[613]

It has been held by the Supreme Court that where a jurisdiction is conferred on an authority to decide a matter, it cannot, unless the statute empowers it to do so, direct the party to establish his claim in a civil court and that such an order is open to revision as it amounts to a failure to exercise jurisdiction.[614] The following decisions have been held to be revisable under this clause: an order dismissing a petition to set aside an execution sale under O XXI, rule 90, on the ground that as the objection was not put forward before sale, when there was no such bar imposed and the objection was on the sale made 30 days before due publication of sale proclamation;[615] an order of the district judge hearing an appeal under section 17 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936 holding that the provisions of the Act were not applicable to the claim;[616] an order returning the award of the arbitrator for presentation to the court having jurisdiction;[617] and an order of the district judge, dismissing an application for transfer of execution proceedings on the ground that section 24 had no application;[618] an order showing failure on the art of a revenue divisional officer to exercise discretion after considering the circumstances of the landlord and tenant vested in him under section 3(3) of the Tamil Nadu Cultivating Tenant Protection Act, 1955;[619] an order refusing to appoint a commissioner for local investigation as to particulars of improvements and their value on a misapprehension that such an appointment would mean abdication or delegation of power,[620] an order refusing to entertain the plaintiff's claim on the basis of a Supreme Court decision which had no application,[621] an order rejecting an application that the defendant is a minor and should be properly represented without any inquiry merely because the plaintiff described him to be a major.[622]

A revision would lie if the subordinate court has, inter alia, failed to exercise a jurisdiction in it. In a particular case, the court had granted a time-bound stay order and thereafter no order had been passed extending the period, though an application in that behalf had been filed for a long time. This amounted to non-exercise of a jurisdiction. However, an application under section 115 could not be allowed as no order was sought to be set aside. However, to keep an application pending for an indefinite period, and not passing an order itself amounted to non-existence of jurisdiction. Lower court could be directed to take up the application for consideration on the merits.[623] An application for condonation of delay in filing an appeal was dismissed by the court below on the ground that the copy of judgement and decree taken much later after date fixed for taking delivery, besides appellant though admitted in the hospital did not avail the telecommunication facility to instruct counsel to file appeal. The delay was not condoned and it cannot be said that the appellate court committed any error which could be said to be an exercise of jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.[624] Where the application for issuance of precept to the collector for effecting partition of shares in agricultural lands assessed to the payment of land revenue as per share indicated in the decree was dismissed merely because the application had been made almost after 45 years of the passing of the decree, the court would be considered to have committed serious error of law and jurisdiction and the order dismissing the application was liable to be set aside.[625]

[s 115.49] Where a Court in the Exercise of Its Jurisdiction Has Acted Illegally or with Material Irregularity

Clause (c) of the section contemplates cases other than those referred to in clauses (a) and (b). This clause clearly excludes clause (b), for a court cannot refuse to exercise its jurisdiction and also act in the exercise of it with material irregularity.[626] The clause refers to cases where the court, having jurisdiction and exercising it, has acted illegally or with material irregularity in the exercise of such jurisdiction.[627] Order by court granting ad interim ex parte injunction after expressing its satisfaction regarding existence of prima facie case and urgent nature of matter although not containing reasons in detail is neither without jurisdiction nor in exercise of jurisdiction with material irregularity, so is not liable to be interfered with.[628] The words, "acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity", have given rise to a conflict of decisions. It is, therefore, better first to state the settled law, and then to deal with the various interpretations put on the words "illegally" and "with material irregularity" by the various high courts.

[s 115.50] What Is Not "illegality" or "material irregularity"

It is settled law that where a court has jurisdiction to determine a question and it determines that question, it cannot be said that it has acted illegally or with material irregularity, merely because it has come to an erroneous decision on a question of fact or even of law — the leading case on this subject is Amir Hassan Khan v Sheo Baksh Singh,[629] decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council in 1884. In that case, it was laid down that where a court has jurisdiction to decide the question before it and in fact decides the question, it cannot be regarded as acting, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, illegally or with material irregularity, merely because its decision is erroneous. The mere fact that the decision of the court is wrong, affords no ground for the interference of the high court under this section. In the course of the judgment, their Lordships stated:

> The question then is, did the judges of the lower courts in this case, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, act illegally or with material irregularity. It appears that they had perfect jurisdiction to decide the question which was before them, [namely, whether the suit was barred by res judicata] and they did decide it. Whether they decided it rightly or wrongly, they had jurisdiction to decide the case; and even if they decided wrongly, they did not exercise their jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.

Following this decision, it has been held that the high court will not interfere under this section, merely because the lower court allowed an application which was barred, by limitation,[630] or wrongly decided that a suit was barred by limitation;[631] but, a contrary view has been taken in the following cases, where the high court interfered under clause (b) on the ground that by wrongly deciding the question of limitation, the court had declined to exercise jurisdiction vested in it.[632] But it is submitted that this decision is not correct. Whether the petition was barred by res judicata,[633] or because the lower court proceeded upon an erroneous construction of the sections of an Act;[634] or misunderstood the effect of a document in evidence;[635] or excluded evidence which it ought to have admitted,[636] except where such a course was in direct contravention of a statutory provision,[637] or held, though incorrectly, that no relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties to a suit or proceedings;[638] or that it was not necessary to give notice to a railway company under section 77 of the Railways Act, 1989;[639] or that the procedure under section 61 of the Presidency Small Causes Court Act, 1882 was not followed;[640] or that an application to set aside a sale was not time-barred;[641] or that it wrongly applied sections 130 and 131 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, it would not entitle the high court to interfere under this section.[642] Similarly, no revision lies from an order passed in appeal, remanding a case under O XLI, rule 23,[643] though such an order may be erroneous in law. In these cases, the court considered the question and came to an erroneous conclusion. However, if the court does not adjudicate upon the question and entertains an application which is, on the face of it, barred by limitation, it acts with material irregularity and its order is revisable.[644]

When, however, as in the cases previously cited, the court has considered a question which it has jurisdiction to decide, and comes to an erroneous conclusion, that is not open to revision, as, a mere error of law is not an illegality within the meaning of this section. In such cases, the high court might well have said, in the words of their Lordships of the Privy Council in another case;[645] "It (the lower court) made a sad mistake it is true; but a court has jurisdiction to decide wrong as well as right". The point was further emphasised by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Balakrishna Udayar v Vasudeva Aiyar,[646] wherein, referring to this section, their Lordships said:

> It will be observed that the section applies to jurisdiction alone, the irregular exercise or non-exercise of it, or the illegal assumption of it. The section is not directed against conclusions of law or fact in which the question of jurisdiction is not involved.

In Venkatagiri v Hindu Religious Endowments Board,[647] the Privy Council once again stated:

> Section 115 applies only to cases in which no appeal lies, and, where the legislature has provided no right of appeal, the manifest intention is that the order of the trial court, right or wrong, shall be final. The section empowers the High Court to satisfy itself on three matters, (a) that the order of the subordinate court in within its jurisdiction; (b) that the case is one in which the court ought to exercise jurisdiction; and (c) that in exercising jurisdiction the court has not acted illegally, that is, in breach of some provision of law, or with material irregularity, that is, by committing some error of procedure in the course of the trial which is material in that it may have affected the ultimate decision. If the High Court is satisfied on those three matters it has no power to interfere because it differs, however profoundly, from the conclusions of the subordinate court on questions of fact or law.

The scope of revisional jurisdiction under this clause came up for consideration before the Supreme Court in Keshar Deo v Radha Kissen,[648] wherein it was observed that the words "illegally or with material irregularity" had reference to a "material defect of procedure" and not to "error of either law or of fact after the formalities which the law prescribes have been complied with". However, where the question is one, on the decision of which the court's jurisdiction depends, the court cannot, by an erroneous finding, confer upon itself jurisdiction which it otherwise does not possess. Such an order is liable to be interfered with in revision.[649] In Satyanarayan v Mallikarjun,[650] while discussing the powers of the high court under Article 227 of the Constitution and section 115 of the CPC, the Supreme Court observed that an error, not apparent on the face of the record, could not be corrected under those provisions.

The rule laid down in Balakrishna's case has been interpreted, or rather, applied differently by different high courts. This may be explained by an illustration: A applies under O XXI, rule 89 to set aside a sale in execution of a decree. The lower court places a wrong interpretation on rule 89, and holds that A is not a person entitled to apply under that rule, and the application is dismissed. A then applies to the high court for a revision of the order of the lower court. Can the high court interfere in revision? It has been held by the Patna High Court[651] that it can, the reason given being that the case is one of a refusal to exercise jurisdiction vested by law in the lower court and, therefore, within this section. In the course of his judgment, MULLICK, J, said:

> The court's decision upon the point whether the applicant has the necessary legal character is clearly a question involving jurisdiction. An erroneous decision on a question of law or fact after jurisdiction has been once legally assumed would not be a ground for interference under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but if the decision is the very basis and foundation of jurisdiction in its limited sense as distinguished from powers, it at once comes within the purview of the section. The judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Balakrishna Udayar v Vasudeva Aiyar is, in my opinion, an authority for this view.

The same view has been taken by a full bench of the Madras High Court.[652] This view has been dissented from by a full bench of the Allahabad High Court and by the Calcutta High Court.[653] In the Allahabad case, BANERJI, J, after referring to Balakrishna's case, said:

> In the present case the court was competent to determine whether A was entitled to make an application under O XXI, Rule 89, and it had jurisdiction to decide that question, and it decided it adversely to A. The court may have been wrong in its decision, but it cannot be said that in the exercise of its jurisdiction it acted illegally or with material irregularity in the sense in which those words have been interpreted by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case to which I have referred and in earlier cases decided by their Lordships.

The substantial point of difference between these two divergent views is that, whereas, the Patna and Madras High Courts treat the refusal by a lower court, to entertain the application as a refusal to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by law, the High Court of Allahabad regards the refusal as no more than a decision, though erroneous on a point of law, in the exercise of the lower court's jurisdiction. There is no difference of opinion between these courts on the point that, where the lower court assumes jurisdiction or refuses jurisdiction on an erroneous construction of a statute, the high court can interfere in revision. The difference arises on the question — whether it is a case of refusal to exercise jurisdiction, or a case merely of a wrong decision on a point of law, in the exercise of the court's jurisdiction. According to the Patna and Madras High Courts, it is the former; whereas according to the Allahabad High Court, it is the latter.

Following its full bench ruling, the Madras High Court has held that though an erroneous decision on a point of limitation is not a ground for interference under this section, the high court can, and will, interfere if the small causes court refuses to entertain an application for retrial of a suit tried by a single judge of that court, where such refusal proceeds on a wrong view of a question of limitation.[654] It was similarly held by this court that, where a district judge, on an erroneous construction of a statutory rule, assumes jurisdiction to declare whether a person elected as a president of a local board is duly elected or not, and assuming such jurisdiction declares his election to be void, the high court has the power to interfere under this section.[655] The same high court interfered in revision, where a subordinate judge misconstrued the legal position in the case, and refused to release the property under attachment as he should have done;[656] as also, where the result of an erroneous decision was likely to perpetuate the error and to give rise to multiplicity of suits, not for one year but for all time to come;[657] as also when the lower court, proceeding on an erroneous view of the law, refused a commission for the examination of a defendant;[658] also where the decision of the lower court was based on a total absence of legal evidence.[659]

The High Court of Calcutta has held that, where a judge has misdirected himself as to the meaning and effect of a section or of a rule under the CPC, the high court can interfere in revision. Thus, where a plaintiff was allowed to withdraw his suit under O XXIII, rule 1, with liberty to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action on the ground of a formal defect in the framing of the suit after the suit had been heard and decided against him on merits, the high court interfered in revision.[660] In another case, the high court interfered in revision, on the ground that the munsiff had not directed his attention properly to the provisions of O XXI, rule 60.[661] A presidency small causes court has only revisional jurisdiction under section 38 of the Presidency Small Causes Courts Act, 1882, and when the court, purporting to act under that section, interfered on a question of fact, the Calcutta High Court held that it had no jurisdiction to make the order.[662] The Calcutta High Court also interfered when a lower court settled the share which a co-sharer landlord was entitled to pre-empt arbitrarily and without regard to any principles.[663] The Oudh High Court interfered in revision where the lower court allowed the plaintiff to withdraw the suit, with liberty to institute a fresh suit, the object of the withdrawal being to produce evidence in the new suit which he had omitted to produce at the right time.[664] The High Court of Rangoon has held that if the lower court fails to take into account some proposition of law or some material fact in evidence, it acts illegally, and its decision may be revised by the high court, but if the lower court has applied its mind to the case and duly considered the facts and the law applicable, then, although its decision may be erroneous, the high court cannot interfere in revision.[665]

The decision in Amir Hasan Khan's case pre-supposes jurisdiction in the court, whose decision is sought to be revised on the ground that it is erroneous. Hence, the principle of that decision does not apply where a court erroneously assumes jurisdiction which is not vested in it by law.[666] Thus, if a court, proceeding upon an erroneous construction of a section of an Act, assumes jurisdiction which is not vested in it by law, the high court will interfere in revision and set aside the decree of the lower court as one passed without jurisdiction.[667] Similarly, if a court wrongly decides that a suit is of a civil nature and entertains the suit on that basis, the decision is open to revision under clause (a) of this section, for, no civil court is competent to entertain a suit which is not of a civil nature (see section 9 above).[668] Likewise, if a court, proceeding upon an erroneous construction of a statute or upon a misapprehension of the law, declines to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by law, the high court has the power to interfere under clause (b) of this section.[669] If the lower court, by reason of its misconstruing the order on a claim petition under O XXI, rule 58, declines to go into the merits of the case, the high court can interfere under clause (b) of this section.[670] These are cases under clauses (a) and (b) of the present section. These are not cases under clause (c), which is the clause under consideration. The reason why these cases are mentioned here is that it was contended in these cases that, as the assumption of jurisdiction or the refusal to exercise it had proceeded upon an error of law, the high court had no power to interfere under this section. The decision in Amir Hasan Khan's case was invoked in support of this contention. But the high courts held that if the case came under either clause (a) or clause (b) of this section, it was immaterial whether the assumption of jurisdiction or the refusal to exercise it proceeded upon an error of law. The high courts also pointed out that the basis of the decision in Amir Hasan Khan's case was that the lower court had jurisdiction to determine the question before it, and that it had determined it. All that this case decided was that an erroneous decision of a case in the exercise of the court's jurisdiction was not a ground for interference under this section.

Since the above decisions were given, there have been pronouncements by the Privy Council and by the Supreme Court, which have cleared much of the doubt. In Joychand Lal Babu v Kamalaksha Choudhury,[671] an application by a debtor for relief under the Bengal Money-Lenders Act, 1940, was dismissed by the subordinate judge on the ground that the debt was a commercial debt and did not fall within the ambit of the Act. The high court, however, set aside this order in revision, holding that it was not a commercial debt, and that the applicant was entitled to relief. Affirming this judgment on appeal, the Privy Council held that though a mere error was not a ground for interference in revision, "if the erroneous decision results in the subordinate court exercising a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or failing to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, a case for revision arises under sub-section (a) or sub-section (b) and sub-section (c) can be ignored". In Jagdish Prasad v Ganga Prasad,[672] the point in dispute was whether the landlord was entitled to enhancement of the rent agreed upon. Under the United Provinces (Temporary) (Control of Rent and Eviction) Act, 1947, he would not be so entitled unless new construction had been done by the landlord after 30 June 1946. The high court held, in reversal of the finding of the civil judge, that there was no such construction, and dismissed the application. Repelling the contention that the high court was not competent to interfere in revision, with a finding of fact, the Supreme Court held that the question of new construction by the landlord was a jurisdictional fact and stated:

> ...therefore, if an erroneous decision of a subordinate court resulted in its exercising jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or failing to exercise the jurisdiction so vested, or acting, with material irregularity or illegality in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the case for the exercise of powers of revision by the High Court is made out.

A similar question arose in Roshanlal v Iswardass.[673] Under the provisions of the Delhi and Ajmer-Mewar Rent Control Act, 1947, the rent controller has jurisdiction to fix a standard rent for new constructions made after 24 March 1947. The dispute between the parties related to the question of whether the shops which were the subject-matter of the application, were constructed before or after that date. The rent controller had held that the shops were constructed after 24 March 1947, and fixed the standard rent. This order was confirmed by the district judge, but was set aside by the high court in its revisional jurisdiction under section 115. This judgment was set aside, on appeal, by the Supreme Court, which held that, being a jurisdictional fact, the correctness of the finding was open to revision, but that "the High Court was in error in interfering with the finding of fact by the Rent Controller and the District Judge, in support of which finding there was clear and abundant evidence".

The results of the authorities may thus be summed up:

(i) A court which has indisputable jurisdiction to hear a cause has jurisdiction to come to a decision, wrong as well as right, and the decision is not open to revision.

(ii) Where the question is one, on the decision of which the jurisdiction of the court depends, the court cannot, by an erroneous finding, confer on itself a jurisdiction which it does not possess, and its order is liable to be revised by the high court.

On this principle, revision has been entertained against a decision on a question as to the character of the lands situated in an estate, where the jurisdiction of the court to entertain a suit for rent or ejectment with reference thereto, depended on whether they were ryoti or home farm lands;[674] against an order rejecting an application to sue in forma pauperis on the ground that the plaint did not disclose a cause of action;[675] against an order setting aside the election of a candidate to a municipal committee on the ground that he was disqualified;[676] against an order as to valuation of a suit, where it might affect the jurisdiction of the court.[677]

A court has no power to dismiss a suit after a decree has been passed. If it does so, the question arises whether the case is one of exercise of jurisdiction not vested in the court, or one of illegality or material irregularity. In Lachmi Narain v Balmakund,[678] the judicial committee held that the case was one of exercise of jurisdiction not vested in the court. In that case, the high court, on appeal, passed a decree by consent for a partition upon certain terms and remitted the suit to the subordinate judge for disposal under the decree. The plaintiff failed to appear on the day appointed by the subordinate judge, and the judge dismissed the suit under O XVII, rule 2, and O IX, rule 8. The plaintiff applied to the high court in revision. The high court decided that the case came both under clause (a) and clause (c) of this section and set aside the order of the subordinate judge, and ordered the case to be restored to his file. The defendants appealed from this order to the Privy Council on the ground that the high court had no power to interfere in revision. Their Lordships affirmed the decision of the high court and said: "Their Lordships do not think it necessary to determine that the case came under para (c) of section 115. But they think that the order which the subordinate judge made was one which he had no jurisdiction to make". The order of the subordinate judge was not merely wrong in law, rather, it was an order which he had no jurisdiction to make. Similarly, when the court held that for the final determination of all the questions involved, an applicant is a necessary and proper party, and to avoid multiplicity of proceedings, impleadment is necessary and that it should exercise its discretionary jurisdiction to make impleadment, the order and the decision is one which is within its jurisdiction, and is not open to interference in revision.[679]

Besides the cases mentioned above, there are cases in which the action of the lower court has been held not to amount to illegality or material irregularity, e.g., failure to give notice where no notice is required to be given under the CPC, though it might have been given as a matter of equity;[680] deciding a case without taking into consideration a point of law where such point was never raised before the court;[681] omitting to state in the order granting a review, that the new matter discovered by the applicant was important;[682] and, refusal to condone delay after hearing the parties;[683] rejection of the defendant's application for producing documents before his evidence is recorded;[684] no specific reference to petition for condonation of delay in order of restoration of suit passed by the trial court.[685] Order directing plaintiff to strike down certain paragraphs in pleadings on ground that they are unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous and vexatious does not amount to no material irregularity or jurisdictional error in passing said order warranting interference under section 115.[686]

[s 115.51] What Is "illegality" or "material irregularity"

Amir Hassan Khan's case decided what "is not" illegality or material irregularity. What is it, then, which does constitute illegality or material irregularity within the meaning of this section? The courts have taken Amir Hassan Khan's case as the key to the solution of this question. However, as many judges have put different interpretations upon this case, there are many conflicting views as to the meaning of these words. Following are some of the leading examples:

(i) The words, "acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity", refer only to an error of jurisdiction, and apply only to cases of the kind contemplated by clauses (a) and (b) of this section.[687]

(ii) The words refer only to errors of procedure as distinguished from errors of law.[688] This view proceeds mainly on the word "acted". In a case in the Calcutta High Court, Jenkins, CJ, said:

> It appears to me that section 115 can only be called in aid when the failure of justice (if any) has been due to one of the faults of procedure indicated in that section. If there was an error committed (by the judge of the Small Causes Court), it was an error of law and not of procedure, and in my opinion Justice Fletcher had no power to interfere.[689]

This view is supported by the decisions of the Privy Council which have stated that it is a material irregularity to decide a case in the absence of the necessary party,[690] or to summarily dismiss an application of a person to be brought on record as a party.[691]

(iii) The words apply to cases where there is a wilful disregard, or conscious violation by a judge, of a rule of law or procedure.[692] As against this view, it has been said that it engrafts upon the Privy Council ruling, a qualification to the effect that, the high court can interfere under the present section, if the erroneous decision is the result of a conscious violation by the lower court, of a rule of law or procedure, and that the distinction is in no way warranted by the language of this section.[693] To this, it is submitted that, if the section does not apply to cases where a judge consciously violates a rule of law or procedure, a lower court might, with impunity, or wilfully, disregard the decisions of the high court, or even of the Privy Council.[694]

(iv) The words apply to cases where the decision complained of is vitiated by a gross and palpable error.[695] According to this view, a mistake, though of law, would, if it is gross and palpable, give jurisdiction to the court, under this section. However, this view runs contrary to the decision in Balakrishna Udayar v Vasudeva Aiyar, which was later[696] rejected by the Privy Council in Venkatagiri Iyengar v Hindu Religious Endowments Board Madras.[697] See also the decisions wherein, it was held that a mere error was not a ground for revision.[698]

(v) The words "acted illegally" do not imply the committing of an error of procedure as the expression "acted with material irregularity" does. These words have reference to gross and palpable errors committed by subordinate courts, which result in grave injustice.[699]

However, it will not serve any useful purpose to discuss these conflicting views. It will suffice to say, as observed by the judicial committee in Balakrishna Udayar v Vasudeva Aiyar,[700] that "the section applies to jurisdiction alone, the irregular exercise or non-exercise of it, or the illegal assumption of it. The section is not directed against conclusions of law or fact in which the question of jurisdiction is not involved."[701]

Having noted the different interpretations put upon the words in question, we now proceed to note some of the decisions reported on this subject.

It is an "illegality" to frame an issue on a point of fact expressly admitted by the defendant and to dismiss the suit on the ground that the fact is not proved.[702] Similarly, it is an "illegality" if a court passes a decree on an unstamped hundi, when the Indian Stamp Act, 1899 expressly provides that an unstamped hundi shall not be acted upon.[703] It is an "illegality" if the appellate court calls in question the admissibility of a document not duly stamped, after the same has been admitted in evidence in the court of the first instance — such a course is manifestly against the provisions of the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, in which it is enacted that, when an instrument has been admitted in evidence, such an admission shall not be called into question at any stage of the same suit.[704] It is also an "illegality" to pass a decree where there is no evidence at all to support it,[705] or where the evidence is obviously of no value,[706] or to decide a case on personal inspection of the subject matter of the suit, ignoring the evidence on record.[707] It is an "illegality" to attach in the execution of a decree, the tools of an artisan, contrary to section 60 of the CPC,[708] or to attach money in a provident fund, regulated by the Provident Funds Act, 1925,[709] or to confirm the sale in execution, in disregard of a stay order passed by the same court in another proceeding.[710] However, where the interim order of attachment, passed by a lower court lacks legality and competency, the high court can interfere with the order in revision.[711] It is an illegality when the court dismisses an application to set aside a sale under O XXI, rule 89, merely because the names of all the purchasers have not been written in the application.[712] Where the auction sale is vitiated due to a violation of the mandatory provisions of O XXI, rule 85 and rule 138 of the Karnataka Civil Rules of Practice, 1967, it amounts to an exercise of jurisdiction "illegally" and with "material irregularity".[713] It is also an "illegality" to include, in a decree, costs which are not legally taxable.[714] It is also an illegality if the court refuses to follow a ruling by which it is bound,[715] or where the lower court orders to proceed with the suit in the absence of a necessary party.[716] It is also an "illegality" if a provision relating to limitation is overlooked,[717] or there is violation of a statutory provision.[718] The grant of an interim injunction, without giving a notice to the caveator is an order which is without jurisdiction.[719] Further, an order refusing to correct the number of exhibits also suffers from illegality.[720] If a finding of fact is recorded, after having ignored the material on record on illegal grounds, then the court can be said to have acted "illegally" and with "material irregularity".[721] Where the "material irregularity" has been committed by the appellate court in its decision, in rejecting a ballot paper under the Kerala Panchayat Raj (Conduct of Election) Rules, 1995, the high court cannot shut its eyes and hold that interference is not called for, in view of the limited jurisdiction under section 115 of the CPC.[722]

It is a "material irregularity" if a decree is passed in a suit in the absence of a party necessary to the suit.[723] It is also a "material irregularity" if a court, taking a mistaken view of the question in issue, proceeds to determine an issue which does not really arise in the case, and bases its decision of the case on a determination of that issue.[724] It is also a "material irregularity" where the lower court would not have decided the question of fraud in the manner that it did, except for a mistaken assumption of the facts.[725] It is also a "material irregularity" to treat the delivery of the summons by post to a person who was not shown to be the defendant, as good service, and to pass a decree ex parte against the defendant on that footing;[726] or to attach, in the execution of a personal decree against the defendant, property which he holds as trustee for another;[727] or to transfer a suit on application under section 24 without a notice to the opposite party;[728] or to make an order against a person without hearing him,[729] or without giving the parties an opportunity of examining or cross-examining an expert, on whose report the court has relied.[730] It is also a "material irregularity" for a court to decline to look into the evidence when required to do so, and to proceed to dispose of the suit upon the pleadings or upon the allegations made in a petition,[731] or to refuse to draw up its own decree, whether it be preliminary or final;[732] or to refuse to grant a certificate for the refund of court fees paid on a memorandum of appeal, when a case is remanded under O XLI, rule 23.[733] It is also a "material irregularity" to apply to a case, a section of an Act, which is not applicable to it,[734] or to disregard the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and to place the burden of proof on the wrong party;[735] or to decide a case on a point of fact which was not raised in the pleadings;[736] or an omission to look into the records of the case.[737] However, if the burden of proof is placed upon the wrong party, the high court will not interfere if the irregularity does not lead to grave results.[738] It is a "material irregularity" to invoke the inherent jurisdiction of the court when there is a specific provision in the CPC.[739] Where an application is made to set aside a sale under O XXI, rule 90, and it is followed by another application, which does no more than give additional particulars of irregularity in conducting the sale, it is a "material irregularity" to refuse to consider the second application.[740] Where the lower court had decided a case, without at all applying its mind to the mandatory provisions of a statute, the full bench of the Allahabad High Court held that the lower court had acted with "material irregularity" in the exercise of its jurisdiction.[741] Where a person is entitled, as of right to a relief, and it is wrongly refused to him, revision lies in the high court.[742] Also, where a judge ignores the plain provisions of section 4 of the Limitation Act, 1963, he exercises his jurisdiction with "material irregularity".[743]

Following are some more decisions in which revision petitions have been entertained on the ground of "illegality" or "material irregularity":

Where the decree was passed in terms of an award without giving notice to the parties;[744] where an order of transfer was made under section 24 without giving notice as prescribed therein;[745] where an application by a person claiming to be interested in joint family properties, to be impleaded as a party to a suit for partition, was dismissed in disregard of O I, rule 10(2);[746] where an order was made setting aside an ex parte decree, without deciding whether there was sufficient cause for non-appearance and for imposing onerous terms;[747] where certain intermeddlers were brought on record as legal representatives to a deceased party, when they had no possession of the properties which were the subject matter of the suit;[748] where an order was made permitting the plaintiff to withdraw the suit, with liberty to file a fresh one on grounds not warranted by O XXIII, rule 1,[749] revision petitions in the high courts were entertained. The trial court, in a case, accepted the report of the commissioner, in violation of O XXVI, rule 18. A revision against such an order would be maintainable in the high court. If such an order was allowed to stand, there would be a violation of the principles of natural justice.[750] In Maganlal Chhotalal Desai v Chandrakant Motilal,[751] the Supreme Court held that where the landlord's suit was for possession, arrears of rent and mesne profits, and the defendant tenant in his written statement had asked for fixation of standard rent and dismissal of the suit, the lower court had acted illegally and with material irregularity when it had directed the landlord plaintiff "to render an account of the overpayments made to him". Also, an order refusing to examine a person as a witness;[752] an order refusing to stay an ad interim injunction issued by the trial court, without considering the well-established conditions for it, is revisable.[753] A failure to take into consideration the relevant features of the case amounts to "material irregularity".[754] It has been held, in some cases, that an erroneous decision of the court on the question of onus of proof is a ground for interference in revision.[755] However, other high courts have taken a different view.[756]

[s 115.52] Wrong Decision of Lower Appellate Court as to Jurisdiction of the Trial Court

The question to be considered under this head is whether the high court has jurisdiction to interfere, under this section, when the lower appellate court erroneously decides, in the exercise of its permitted jurisdiction as an appellate court, that the court of the first instance had or did not have jurisdiction to entertain a suit. Cases of this nature arise, when a court of the first instance returns a plaint, on the ground that it has no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and the lower appellate court affirms or sets aside the order of the court of the first instance. Does the high court, in such a case, have the jurisdiction to revise the order passed by the lower appellate court?

On this issue, the decisions of the Allahabad High Court itself have not been altogether consistent. In some cases,[757] it was held that an error of the appellate court was within the exercise of its jurisdiction to hear the appeal and that, therefore, its order is not open to revision. However, even in these cases, the high court reversed the order passed by the court of the first instance, although it might have been contended that such an order was merged in the order of the lower appellate court.[758] In other cases, the Allahabad High Court has held that the order passed by the lower appellate court, erroneously deciding that the court of the first instance should take cognizance of a case it has no jurisdiction to try,[759] or should not take cognizance of a case it is competent to try,[760] is open to revision, for it would be anomalous if an order made by a district court, in its original jurisdiction, were open to revision but not so when it is made in its appellate jurisdiction. The Calcutta High Court held that the order of the lower appellate court is open to revision,[761] though an earlier case had taken the opposite view.[762] In the Bombay High Court, where the lower appellate court confirmed the order of the court of the first instance, the orders of both the courts were reversed.[763] The Madras

High Court held that the order of the lower appellate court was open to revision.[764] This is also the view taken by the High Courts of Patna,[765] Nagpur[766] and Himachal Pradesh.[767] The controversy has been set at rest by the Hon'ble Supreme Court, where it has been held that the high court certainly can decide whether jurisdictional facts have been correctly decided by the subordinate courts or not.[768]

In the Punjab High Court, in a case, the lower appellate court held that the land over which the judgment-debtor had encroached, was not covered by a decree for mandatory injunction. But the evidence showed that no other conclusion was possible, except the one that the judgment-debtor had encroached upon the land, within the boundaries given in the decree sheet. The high court could, in the circumstances, interfere in revision.[769] If the appellate court has remitted the matter and there being no apparent error on the face of the record so as to interfere by this court in exercise of the revisional powers, the high court should not interfere with the impugned order.[770] It is true that the scope to entertain the petition under section 115, CPC is required to be exercised only when the petitioners' case falls within the four corners of the provisions of section 115. In a case, a reasoned order was passed by the trial court granting the injunction. Detailed reasons were given for holding prima facie case in favour of the plaintiffs and the trial court also held that the election which was being conducted was not as per the law. The trial court relied upon the judgments of the high court. The trial court also considered the provisions of section 10(1) of the Act of 1989 and also the Rules framed thereunder and, thereafter, granted the injunction order. The appellate court, in its order, held that whether the state government has power or not, whether the education department has power or not, can be challenged in the high court and the civil court only has the jurisdiction to see whether the election was being conducted as per the government order or not. It was, in itself, sufficient ground for interference by high court, when the first appellate court, under a wrong impression of its lack of jurisdiction held that the power of the state government and even the education department cannot be looked into by the civil court as it can be looked into only by the high court.[771] The presumption available under section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 relates to the existence of a fact which is likely to have happened, for eg, once a letter is posted, the fact likely to happen is, that the letter must have reached the addressee. Thus, where, in an eviction suit, the plaintiff had proved the factum of posting of the quit notice by producing the certificate of posting before the court, the presumption available to the plaintiff was that the letter must have reached the addressee in the normal course. Dismissing the suit, by limiting the presumption only to the posting of the quit notice, amounts to exercising the jurisdiction illegally. Such an order is, therefore, revisable by the high court.[772] The power of appointment of a commission for the purposes of local investigation cannot be exercised to assist a party to collect evidence, where the party can itself get the evidence. An appointment made without considering whether the plaintiff was unable to ascertain the boundary by an expert engaged by him, amounts to the exercise of jurisdiction with "material irregularity", and the order is not sustainable.[773]

[s 115.53] Execution Proceedings

If the executing court has gone beyond terms of the decree and has set up a new case, then the high court can exercise its provisional jurisdiction in either setting aside the said decree or correcting its jurisdictional error.[774] The decree holder in an auction sale in execution of a money decree purchased an immovable property. The judgment-debtor challenged the sale on the ground of inadequacy of valuation and absence of sufficient opportunity to deposit the decretal amount, which was dismissed by the executing court as well as the first appellate court. The high court, in revision, observed that there was no material irregularity in the sale and the price was also not too low, but it set aside the sale on the sole consideration that the property was purchased by the decree holder and not by any stranger. The Supreme Court reversed the order of the high court as there was no material irregularity or illegality in the order.[775] The order for handing over the possession falling under O XXI, rule 36 of CPC is revisable under section 115.[776] The parties have been litigating for over 36 years and it is desirable that the matter comes to an end as soon as possible. It is clear that the revisional court has a jurisdiction and indeed a duty to ensure that expeditious justice is done between the parties and the order to be passed is in consonance therewith.

In the facts and circumstances of the present case, the court, therefore, should not hesitate to set aside the alleged auction sale which has been vitiated by fraud in order to do justice to the judgment-debtor avoiding protracted litigation.

Thus, the high court, even after detection of the serious irregularities and illegalities in holding the auction sale by the executing court and particularly after establishment of fraud on court in course of holding the said auction sale of the property of the judgment-debtor in execution of the decree, cannot allow the party to go before the trial court for final decision on the application filed under O XXI, rule 90.

After detection of the aforesaid illegalities in conducting the auction sale, the court cannot permit the said sale to stand even for a moment, as in that event, the same would cause grave injustice to the judgment-debtor. When fraud on court has been established, the high court cannot shut its eyes and remain a silent spectator. The court must come forward to undo the wrong by setting aside the illegal and irregular court sale in order to do substantial justice. The high court, being the superior court, has the duty and obligation to rise to the occasion in order to do substantial justice to the parties.[777] The defendant husband party was a service holder in a reputed company at Calcutta, and had disclosed his earnings by production of salary slips, income tax deduction certificate and other material documents upon affidavits. The wife petitioner did not dispute the said documents. The wife-petitioner claimed an alimony pendente lite for herself and for the maintenance and educational expenses of their minor child, including medical expenses and litigation costs under different heads as per the schedule given in her petition. In support of such claim, necessary documents can be furnished upon affidavit. The claim of the wife-petitioner that the husband opposite party received different amounts by way of bonus and other allowances from the employer could also be disclosed by production of documents upon requisition from the employer company of the husband supported by an affidavit. There being no other relevant circumstances for being considered for the purpose of disposal of the application of the wife under section 24 of the said Act, it cannot be said at this stage that the learned court acted illegally and with material irregularity in exercise of jurisdiction in deciding to dispose of the same on the basis of the affidavits of the parties. The revisional application, therefore, failed.[778]

An order passed by an executing court is revisable on limited grounds where it relates to appreciation of evidence on the basis of material brought on record. Thus, where the high court does not find that the executing court committed any illegality or material irregularity in passing the order, the Supreme Court held that the high court exceeded its jurisdiction by concluding without cogent or sufficient reasons that the finding of the executing court was factually incorrect.[779]

Where the executing court directed delivery of possession in favour of three decree holders, the order was challenged by way of revision only against two of such decree holders. The revision was allowed and the order of possession was set aside. The Supreme Court held that since the order of delivery of possession in favour of decree holders was common and inseparable and since it had become final against one decree holder, the high court was not right in reversing the order of executing court as against two respondents.[780] A revision is not maintainable against the order passed under O XXI, rule 92(1) as it is appealable under section 104 read with O XLIII, rule 1, CPC.[781] A revision is also not maintainable against an order adjudicating resistance to the possession of immoveable property.[782] A revision petition challenging the initiation of execution proceedings, subsequent to passing of an award under Consumer Protection Act, 1986 is maintainable,[783] when the executing court flatly refused to exercise the jurisdiction vested in it. Hence, the order can be brought within the purview of section 115, CPC.[784]

The only ground contended before the Rajasthan High Court was that the auction-purchaser did not deposit the balance three-fourth amount within a period of 15 days as required by O XXI, rule 85, therefore the sale was void. As against this, on behalf of the judgment-debtor it was contended that he had moved requisite application before the executing court for depositing the amount, but since the learned presiding officer was not available, the amount could not be deposited and that the entire amount had already been deposited as soon as the tender was passed. The high court held that the contention raised is a question of fact as to whether the amount has been deposited or not, and if deposited whether in time or not, and if not deposited in time whether the purchaser had sufficient cause for the delay, and whether such a delay could be condoned or not. All these questions cannot be allowed to be raised for the first time in this revision petition.[785] It has been held that a plea raised for the first time in revision before the high court that daughter also being a co-owner of the premises was a necessary party and eviction petition filed by other co-owners without impleading her was not maintainable.[786] The bench relied on the constitution bench judgment in Hindustan Petroleum Corp Ltd v Dilbahar Singh.[787]

The provision of O XXI, rule 64, CPC is a mandatory provision. So, non-compliance with the provision of O XXI, rule 64 would definitely vitiate the auction in case the provision is applicable. Moreover, the objection raised by the applicant can be entertained on the basis of the material on record and no evidence is required to be recorded for deciding the objection. Thus, the objection on the basis of O XXI, rule 64, can very well be agitated before the high court in spite of the fact that the same was not pressed earlier before the executing court.[788]

[s 115.54] Limitation — Condonation of Delay

Although the revisional jurisdiction of the high court is a part of the general appellate jurisdiction of the high court, a revisional application does not become an appeal for the purpose of application of Article 120 of the Limitation Act, 1963. Thus, in the matter of substitution under O XXII of the CPC during revision, the period of limitation would be three years as provided under Article 137 of the Limitation Act, 1963 and not by Article 120.[789] The trial court has considerable measure of discretion in the question as to whether to condone the delay or not. In these circumstances, the high court should not ordinarily disturb, in revision, the discretion exercised by the trial court.[790] The judgment of the high court allowing a revision petition condoning a delay of about 17 years in filing an appeal, which was not condoned by the appellate authority was held to be unsatisfactory when there was no occasion for interfering in civil revision with appellate authority refusing to condone the delay.[791] The plaintiff bank obtained a preliminary decree and an application for final decree was made along with application for condonation of delay, seeking condonation of delay of 714 days. The lower court dismissed the application on the ground of want of sufficient cause explaining the delay. The delay was condoned in revision as the respondent bank was a government undertaking and since huge sum of public money is involved, some indulgence may be shown in considering claim of parties. The Supreme Court set aside the order of the high court and held that there is no justification to condone the delay as the bank's lawyer was regularly appearing in the courts during those days.[792]

[s 115.55] Ex parte Decree

When alternative and effective remedies are available to the defendant, against the ex parte decree, consequent on setting the defendant ex parte, it would not be appropriate for the defendant to resort to revisional proceedings under section 115 of the CPC, challenging the order refusing to set aside the order of setting the defendant ex parte. Where the defendant in a suit was set ex parte, however, no revision was filed against that order, and subsequently, ex parte decree was passed, which was allowed to become final, as no appeal under section 96 or an application under O IX, rule 13 was preferred. The revision, subsequently, which was filed against the order setting the defendant ex parte was not maintainable.[793]

The Calcutta High Court interfered in revision when the lower court, professing to act under section 151 set aside an ex parte decree when no case under O IX, rule 13, had been made out.[794] The Allahabad High Court also interfered in such a case, on the ground that the lower court had no jurisdiction outside the provisions of O IX, rule 13, to direct a case to be heard again.[795] In a case, the Lahore High Court interfered in revision, when the lower court set aside an ex parte decree even though the application to set it aside was barred by limitation.[796] Where the application for setting aside an ex parte decree was disallowed on the ground that the said decree was not ex parte and that it was a full-fledged decree amounting to a judgement, such finding could not be interfered in revision.[797]

[s 115.56] Order Refusing Review

Where the lower court refuses to entertain an application for review, based on an allegation of fraud, the high court has the power to interfere under this section.[798] This section, however, does not apply to an order refusing to grant a review,[799] and a revision against an order dismissing an application for review of a decree has been held to be barred, where an appeal lies against the decree.[800] However, it has been held in a number of cases, that a revision lies against an order refusing review,[801] provided that the grounds set out in section 115 exist.[802] When the lower court has rightly refused to restore an execution application under O IX, the high court has no power under this section to direct it to treat the application as one in review.[803] Dismissal of review application against order closing evidence of defendant in a suit for possession where the defendant has availed of several opportunities to lead evidence and the suit has been pending for over one decade, and it was not a case of defendant in review application that new and important matters or evidence had been discovered or that mistake or error apparent on face of record was evident, was upheld by revisional court as to jurisdictional error in said order.[804]

[s 115.57] Order Granting Review

An order granting a review may be set aside in revision.[805] When an appeal is preferred against an order granting review, the judgment in appeal is not open to revision unless the grounds stated in section 115 are established.[806] However, where the appellate court travels outside the scope of O XLVIII, rule 7, and disposes of the appeal on grounds other than those mentioned therein, its order is liable to be revised.[807]

The Gujarat High Court set aside an order of the lower court, permitting additional evidence on the ground that it was made prematurely, that is, even before the record was examined, and a lacuna was found, and further, that if the order was allowed to remain, it would result in having to discard such evidence at all subsequent stages of the proceedings.[808]

[s 115.58] Lunacy

As regards the power of the high court to interfere in lunacy proceedings, see the undermentioned case.[809]

[s 115.59] Temporary Injunction

In a case in the Madras High Court, the plaintiffs claimed a transfer of certain shares of registered companies, standing in the names of the defendants. An agreement on which the plaintiff relied was yet to be formalised. It was held that the trial court should realise that injunctions (whether prohibitory or mandatory), should not be granted as a matter of course, and that the trial court must exercise extreme caution and care, before an order of injunction is passed. Even at the stage of making an ad interim order of injunction, the court has to apply its mind seriously to the question of whether the plaintiff had made out a prima facie case for the grant of an injunction. The mere circumstance that an ad interim order can be vacated after the defendant appears and contests the correctness of the order of injunction, is no justification for issuing an injunction as a matter of course.[810]

If an application for temporary injunction under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2, CPC is rejected, even then the plaintiff can move fresh application under section 151, CPC with a distinction that in case temporary injunction is granted under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2, then miscellaneous appeal is maintainable under O XLIII, rule 1, but if an injunction is granted under section 151, of the CPC, then no miscellaneous appeal would be maintainable, only revision would be entertainable under section 115.[811]

It is clear that an order on the injunction application does not dispose of the suit. It also does not dispose of that application either. In case the injunction application were to be rejected or allowed, it would dispose of the application but such an order would be appealable and hence not open to revision. However, if an ex parte injunction is not granted and only notice is issued on the injunction application it would not dispose of the application as final orders on the injunction application are yet to be passed after inviting objections of the opposite party and the injunction application remains pending. This is further clear from the provisions of O XXXIX, rule 3A, CPC introduced by Act No 104 of 1976. This provision has been deleted in Uttar Pradesh but it is helpful for interpreting the proviso to section 115, CPC as regards the meaning of disposal of the proceedings. Under this provision, the court is required to endeavour for final disposal of the injunction application within 30 days from the date when ex parte injunction was granted. The provision necessarily implies that an order issuing notice on an injunction application does not dispose of the injunction application finally. The decision of Allahabad High Court in H Bevis and Co[812] was rendered under a different set of provisions before the proviso to section 115, CPC had been introduced and is distinguishable. The decisions in Brig FJ Dillon,[813] and Ajabul Hassan[814] are also distinguishable as the maintainability of this revision is not being challenged on the ground that the order is not a case decided. A proviso carves out an exception to the main provision. The proviso as it stands restricts the power of interference in revision to a situation where the case decided disposes of the suit or proceedings. While refusing to grant an ex parte temporary injunction by merely issuing notice upon such application may amount to a "case decided" but the proviso restricts the power of the high court and precludes it from interfering in revision in such a case, as the order of ex parte temporary injunction would not have disposed of the injunction application or terminated the proceedings for temporary injunction. A revision against such an order is, therefore, not maintainable.[815]

Before the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999), clauses (a) and (b) of proviso to sub-section (1) of unamended section 115 of CPC were invoked for filing a revision before the high court. Thus, a party approaching the high court under section 115, CPC by way of a revision has to necessarily satisfy the requirements specified thereunder. However, after the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999 (46 of 1999) which has come into effect from 1 July 2002, the position is changed. Clause (b) of sub-section (1) has been totally withdrawn. With the result, the only ground available for approaching the high court under section 115 is clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 115, CPC, viz, "if [the order has] been made in favour of the party applying for revision would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings". The effect of the provisions under section 115 of CPC after amendment is that a revision petition is maintainable only if the impugned order has got the effect of disposing of the suit or proceedings finally. In all other cases, where if the impugned order is of interim in nature or does not finally decide the lis, the revision will not be maintainable.

Along with the suit, an application was also filed before the trial court when the lower appellate court by the impugned order granted temporary injunction restraining the petitioner-defendant, staff and employees, henchmen from interfering with the peaceful enjoyment and possession of the plaint schedule land. It is not in the nature of finally disposing of the suit or other proceedings. In view of the amended provisions of section 115 of the CPC, the revision was found not maintainable.[816]

The court's merely postponing consideration of issue so that it may hear both parties and decide the matter, does not amount to "case decided", and thus the revision is not competent.[817]

An appeal against an order granting or refusing injunction is maintainable under O XLIII, rule 1 and that appeal is a continuation of the proceedings. An order granting injunction if maintained in appeal merges into the appellate order and if reversed ceases to exist and an order dismissing an application for grant of temporary injunction comes into existence, even if that order continues to be temporary. In either case, it is an order in continuation of the proceedings which are pending and, therefore, it cannot be said that it is an order in a proceeding which is neither a suit nor a proceeding as contemplated by O XXXIX and, therefore, is a final order is not acceptable. Even if it is presumed that the order passed by the appellate court under O XLIII decides the appeal finally and the proceedings by way of miscellaneous appeal come to an end, the lis pending in the civil suit does not stand decided by reason of that order. What is contemplated by section 115 as amended in 2002 is that the order should be such if made in favour of the revision applicant would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceedings. The civil suit in which temporary injunction is granted or not granted is not decided finally either by grant or refusal thereof and continues to pend. Taking into consideration this aspect of the matter, therefore, it cannot be said that merely because the revision application is directed against an order passed by appellate court finally deciding the miscellaneous appeal under O XXXIX, rule 1 read with O XLIII, rule 1, CPC, the revision is maintainable. What is necessary after July 2002 for maintaining a revision is that the order impugned in revision must have the effect of finally disposing of the suit or proceedings in favour of the person who applies for revision. By the very nature of things and the nature of O XXXIX itself, such a contingency cannot occur and consequently, a revision application whether against an appellate order or original order granting or refusing injunction is not maintainable after 1 July 2002.[818]

Although the impugned order does not contain a reasoning in so many words supported by adequate facts and materials, trial court has at least expressed its satisfaction that there exists a prima facie case and the matter seems to be an emergent one and according to the appellate judge there has been compliance of the basic requirements of these provisions of O XXXIX, rule 3 in substance. The Additional District Judge, while disposing of the appeal, has further observed that the questions regarding legal status of the parties, their title to the suit property or the question of its inalienability or the legal consequences are questions to be decided at the time of final hearing on the basis of the materials produced by both the parties and at the time of considering the simple question as to whether an ad interim injunction should be issued or not the factor of urgency should be kept in mind and he was satisfied that although the reasons were not given by the trial court in details, in essence and substance they were briefly assigned for his coming to such a finding. Be that as it may, having regard to the fact that here by virtue of the passing of the impugned order by the trial court, no jurisdictional error was committed or, in other words, the order was neither without jurisdiction nor in exercise of the jurisdiction with material irregularity, the revisional application becomes untenable in law under the provisions of section 115 of the CPC.[819]

The legal principle which flows from the ratio in various authoritative pronouncements is that if the trial court or the lower appellate court is found to have passed an order of temporary injunction in exercise of its power either under O XXXIX, rule 1, CPC or under O XXXIX, rule 2, in clear breach of the said propositions, the same cannot be stated to have been passed in exercise of the jurisdiction vested in it under the said provisions of CPC and, therefore, that order would be liable to interference and will have to be set right by this court in exercise of its revisional jurisdiction under section 115.[820]

An order granting interim injunction or temporary injunction pending final orders on the injunction petition filed under O XXXIX, rule 1, read with section 151 of the CPC is only an appealable order under O. XLIII, rule 1(r), but not revisable under section 115 of the CPC, or under Article 227 of the Constitution of India.[821]

Where in the case of grant of injunction in title suit by trial court, evidence on record was thoroughly and systematically considered by the trial court to record its satisfaction regarding existence of prima facie case, factum of possession in favour of plaintiff and invasion of suit property by defendants satisfying requirement of balance of convenience and irreparable loss in favour of plaintiff, the appellate court, however, wrongly vacated injunction recording finding that factum of possession is available in favour of defendant giving undue importance to documents of no significance, the finding of appellate court being perverse were set aside in revision.[822]

In a case, a reasoned order was passed by the trial court granting the injunction. The detailed reasons were given by the trial court for holding prima facie case in favour of the plaintiffs and the trial court also held that the election which is being conducted is not as per the law. The trial court relied upon the judgment of high court delivered in Ravindra Sahu,[823] and also other judgments. The trial court also considered the provisions of section 10(1) of the Act of 1989 and also rules framed thereunder and, therefore, granted the injunction order. The appellate court in para no 10 of the order held that whether the state government has power or not, whether the education department has power or not, can be challenged in the high court and the civil court has jurisdiction only to see that whether the election is being conducted as per the government order or not, is itself sufficient ground for interference by high court as the first appellate court under wrong impression of its lack of jurisdiction held that the power of the state government and even the education department cannot be looked into by the civil court and it can be looked into only by the high court. This is a clear case of failure of exercise of jurisdiction under wrong impression of law. In addition to above, the first appellate court misunderstood the order of the trial court wherein the trial court held that the action of the administrator is in violation to rule 23 and the action is contrary to the law, hence it is ultra vires and the first appellate court held that it can be so declared only by the high court. Therefore, it appears that the first appellate court committed illegality in exercise of its jurisdiction. In addition to above, the first appellate court failed to consider the reasonings given by the trial court before reversing finding of the prima facie case. Therefore, this was not a case wherein the present revision petition should have been dismissed only on the ground that it is not a case in which this court cannot interfere with while exercising powers under section 115, CPC.[824]

Order directing issue of notices on temporary injunction application does not amount to case decided, so revision against such order is not maintainable.[825]

[s 115.60] Order Rejecting Plaint Under Order VII, Rule 11, CPC

Order VII, rule 11 of CPC deals with rejection of plaint. Once the plaint is rejected, then obviously nothing is pending before the court. That order is formal expression of an adjudication, which so far as regards the court expressing it, conclusively determines the rights of the parties. In fact, section 2 of the CPC which defines the term "decree" specifically states that the decree shall be deemed to include rejection of the plaint. Section 96 of the CPC deals with appeal from original decrees.[826]

In the full bench decision of Madras High Court in Satyanarayanacharyulu v Ramalingam,[827] the petitioners filed a suit in the subordinate court for declaration and for other reliefs and paid a fixed court fee of Rs 100 under section 19A of Sch II, Court Fees Act, 1870, valuing the suit for the purposes of jurisdiction at Rs 3,600. The question arose whether the court fee paid had been correct and after considering the objection the subordinate judge came to the conclusion that the suit had been grossly undervalued and directed the petitioner/plaintiff to pay an additional court fee of Rs 400. The order directing payment of additional court fees was made on 14 March 1947 and a period of 10 days' time was given for payment of the deficit court fee. The suit was adjourned to 24 March 1947 and by that time, as the deficit court fee was not paid as per the order dated 14 March 1947, the plaint was rejected. A revision was filed against the order dated 24 March 1947. The full bench approving the view taken in an earlier ruling,[828] ruled that if the order directing payment of additional court fee was not complied with and it was followed by an order dismissing the suit, a revision would not be maintainable and the remedy is only by way of an appeal against the decree. Or in other words, the court ruled that once a plaint is rejected, the remedy for the plaintiff is only to file an appeal and not a revision petition.[829] A learned single judge of Madras High Court had occasion to consider a similar question and after considering the ruling of the full bench referred to as well as other rulings.[830]

Both from the section and those decisions it is clear that only appeal will lie against rejection of plaint and it is not limited to such cases wherein the plaint was rejected for the reasons stated under O VII, rule 11 of CPC.

In a ruling of Madras High Court[831] a learned single judge referred extensively the various rulings including R Shanmughavelu Pillai v R Karuppannan Ambalam[832] and concurred with it.

Thus, the legal position is that as against the order rejecting the plaint, only an appeal lies and not a revision.[833]

According to the view of the Patna High Court, there was a conflict of opinion between two division benches of the court. When a similar question came up before a single judge, the matter was referred to a division bench. This division bench of Supreme Court held that an order rejecting a plaint under O VII, rule 11 of the Code is a decree and is appealable and no revision would lie.[834]

Quoting the definition of "decree" given in section 2(2) of the Code, it has been observed as follows:

> 11. It is an inclusive definition and the rejection of the plaint by legal fiction has been deemed a decree. Once it is held that the rejection of the plaint is a decree, the natural corollary of the same shall be that an appeal would lie. In view of the language of Section 2(2)

[s 115.61] No Revision from Discretionary Orders

The high court will not interfere in revision, with an order which is at the discretion of the lower court to make,[836] unless the order is not supported by any consideration of justice, or by any provision of law;[837] or unless irreparable injury will ensue to one of the litigants, or if there will be a failure of justice if the matter is not put right;[838] or if the trial has not begun, and no prejudice is caused to the other side which cannot be compensated in terms of cost.[839]

The lower appellate court allowed a plaintiff to withdraw his suit, and appeal without leave, to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action, with the result that the defendant was deprived of the benefit of a judgment in his favour. The case went to the Calcutta High Court in revision, but the high court, while disapproving of the order, declined to interfere with the discretion of the court.[840] However, in a similar case, the Allahabad High Court did interfere in revision.[841] In Printers (Mysore) Pvt Ltd v P Joseph,[842] the law relating to the powers of an appellate court to interfere with an order made by the lower court in the exercise of its discretion, was stated by the Supreme Court:

> The Appellate Court would normally not be justified in interfering with the exercise of discretion under appeal solely on the ground that if it had considered the matter at the trial stage it would have come to a contrary conclusion. If the discretion had been exercised by the trial court reasonably and in a judicial manner the fact that the Appellate Court would have taken a different view may not justify interference with the trial court's exercise of discretion. As is often said, it is ordinarily not open to the Appellate Court to substitute its own exercise of discretion for that of the trial Judge; but if it appears to the Appellate Court that in exercising its discretion the trial court has acted unreasonably or capriciously or has ignored relevant facts and has adopted an unjudicial approach then it would certainly be open to the Appellate Court — and in many cases it may be its duty — to interfere with the trial court's exercise of discretion. In cases falling under this class the exercise of discretion by the trial court is in law wrongful and improper and that would certainly justify and call for interference from the appellate court. These principles are well established.

These observations were made with reference to the powers of a court, hearing an appeal against an order under section 34 of the Arbitration Act, 1940 (replaced by Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996). The same principles apply when the high court acts under its revisional jurisdiction.[843] Where the propriety of an order, made in the exercise of its discretion, is challenged in revision, the limitations imposed by section 115 should be taken into account.

In Razia Begum v Anwar Begum,[844] while discussing the power of the high court to interfere in revision with an order made under O I, rule 10, the Supreme Court observed: "The question of addition of parties under O. 1, r. 10, of the Code of Civil Procedure, is generally not one of initial jurisdiction of the court, but is of a judicial discretion, which has to be exercised in view of all the facts and circumstances in a particular case; but in some cases, it may raise controversies as to the power of the court, in contradistinction to its inherent jurisdiction, or, in other words, of jurisdiction in the limited sense in which it is used in section 115 of the Code", and that where the order was within the powers of the court, a discretion exercised judicially by it, could not be questioned under section 115. Where the trial court, in the exercise of its discretion, has granted unconditional leave to defend, the high court ought not, under this section, to interfere, unless the defence is patently dishonest, or so unreasonable, that it cannot reasonably be expected to succeed.[845] Where the high court has refused to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction, after an inordinate delay of more than five years from the date of the order of the district judge, under section 18 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, and more than 10 years from the order of land acquisition collector, the order of the high court is not vitiated by any error of jurisdiction or "material irregularity", in the exercise of its jurisdiction.[846] For other instances in which the high court declined to interfere with a discretionary order, see the cases noted below.[847]

Where there is a concurrent finding, based on careful and minute considerations of evidence adduced by the tenant, that tenant's claim of permanent tenancy is not bona fide and therefore, he is liable to be evicted from the suit premises on this ground alone, according to the provisions of section 15(2)(vi) of the Hyderabad Houses (Rent, Eviction and Lease) Control Act, 1954. The high court, exercising revisional jurisdiction under section 26 of the said Act, could not interfere with the concurrent files, and set aside the order of eviction. The jurisdiction of the high court, in revision under section 76, against the order passed on appeal by the district judge, is a limited one, and it is in pari materia with the provisions of section 115 of the CPC. The concurrent findings in the above-mentioned case, could not be held to be either without jurisdiction or those that would amount to a failure to exercise jurisdiction vested with them. Also, the same could not be held to be made by the original or the appellate authority illegally or with "material irregularity".[848]

Ordinarily, the high court is not called upon to upset a finding of the lower appellate court with regard to matters of fact. However, when the finding is based on a clear mis-reading of the evidence and misappreciation of the circumstances on record, the high court must interfere and correct the error right.[849] An ex parte decree in this case was set aside. A delay of 17 months had taken place in filing the application to set it aside. The lower court gave cogent and convincing reasons for condoning the delay. It was held that a revision against this was not maintainable.[850] In a case in the Allahabad High Court, a suit for accounts was filed within time. All the partners were impleaded as parties to the suit, with allegations against all of them. An application for amendment of the plaint was made. In the relief clause, instead of defendants 2–6, defendants 1–6 were sought to be added. The cause of action was not changed. A rejection of the amendment application was held to be erroneous and, as such, quashed in revision.[851]

There was an agreement between the decree-holder and the debtor, with respect to the account of simple decree and mortgage decree, to the effect that a consolidated sum be paid. The property was sold and the same fetched a price that was adequate at the time of auction. It was held that the high court would not, in revision, interfere with the auction.[852] In a suit on a pronote, both the courts had arrived at the conclusion that a blank paper had been converted into a pronote. Such a finding could not be interfered with in revision.[853]

In a case in the Allahabad High Court, the trial court allowed a part of the amendment of the written statement, as applied for and no reasons were given. Interference in revision was held to be justified. It was further held that the "admission" stated in O VIII, rule 5, does not necessarily bind the party, and that an amendment can be allowed. Also, an admission could be permitted to be withdrawn in a given case, if the amendment is not one which deprives the plaintiff of a valuable right that has accrued to him. In the instant case, the amendment sought in the written statement would have resulted in making the claim of the plaintiff barred by limitation and, consequently, the same was not allowed.[854]

Except in certain rare cases, the high court would not be competent to disturb the findings of the courts below, however grossly erroneous they might appear to be. However, points of law, which are related to questions of jurisdiction or, which ultimately go to the root of the jurisdiction of the court, are certainly points which can be examined by the high court while exercising its revisional jurisdiction.[855] A simple matter of appointment of Mutawalli, that too, in accordance with the scheme, which was in vogue for almost a century, was protracted on one pretext or the other for two decades. The matter was already complicated by the active participation of the tenant in the matter of appointment of Mutawalli. As no material was placed before high court having any bearing on order passed by trial court, application for review was rejected as granting of leave would only add to existing complications.[856]

[s 115.62] Revisable and Non-revisable Orders

In all the subordinate proceedings arising in a suit by way of interlocutory application where the rights of the parties are to be adjudicated and if such adjudication results in final conclusion of such rights and if the said questions involved in the adjudication of rights in such proceedings do not arise for consideration at the time of final disposal of the suit, necessarily such of the subordinate proceedings should be construed to come within the purview of the phrase "other proceedings" and in respect of such orders, a revision would lie. The orders passed under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2, under O XL, under O XXVI, rule 9, under O VI, rule 17, under O XIII (belated production of document), under O XVI (belated summoning of witnesses) and under O XVIII (to reopen the case and to recall the witnesses), have the character of an independent subordinate proceedings arising in a suit not relatable to the question that arise for final adjudication in the suit. Any orders thereon in revision would finally conclude the rights of the parties in such proceedings. Therefore, a revision would lie. However, allowing the applications under O XXVI, rule 9, under O VI, rule 17, under O XIII (belated production of document), under O XVI (belated summoning of witnesses) and under O XVIII (to reopen the case and to recall the witnesses), may not materially prejudice the rights of the parties, since there would be a scope for the parties to contest at the stage of evidence and also at the stage of arguments to challenge the relevance, veracity and legality of such evidence.[857]

It is clear from a reading of O XLIII, rule 1(q) that only an order under rules 2, 3 or rule 6 of O XXXVIII are appealable. Rule 6 relates to attachment before judgment and only rules 2 and 3 relate arrest as prayed for by the plaintiffs in the suit. It is evident from rule 1(q) of O XLIII that an order passed under O XXXVIII, rule 1 is not appealable in nature though an order under rule 2 which is to be passed after the defendant is brought before court and where he fails to furnish security is appealable. It cannot, therefore, be said that an order as passed in is made before the stage of arrest is not revisable in nature.[858]

[s 115.63] Order Admitting or Refusing Document — Problem and Solution

The argument that if orders of admitting and refusing documents are allowed to be challenged in revision and in such petitions if order of stay is granted in respect of further proceedings of the suit, it would drag on the proceedings endlessly and therefore the revision is held to be not maintainable on the premise that such order does not amount to "case decided", is concerned, the very object is defeated if after the final disposal of the suit, the appellate court were to find fault with such orders and consequently orders for remand of the matter to the trial court, the duration taken for disposal of such matters would be enormous. Moreover, when the matters are remanded, the original parties may not be alive and the very object would be frustrated. The said complaint can be remedied by not admitting the revision petitions and by ordering notice to the counsel who are appearing in the court below and dispose of such revision petitions expeditiously at the admission stage itself. These problems are agitating the legal fraternity for quite some time and merely because we are unable to find a practical solution it cannot be said that the revision petition should not be entertained at all. In fact, the Supreme Court taking note of these problems has suggested a solution by prescribing the following procedure in a decision in a case[859] as held as under:

> It is an archaic practice that during the evidence collecting stage, whenever any objection is raised regarding admissibility of any material in evidence the Court does not proceed further without passing Order on such objection. But the fall out of the above practice is this: Suppose the trial court, in a case, upholds a particular objection and excludes the material from being admitted in evidence and then proceeds with the trial and disposes of the case finally. If the appellate or revisional Court, when the same question is re-canvassed, could take a different view on the admissibility of that material in such cases the Appellate Court would be deprived of the benefit of that evidence, because that was not put on record by the trial court. In such a situation the higher court may have to send the case back to the trial court for recording that evidence and then to dispose of the case afresh. Why should the trial prolong like that unnecessarily on account of practices created by ourselves. Such practices, when realised through the course of long period to be hindrances which impede steady and swift progress of trial proceedings, must be recast or re-moulded to give way for better substitutes which would help acceleration of trial proceedings.

When so recast, the practice which can be a better substitute is this: Whenever an objection is raised during evidence taking stage regarding the admissibility of any material or item of oral evidence the trial court can make a note of such objection and mark the objected document tentatively as an exhibit in the case (or record the objected part of the oral evidence) subject to such objections to be decided at the last stage in the final judgment. If the court finds at the final stage that the objection so raised is sustainable the judge or magistrate can keep such evidence excluded from consideration. In our view there is no illegality in adopting such a course. However, we make it clear that if the objection relates to deficiency of stamp duty of a document, the court has to decide the objection before proceeding further. For all other objections the procedure suggested above can be followed.

The above procedure, if followed, will have two advantages. First is that the time in the trial court, during evidence taking stage, would not be wasted on account of raising such objections and the court can continue to examine the witnesses. The witnesses need not wait for long hours, if not days. Second is that the superior court, when the same objection is re-canvassed and reconsidered in appeal or revision against the final judgment of the trial court, can determine the correctness of the view taken by the trial court regarding that objection, without bothering to remit the case to the trial court again for fresh disposal. We may also point out that this measure would not cause any prejudice to the parties to the litigation and would not add to their misery or expenses.

We, therefore, make the above as a procedure to be followed by the trial courts whenever an objection is raised regarding the admissibility of any material or any item of oral evidence.[860]

[s 115.64] Concurrent Findings

The high court, in revision, cannot set aside the concurrent findings by taking a different view.[861] The mere fact that a different view is possible on re-appreciation of evidence, cannot be a ground for the exercise of revisional jurisdiction. The high court cannot substitute its own findings on a question of fact for the findings recorded by the lower court on re-appraisal of evidence,[862] however grave the said error may be, unless they relate to jurisdiction of the court.[863] Interference with the findings of facts are justified only if they are perverse or if there was non-appreciation or non-consideration of the material evidence on record.[864] The court would be justified in setting aside the concurrent findings of the facts if the same were vitiated due to non-compliance of the mandatory provisions of law.[865] However wide the powers of statutory revision under Uttar Pradesh Consolidation of Holdings Act, 1953 may be, in contrast to section 115 of the CPC, still, while exercising that power, the authority concerned cannot act as court of appeal so as to re-appreciate the evidence on record for the purposes of recording findings on questions of facts.[866]

In exercise of the revisionary jurisdiction, under section 115, CPC, which is limited, the high court cannot interfere with the concurrent findings of fact by the courts below, when the view taken by them was plausible and not perverse.[867]

In Hiya Associates v Nakshatra Properties (P) Ltd[868], while examining whether the revisional court was justified in remanding the case to the executing court for fresh consideration in the facts and circumstances of the case, the apex court succinctly stated when the superior court is justified in remanding the case back for reconsideration. It observed:

> In our opinion, the remand of a case to the subordinate court is considered necessary when the superior court while exercising its appellate or revisionary jurisdiction finds that the subordinate court has failed to decide some material issues arising in the case or there is some procedural lacuna noticed in the trial, which has adversely affected the rights of the parties while prosecuting the suit/proceedings or when some additional evidence is considered necessary to decide the rights of the parties which was not before the trial court, etc.

In a case under the East Punjab Urban Rent Restriction Act, 1949, the Supreme Court held that interference of the high court on the question of bona fide requirement against the findings of the appellate authority was improper.[869] Explaining the point, Tarun Chatterjee J, speaking for the bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> It is true that the High Court in its revisional jurisdiction could have interfered with such findings of fact arrived at by the Appellate Authority, if the High Court had found that the findings of the Appellate Authority on the question of bona fide requirement were either perverse or arbitrary. On a close examination of the impugned order of the High Court, we do not find any ground to hold that the findings of fact, regarding the bona fide requirement of the appellants, were perverse or arbitrary or the pleadings made by the appellants in their eviction petition could be said to be not in conformity with the requirement of Section 13(3)(a)(ii) of the Rent Act.[870]

[s 115.65] Court Fee

The order rejecting plaint for non-payment of court fees is "decree" in terms of section 2(2) and as such appealable, so revision is not maintainable.[871]

An order demanding an improper court fee, if unfavourable to the plaintiff, is equivalent to telling the plaintiff that the court will not proceed with the trial although the plaintiff has, in fact, paid the proper court fee. It is, therefore, a refusal to exercise jurisdiction, and the high court will interfere in revision.[872] However, if such an order is favourable to the plaintiff, though it may cause detriment to the revenue authorities, and also does not prejudice the defendant, there is no ground for revision.[873] Though the defendants would ask for enquiry with reference to the value of the court fee payable on the plaint, the defendants cannot have any grievance against the order overruling the objection to get him entitled to invoke the revisional jurisdiction of the high court on the question of whether the plaintiffs have paid adequate court fee on the plaint or not,[874] unless the question of jurisdiction is connected with the question of court fees.[875] Thus, it was observed in Sathappa Chettiar v Ramanathan Chettiar[876] that:

> Normally the dispute between the litigant and the Registry in respect of court fees arises at the initial stage of the presentation of the plaint or the appeal and the defendant or the respondent is usually not interested in such a dispute unless the question of payment of court fees involves also the question of jurisdiction of the court either to try the suit or to entertain the appeal.

The Calcutta High Court has held that an order of the effect that the plaintiff's valuation is correct is not open to revision.[877] However, if the plaintiff's valuation is too low, it can be revised. Otherwise, the Patna High Court has laid down that the plaintiff would be able to drag the defendant into any court he pleases.[878] This passage was quoted, with approval, by the Bombay High Court in Bhikamdas v Motilal,[879] wherein, it was held that an erroneous decision of the effect that a suit fell under a particular category for the purposes of court fees was open to revision. And, it was further pointed out that the jurisdiction of the court might be affected by the decision. The Kerala High Court also held that the defendant could prefer a revision against an order deciding that the suit fell under a particular category and that the court fee paid was correct.[880] The Mysore High Court held that where the plaintiff, claiming exemption under a notification issued under the Hyderabad Court-Fees Act, presented a plaint without any court fee, it was open to the defendant to challenge its validity in a revision, as the rule that the defendant cannot move the court under section 115, when the court fee paid has been held to be sufficient, has no application when no court fee has been paid.[881]

In Ratnavarma Raja v Vimla,[882] the Supreme Court has observed that whether proper court fee has been paid or not, is an issue between the plaintiff and the state and that the defendant has no right to question it in a revision. In view of this pronouncement, some of the decisions noted above might require reconsideration.[883] The Allahabad High Court has held that a decision in the trial of a suit as to the amount of court fee is not an independent proceeding and, therefore, not open to revision.[884] The Oudh High Court has held that an order demanding deficit court fee from a plaintiff is not open to revision.[885]

An order deciding whether a document sought to be admitted in evidence was duly stamped or not, can be revised, as, it would affect its admissibility.[886] Where a document produced at a trial is impounded as being insufficiently stamped, the order is open to revision.[887] Consequent to an amendment of the plaint seeking recovery of possession of property, in addition to the original suit for declaration and permanent injunction, directions issued to the plaintiff to pay ad-valorem court fee on the valuation so made, was held as not liable to be interfered in revision.[888] Where a plaint is rejected because of deficient court fee, on account of failure of the plaintiff's counsel to pay the court fee, despite the fact that the same was purchased and handed over to the counsel, the plaint can be restored under section 151 and that order will not be open for interference in revision.[889] In a case where the trial court has adjudicated upon the issue relating to valuation of the subject matter of the suit and sufficiency of court fee paid or payable, then he will be deemed to have acted within the jurisdiction to do so even if the decision is found to be erroneous or wrong on merits. That by itself cannot clothe defendant with the right of maintaining a revision before high court under section 115, CPC. No doubt, as provided under sub-section (4)(a) of section 11 of the Karnataka Court-fees and Suits Valuation Act, 1958, he will have a right to raise such an issue before the court of appeal if an occasion arises, and in such a situation the procedure laid down under the said sub-section will have to be followed for adjudicating and for recovery of the deficit court fee and refund of the excess court fee but the revision against the said order is not maintainable.[890]

[s 115.66] Deccan Agriculturists Relief Act, 1879

A special judge has, by virtue of section 53 of the Deccan Agriculturists Relief Act, 1879, a revisional power, in all cases where a failure of justice appears to have taken place. The high court is, therefore, reluctant to interfere where such revisional powers suffice, but will do so in a case of general importance.[891] The revisional jurisdiction vested in the high court under section 29(2) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, or in the district court under section 29(3) of the same Act is wider than the jurisdiction vested under section 115 of the CPC.[892]

[s 115.68] Indian Companies Act, 1956

A district court, exercising jurisdiction under the Indian Companies Act, 1956, is subject to the revisional jurisdiction of the high court. If, acting under an erroneous view of the law, it does not consider what it ought to consider, and decides something it ought not to decide, that would amount to a "material irregularity" in the exercise of its jurisdiction.[895]

[s 115.69] Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887

Under section 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887, the high court has wider powers of interference than those conferred by section 115 of the CPC.[896] Though this is so, the principle underlying this section would equally apply to revisions under section 25 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887.[897] The high court will interfere under section 25 of the Act where substantial injustice has resulted by reason of an erroneous view of law, but not otherwise.[898] The Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887 has its own self-contained scheme of revision under section 25. It excludes revision under section 115 of the CPC.[899] The law is also clear on that point that a judgment in a small cause suit need not contain more points for determination, and that the decision thereon, in view of O XX, rule 4(1) of the CPC, which the high court cannot alter, and if some reasons are given unless they are absurd, the high court in revision under section 115 cannot supplement its reason contrary to the finding.[900]

[s 115.70] Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947 and Maharashtra Rent Control Act, 1999

The full bench of the Bombay high court while dealing with the question that whether a revision application under section 34(4) of the Maharashtra Rent Control Act, 1999 would be maintainable in respect of a procedural order passed under the CPC in a suit arising out of the Maharashtra Rent Control Act, 1999, has held that an order rejecting application for setting aside ex parte decree is appealable under section 29(1) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947 is correct view. The order of the trial court is not a mere procedural order not affecting substantive rights of the parties under the Rent Act. The order did affect the substantive rights of the parties. The order did cause substantial prejudice to the plaintiff, who had filed the suit for asserting his rights and liabilities against the tenant under the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947. Scope and ambit of the revisional power under section 34(4) of 1947 Act and under section 29(3) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, though not as narrow as the scope of the revisional power under section 115 of the CPC is at the same time not so wide as to enable the revisional court to interfere with an order of the trial court under the Rent Act, merely on the ground that it is not according to procedural law. After the revisional court is satisfied about maintainability of the revision application, the revisional court will consider whether the order is according to law.[901]

[s 115.71] Sanction to Prosecute

If a civil or a revenue court, acting under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, grants or refuses an application to prosecute a party to the suit or witnesses before it, its order is a decision of a case within the meaning of the present section. The high court, therefore, has no jurisdiction to interfere under section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 or to call for the proceedings of the lower court under this section. However, it has the power to call for the proceedings and to pass such orders as it may deem expedient. In other words, an application in such cases lies on the civil revisional side of the high court, and not on the criminal revisional side. However, the bench, exercising criminal jurisdiction, it has been held, may deal with the matter, if authorised to do so by the Chief Justice under section 14 of the High Courts Act, 1861.[902] The same rule applies where action has been taken by a subordinate civil court under section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[903] (See also the undermentioned cases.)[904] On the other hand, it has been held, that an order made by a civil court under section 476B of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 is an order made by a court exercising criminal powers, and is not an order made by a civil court. Therefore, an application in revision to the high court from such an order should be heard and decided under section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 and not in accordance with the provisions of this section.[905] Likewise, where a complaint under section 479A of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 is lodged before a magistrate by a civil court the remedy for the person concerned is by way of a petition under section 651A of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 and not under this section.[906] appeal against order granting interim maintenance does not call for any interference. In the circumstances, the request of the revision petitioner to remit the matter back to the principal district court for the purpose of returning the civil miscellaneous appeal to seek proper remedy cannot be considered by the high court.[908]

There was a conflict of judicial opinion on the question as to whether a revision lies against an order for interim maintenance made under section 24 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, which turns on the interpretation of section 28 of the Act. According to one view, section 28 leaves the matter to be regulated by the law for the time being in force, that is, the CPC, and, as the order is not appealable under the Code, a revision lies.[909] As against this, it has been held that section 28 confers, independently of any law, a right of appeal against all orders passed under the Act, and so, an order under section 24 is appealable, and then, revision lies.[910] Therefore, revisional application will only lie against such final or interlocutory order if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or the proceeding.

The revisional application directed against order passed by the learned Additional District Judge, in a matrimonial suit rejecting an application filed by the husband for amendment of his written objection to the application filed by the wife under section 24 of Hindu Marriage Act, 1955 can never be said that the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit so the revisional application under section 115 of the CPC is not maintainable.[911]

An application was made by both the parties to a divorce petition, for interim maintenance. The trial court found that neither of the parties had an independent income to support the other. Such a finding could not be interfered with, in revision.[912]

A decree granting divorce under section 13(1)(ib) whether ex parte or bipartite, is a decree which is appealable under section 28 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955. Consequently, the order of the trial court refusing to set aside such an ex parte decree, and rejecting the application under O IX, rule 13 of the CPC, could have been validly made the subject matter of an appeal under O XLIII, rule 1(d). Therefore, the revision application before the high court should be treated, in substance, as one by way of a miscellaneous appeal.[913] The question of maintenance pendente lite and litigation expenses arises with the filing of an application for matrimonial reliefs under the Act. It ends as the proceedings terminate. It has no separate existence and cannot stand by itself. No application for maintenance pendente lite or litigation expenses can exist independently unless lis is there. Admittedly, no appeal lies against the order. Thus, the revision also does not lie in view of the amended provision to section 115, CPC[914]

In a case, an application for divorce by consent was pending. The petitioner applied for an amendment in order to add a prayer for restitution of conjugal rights, which was rejected. While the revision against the rejection was pending, the parties filed a joint application for mutual divorce. Section 13B of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, provides that the court must

The fact, for what purpose the premises was let out and whether the tenant has changed the user of the premises is jurisdictional fact and it was open to the revisional court to go into the said questions. The high court fell in error in holding that the trial court's finding that the premises was let out for operating stitching machine, rolling machines being finding of court could not have been set aside by the revisional court. The revisional court recorded a finding that even prior to the amendment of the Act, the tenant used the premises for the purpose other than that for which the premises was let out, without the consent of the landlord.[916]

The trial court accepted the deposit of arrears of rent by the tenants and refused to strike off defence for more than one valid reason. The most important reason assigned by the trial judge is that there is a serious question of jurisdiction of the civil court involved in the cases. The court also came to the conclusion that as the arrears of rent were deposited in the bank, there was no mala fides on the part of the tenants. The rent was not withheld for any ulterior purpose. The arrears of rent were, thereafter, deposited in court with an application or representation which was made in accordance with sub-rule (2) of rule 5 of O XV of the CPC.

The high court could not justifiably interfere with the same in exercise of its revisional jurisdiction under section 115 of the CPC.[917]

The eviction suit was filed by the landlord inter alia on ground that the demised premises in question has become unfit for human habitation. Civil revision arising out of the suit remained pending in the high court for more than 18 years. The landlord made an application for the appointment of a local commissioner. Landlord in his application stated that the roof of the shop has since also fallen down and its condition further deteriorated, during the pendency of the revision. The application was allowed by the revisional court. The Supreme Court held. when the question of whether accommodation in question is fit for human habitation was in issue and with the long passage of 18 years, if fresh assessment was sought through a local commissioner, it cannot be said, that in allowing such commission the high court exceeded in its revisional jurisdiction.[918]

If the impugned order is found to have been passed by the court below in exercise of its discretionary jurisdiction vested in it by sub-clause (b) of section 20(1)(i) of the Karnataka Rent Control Act, 1961 and it has not acted illegally or with any material irregularity in exercise of that jurisdiction, the revision directed against it is not maintainable in law.[919]

The high court's power of revision under section 50 of the Karnataka Rent Control Act, 1961 is not as narrow as is section 115 of the CPC, but is wider.[920]

In view of the language used in section 23E of the Madhya Pradesh Accommodation Control Act, 1961 and in the light of the scope of high court considering a revision under section 23E of the Act is little more than the revisional jurisdiction exercisable under section 115 of the CPC and less than the appellate powers exercisable by this court provided under the law.

Consequently, it can be concluded that this court exercising powers under section 23E of the Act shall interfere with the findings of the facts recorded by the rent control authority when the court finds that the rent control authority has misread the evidence, ignored to consider the evidence and thereby recorded a perverse finding or has committed illegality by misquoting law or misinterpreted the law applicable to the case.[921]

The high court, in revision, under the Bihar Buildings (Lease, Rent and Eviction) Control Act, 1982, erred in taking the view that the nature of the business which the landlord wanted to start in the premises should also have been pleaded.[922] Although the word "revision" is not employed in the proviso to section 25B(8) of Delhi Rent Control Act, 1958, it is evident from the language used therein, that the power conferred is a revisional power. Hence, it is not permissible for the high court, in the exercise of its power, to come to a different finding of fact, unless the finding arrived at by the rent controller on the facts, is so unreasonable that no rent controller should have arrived at such a finding based on the materials available.[923] The high court ought not to interfere in the absence of an actual basis to the plea of tenancy under the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Vidharbha Region) Act, 1958.[924] Even though the rent control law under the Kerala Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Act, 1965 is a "court", it is not a civil court for the purposes of section 115 of the CPC. Therefore, against an interim order passed by the rent controller, no revision will lie.[925] Even though the wording of section 25 of the Tamil Nadu Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Act, 1960, is wider than section 115 of the CPC, additional evidence at the stage of revision cannot be let in.[926] In any proceedings under the Karnataka Rent Control Act, 1961, a landlord cannot question the factum of an impleadment of the legal representative of a deceased tenant, in a revision, after almost five years.[927]

The direction given by the court to the tenant to deposit the rent month by month under section 13(a) of the Rajasthan Premises (Control of Rent and Eviction) Act, 1950, cannot be interfered with by the high court in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction.[928] The concurrent findings of the rent controller and of the district judge under the Hyderabad Houses (Rent, Eviction and Lease) Control Act, 1954, and the Andhra Pradesh Buildings (Lease, Rent and Eviction) Act, 1960, cannot be interfered with by the high court in revision, in the absence of any jurisdictional error or an illegal exercise of jurisdiction.[929]

The site plan of the suit shop was annexed to the eviction petition. The tenant did question its correctness. An issue was also raised. But no arguments were addressed or evidence led in support of the objection disputing the correctness of the site plan. The tenant in his evidence in fact admitted its correctness. Eviction decree was passed. Against it an appeal was filed before the appellate authority, a revision before the high court and an SLP before the Supreme Court and in none of those proceedings this issue was agitated. The tenant did not hand over possession to the landlady despite undertaking given to high court. The landlord was compelled to file an execution petition. In the execution petition, repeated attempts were made by the tenant to again revive the issue of identity of the property as also the description of the boundaries of the suit property. The executing court time and again rejected this contention holding that the issue was already settled in the original ejectment proceedings, hence, same could not be reopened. The respondents even moved the high court in between in revision challenging the rejection of their prayer as to the identity of the property which also came to be rejected by the high court observing strongly that all these were attempts on the part of the respondents-tenants to delay the execution proceedings. It was only after such attempts of the tenant having failed before the high court, the landlady was given possession of the suit property by the bailiff under the orders of the executing court by breaking open the lock with police help, the issuance of delivery warrant was challenged by tenant before high court in revision. The high court allowed the revision directing executing court to first consider the objections raised by the respondents before taking steps to issue warrants of possession and during the pendency of such consideration it further directed restoration of possession in favour of the tenant. On these facts it was held that the order passed in revision was wholly erroneous. Courts of law should be careful enough to see through such diabolical plans of the judgment-debtors to deny the decree-holders the fruits of the decree obtained by them. This type of errors on the part of the judicial forums only encourage frivolous and cantankerous litigations causing laws delay and bringing bad name to the judicial system.[930]

The question involved was whether occupants are sub-tenants or tenants. On an evaluation of evidence, the rent controller upheld the pleas raised in the written statements and directed the eviction petition to be dismissed. Owners preferred an appeal which was allowed. The appellate authority held that there were no weighty and material circumstances enabling drawing of an inference contrary to the apparent tenor of the transaction and relationship created by documents in writing. The appellate authority found the averments made in the eviction petition proved and hence directed the tenant and sub-tenants (the occupants) to be evicted. The occupants preferred a revision petition before the high court. The high court entered into re-evaluation of the entire evidence, drawn factual inferences and, based thereon, held that the lease deed incorporated a sham transaction intended to get over the restriction of the Rent Act. The high court also held that subletting and changes in the suit premises were with the oral consent. In the result, the high court directed the eviction petition to be dismissed. The owners, petitioners before the rent controller, preferred the appeal by special leave and the Supreme Court allowed the appeal and judgment of the high court was set aside.[931]

In SF Engineer v Metal Box India Ltd,[932] the Supreme Court has held that drawing inference from the facts established is not purely a question of fact. It is always considered to be a point of law insofar as it relates to the inferences to be drawn from finding of fact. The court observed that when inferences drawn do not clearly flow from the facts and are not "legally legitimate", any conclusion arrived at on that basis becomes absolutely legally fallible.

If the judgment-debtor categorically asserts that entire property had been delivered, he should not have been aggrieved by the delivery tenant warrant issued by the executing court. If really entire property is delivered as asserted, the judgment-debtor should not be in possession of any portion of the schedule property. In such an event, even if the delivery warrant is executed, nothing will happen to the judgment-debtor as it is already out of possession of the scheduled property. No harm, injury or prejudice would be caused to it. If the assertion of the judgment-debtor were to be true, this revision petition should not have been filed challenging the order issuing delivery warrant. When the specific assertion is that entire property had been delivered to the decree holders, there was no occasion for the judgment-debtor to continue the litigation. If the decree holder wants to execute the delivery warrant against any person in occupation or possession of any portion of the scheduled landlord property, judgment-debtor having delivered entire property should allow the decree holders to have full satisfaction of the decree for eviction obtained by them. If there is delivery of entire schedule property to the decree holders, the high court failed to understand for what purpose the revision petition was filed seeking setting aside the delivery warrant issued by the executing court and so it held that the revision petition was liable to be dismissed in limine.[933]

Where tenant filed a review petition before the trial court, but by filing said review petition no advantage, benefit or claim or privilege was derived by appellant tenant and the tenant did not induce landlord in any manner while pursuing her review petition and in not filing appeal earlier, it cannot be said that she has abandoned her rights to appeal. Further, since no appeal lies against order rejecting review, the civil revision against order rejecting review petition was held maintainable.[934]

The civil court had no jurisdiction to entertain a suit after an application under section 8 of the Act is made for arbitration. Therefore, the trial court failed to exercise its jurisdiction vested in it under section 115 of the CPC when it rejected the application of the appellant filed under sections 8 and 5 of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996. In such a situation, refusal to refer the dispute to arbitration would amount to failure of justice as also causing irreparable injury to the appellant. For the said reason, the high court has erred in coming to the conclusion that the appellant was not entitled to the relief under section 115, CPC.[935]

It is true in the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996 application of the Code is not specifically provided for but what is to be noted is: Is there an express prohibition against the application of the CPC to a proceeding arising out of the Act before a civil court? There is no such specific exclusion of the Code in the present Act. When there is no express exclusion, it cannot be held that the CPC is not applicable. It has been held by the Supreme Court in more than one case that the jurisdiction of the civil court to which a right to decide a lis between the parties has been conferred can only be taken by a statute in specific terms and such exclusion of right cannot be easily inferred because there is always a strong presumption that the civil courts have the jurisdiction to decide all questions of civil nature, therefore, if at all there has to be an inference the same should be in favour of the jurisdiction of the court rather than the exclusion of such jurisdiction and there being no such exclusion of the CPC in specific terms except of the extent stated in section 37(2), no inference can be drawn that merely because the Act has not provided the CPC to be applicable, by inference it should be held that the Code is inapplicable. This general principle apart, this issue is settled by the judgment of a three-judge bench of the Supreme Court in a case[936] decided on 13 March 2002 wherein while dealing with a similar argument arising out of the Act, this Court held:

> While examining a particular provision of a statute to find out whether the jurisdiction of a Court is ousted or not, the principle of universal application is that ordinarily the jurisdiction may not be ousted unless the very statutory provision explicitly indicates or even by inferential conclusion the Court arrives at the same when such a conclusion is the only conclusion.

It is to be noted that it is under this part, namely, Part I of the Act, that section 37(1) of the Act is found, which provides for an appeal to a civil court. The term "court" referred to in the said provision is defined under section 2(e) of the Act. From the said definition, it is clear that the appeal is not to any designated person but to a civil court. In such a situation, the proceedings before such court will have to be controlled by the provisions of the CPC; therefore, the remedy by way of a revision under section 115 of the Code will not amount to a judicial intervention not provided for by Part I of the Act. To put it in other words, when the Act under section 37 provided for an appeal to the civil court and the application of CPC not having been expressly barred, the revisional jurisdiction of the high court gets attracted. If that be so, the bar under section 5 will not be attracted because conferment of appellate power on the civil court in Part I of the Act attracts the provisions of the CPC also.[937]

The Arbitration and Conciliation Act of 1996 by provision contained in section 37(3) of the said Act only takes away the right of second appeal to the high court. The remedy of revision under section 115 of the CPC is neither expressly nor impliedly taken away by the said Act.[938] However, the Supreme Court has held that the analysis made in ITI Ltd[939] to the effect that merely because the 1996 Act does not provide CPC to be applicable, it should not be inferred that the Code is inapplicable seems to be incorrect, for the scheme of the 1996 Act clearly envisages otherwise and the legislative intendment also so postulates and has referred the same to a larger bench for reconsideration.[940]

Merely because a second appeal against an appellate order is barred by the provisions of sub-section (3) of section 37, the remedy of revision does not cease to be available to the petitioner, for the city civil court deciding an appeal under sub-section (2) of section 37 remains a court subordinate to the high court within the meaning of section 115 of the CPC[941]

In a case, neither the arbitrators nor the trial court awarded pendente lite interest to the decree holder. The executing court also refused to grant pendente lite interest to the decree holder and the same was upheld by the high court in the revision petition filed against the order of the executing court. However, the position would be different where the judgment of a court provides for pendente lite interest and decree omits to mention such interest. Such a mistake could be corrected under section 152, CPC.[942]

Section 152 provides that a clerical or arithmetical mistake in judgments, decrees or orders or errors arising therein from any accidental slip or omission may at any time be corrected by the court either of its own motion or on the application of any of the parties. The question, therefore, arises is whether, omission of pendente lite interest to the decree by the trial court was an accidental or clerical error. The omission in not granting the pendente lite interest could not be held to be accidental omission or mistake and therefore, neither the trial court nor the appellate court has power to award pendente lite interest under section 152 of the CPC.[943]

It is well celebrated principle of law that the arbitrator need not follow the technical rules of evidence laid down in the Indian Evidence Act, 1872. Even if the arbitrator admits inadmissible evidence and unless misconduct is proved, the award based on such evidence cannot be interfered with lightly because the arbitrator is not bound by rules of evidence and strict formality of procedure. Arbitrator is a court selected by the parties and, therefore, may conduct any proceedings in any manner he thinks fit so long he acts in accordance with the principles of natural justice, equity and good conscious. In the present case, this arbitration tribunal is statutory one and procedure is prescribed by the Gujarat Public Works Contracts Disputes Arbitration Tribunal Act, 1992, section 8, sub-section (3) wherein, it is provided that the tribunal admits the reference under sub-section (2), it shall, after recording evidence if necessary, and after perusal of the material on record and on affording an opportunity to the parties to submit their arguments, make an award or an interim award giving its reasons therefor. This finding of the tribunal based on the principle of natural justice requires no interference in revisional jurisdiction."[944] As arbitration petition is a proceeding within the meaning of the term "other proceedings" as provided in section 115 of the CPC, no appeal is provided against the order of the impugned nature. Therefore, the civil revision is maintainable against the order passed in arbitration proceedings deciding venue of arbitration.[945]

Where an order directing the arbitrators to pass interim award was challenged in revision on the ground that an application for setting aside ex parte interim award was pending before the court, it was held that that is not a ground to render revision infructuous and not maintainable, more so, when both the proceedings arise out of different orders.[946] The point whether any claim before the arbitrator is barred by limitation can be urged before the arbitrator and cannot be permitted to be urged before high court in revision.[947]

Where the lower court, misconceiving the doctrine of waiver and estoppel, finds that an award was passed beyond time and refuses thereupon to pass a decree in terms of the award it fails to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by section 17 of the Arbitration Act, 1940 (replaced by the Arbitration & Conciliation Act, 1996).[948]

Where the lower court came to a conclusion of negligence on the part of the arbitrator, which is a finding of fact and, unless there is any "material irregularity", it cannot be interfered with, in revision.[949] satisfaction of the aforesaid conditions that the permission to institute the suit can be granted by the court for the relief mentioned in the said section 92, CPC.

Analysing the provisions of section 115, CPC, in this background there can be no doubt that the revision under section 115 against refusal to grant leave is maintainable.[950]

An order of court granting permission to file suit against trust under section 92 is an administrative order and not a judicial one. Such an order is not revisable under section 115.[951]

Clause 15 of the Letters Patent, as amended in March 1919, provides that no appeal lies from an order made in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction. Prior to the amendment, there was a conflict of opinion as to whether or not, an appeal lay to the high court under clause 15 of the Letters Patent, from the judgment of a single judge, delivered in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction under this section. The matter stood thus: clause 15 of the Letters Patent, as it stood before the amendment, stated that an appeal shall lie to the high court from the judgment of one judge of the high court or one judge of any division court, pursuant to section 13 of the Charter Act, 1813. Section 13 of the Charter Act, 1813 provides for the exercise, by the judges of the high court, of the original and appellate jurisdiction vested in the high court. This gave rise to the question as to whether the division of jurisdiction into "original" and "appellate" was exhaustive or not. If the division was exhaustive, revisional jurisdiction must be treated as comprised in appellate jurisdiction, so that an appeal would lie, under clause 15, from the judgment of a single judge, exercising revisional jurisdiction. If the division was not exhaustive, so that revisional jurisdiction was something outside the original and appellate jurisdiction, the case would not fall within section 13 of the Charter Act, 1813, and no appeal could, therefore, lie under clause 15 of the letters patent. It was held by the High Courts of Madras,[952] and Calcutta,[953] that the division of the jurisdiction of the high courts into "original" and "appellate" was exhaustive, and that, revisional jurisdiction was included in appellate jurisdiction, and that an appeal, therefore, lay under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from an order of a single judge made under the present section, provided that such an order amounted to a "judgment" within the meaning of that clause. The contrary view was held by the High Court of Bombay.[954] It does not, however, appear that there was any "judgment" in that case.[955]

In Jogendrasinhji Vijaysinghji v State of Gujarat[956], the Supreme Court dealt with an issue relating to the maintainability of letters patent appeal before the division bench of the High Court of Gujarat, under clause 15 of the Letters Patent, against the orders of the single judge bench of the high court issued in exercise of writ jurisdiction. The Supreme Court laid down following principles:

> 1. Whether a letters patent appeal would lie against the order passed by the learned single judge that has travelled to him from the other tribunals or authorities, would depend upon many a facet.

2. The order passed by the civil court is only amenable to be scrutinized by the High Court in exercise of jurisdiction under Article 227 of the Constitution of India which is different from Article 226 of the Constitution and as per the pronouncement in Radhey Shyam[957], no writ can be issued against the order passed by the civil court and, therefore, no letters patent appeal would be maintainable.

3. The writ petition can be held to be not maintainable if a tribunal or authority that is required to defend the impugned order has not been arrayed as a party, as it is a necessary party.

4. The tribunal being or not being party in a writ petition is not determinative of the maintainability of a letters patent appeal.

[s 115.77] Cross-objections

No memorandum of cross-objection lies in a revision petition.[958] However, the court can, in an appropriate case, interfere, by virtue of its inherent powers, with an erroneous finding.[959]

[s 115.78] Laches

An application for revision will not be entertained unless it is made without unreasonable delay,[960] except when the opposite party can be compensated with costs.[961] The Mysore High Court has held that, in a case where the court decides that a particular document is a promissory note and is duly stamped under the Indian Stamp Act, 1899, the order has to be challenged in revision without delay, and cannot be kept for adjudication at a later stage.[962] A revision should, as a rule, be filed within the period prescribed for filing an appeal[963] but, a delay in the presentation of revision can be condoned where it is due to the conduct of the respondent,[964] or where the circumstances are exceptional.[965]

[s 115.79] Change of Law Pending Revision

It has been held, in some cases, that a court of revision cannot take into account any change in the law brought about during the pendency of the revision, as its function is only to see whether the courts have acted within their jurisdiction and that the order was right when it was passed.[966] In support of this position, recourse has been had to the rule of construction, namely that, a change in substantive law has no retrospective operation.[967] However, when an ordinance was issued during the pendency of the revision, avowedly for being applied to pending matters, the court of revision took that into account.[968] It is the practice of the Madras

High Court to take note of subsequent facts events in disposing off revision petitions, and to grant relief in accordance with altered circumstances.[969]

[s 115.80] Whether Revision Barred by Acceptance of Benefit Under the Order

A party aggrieved by an interlocutory order, as for eg, an order of amendment, is not precluded from filing a revision against it by reason of his having accepted costs under the impugned order, unless it is conditional.[970]

[s 115.81] Dismissal of Petition

A claim for the recovery of compensation was filed by a widow for herself and her children, after the death of her husband in a motor accident. The widow was an indigent and illiterate person. The accident claims tribunal ordered the payment of the compensation amount to the counsel engaged by her initially, in spite of the widow's express application for payment of the amount only to her. The counsel deposited a partial amount in the name of the children of the widow. The widow applied in revision. Later, her counsel prayed for its dismissal, as the same had not been pressed in the first application. It was held that the application for dismissal of revision, not having been filed by her willingly, such an application, procured from the widow, would not be an impediment in the way of making a suitable direction for achieving the ends of justice. The counsel was directed to pay the balance amount.[971] Also, the revision petition should not be dismissed without assigning reasons for the same.[972]

[s 115.82] Death of Parties

An application for setting aside the abatement of a suit was dismissed by the trial court, one of the grounds being that the application was made after the limitation period had expired. However, the revision court found that the applicants were "Pardanashin" women who were ignorant of the law. Revision was thus allowed.[973] As there is absolutely no limitation for a revision petition, it would be anomalous to hold that limitation is contemplated by the law for a petition to bring on record the legal representatives after the death of a party. Order XXII of the CPC does not apply to revision.[974]

Under the Uttar Pradesh Amendment to section 115, the decision of the district judge in an appeal or revision, in a suit valued at less than Rs 20,000, cannot be revised by the high court.[975] Under the Madhya Pradesh Civil Courts Act, 1958, an Additional District Judge enjoys concurrent jurisdiction with the district judge. He is not a subordinate to the district court and his order cannot be revised by the district judge under section 115, as amended by the Madhya Pradesh Amendment Act of 1984.[976] The high court cannot revise a revisional order of the district judge passed under section 115, as amended in Uttar Pradesh.[977] Under section 25, Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, 1887, revision does not lie to the high court. The Act is a self-contained one, and has its own scheme, which excludes the application of section 115 of the CPC.[978] The high court has powers which are co-extensive with the powers of the lower court, to satisfy itself about the sufficiency of the cause for default in appearance and delay in moving the application for condonation of delay. In a particular case, the order dismissing the suit for default in appearance deserved to be set aside, and in doing so, the lower court did not commit any "illegality" or "material irregularity" in the exercise of its jurisdiction. The impugned order did not deny justice and did not cause any injury to the applicant, much less any irreparable injury. No interference by the high court was called for.[979] Under section 115, as amended in Uttar Pradesh, an order passed in a divorce petition, rejecting the application for examination of witnesses on commission, cannot be considered "deciding an issue", so as to amount to a "case decided". In section 115, Explanation (as amended in Uttar Pradesh), the words "order made" also do not appear.[980]

Where the concurrent finding of fact that the applicant is not the widow and legal heir of the deceased, based upon appreciation of facts and the entire evidence adduced by the parties concerned, and the finding of fact stand concluded by two concurrent judgments of the court then the evidence cannot be re-examined to record a different finding of fact in the revision.[981]

[s 115.83] Adverse Remarks Against Subordinate Judicial Officer

The primary purpose of pronouncing a verdict is to dispose of the matter in controversy between the parties before it. A judge is not expected to drift away from pronouncing upon the controversy, to sitting in judgment over the conduct of the judicial and quasi-judicial authorities whose decisions or orders are put in issue before him, and indulge into criticising and commenting thereon unless the conduct of an authority or subordinate functionary or anyone else than the parties comes of necessity under review and expression of opinion thereon going to the extent of commenting or criticising becomes necessary as a part of reasoning requisite for arriving at a conclusion necessary for deciding the main controversy or it becomes necessary to have animadverted thereon for the purpose of arriving at a decision on an issue involved in the litigation. This applies with added force when the superior court is hearing an appeal or revision against an order of a subordinate judicial officer and feels inclined to animadvert on him. The wisdom of a superior judge, for making observation on a subordinate judge, before ventilating into expression, must pause for a moment and read the counsel of CARDOZO.

> Write an opinion, and read it a few years later when it is dissected in the briefs of counsel. You will learn for the first time the limitations of the power of speech, or, if not those of speech in general, at all events your own. All sorts of gaps and obstacles and impediments will obtrude themselves before your gaze, as pitilessly manifest as the hazards on a golf course. Sometimes you will know that the fault is truly yours, in which event you can only smite your breast, and pray for deliverance thereafter.[982]

Though the power to make remarks or observations is there but on being questioned, the exercise of power must withstand judicial scrutiny on the touchstone of following tests: (a) whether the party whose conduct is in question is before the court or has an opportunity of explaining or defending himself; (b) whether there is evidence on record bearing on that conduct justifying the remarks; and (c) whether it is necessary for the decision of the case, as an integral part thereof, to animadvert on that conduct. The overall test is that the criticism or observation must be judicial in nature and should not formally depart from sobriety, moderation and reserve.[983]

Bombay Regulation 2 of 1827.—The High Court of Bombay has the power, independently of section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to call for the proceedings of any subordinate civil court and to issue orders thereon under the Bombay Regulation 2 of 1827, ch 1, section 5(2).[984] There is no provision in the Amendment Act, 1976, amending or affecting this Regulation. Section 97(1) of the Amendment Act, speaks only about an amendment made, or a provision inserted in the principal Act by a state legislature or a High Court, as it stands repealed, except to the extent that it is consistent with the provisions of the Amendment Act. However, there is nothing in section 97(1), which speaks of this Regulation.

Amendment in Uttar Pradesh.—For Section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, as amended in its application to Uttar Pradesh, the following section shall be substituted, namely:

Uttar Pradesh.—(i) For section 115, substitute the following section, namely:—

115. Revision.—(1) A superior court may revise an order passed in a case decided in an original suit or other proceeding by a subordinate court where no appeal lies against the order and where the subordinate court has—

(a) exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law; or

(b) failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested; or

(c) acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity;

(2) A revision application under sub-section (1), when filed in the High Court, shall contain a certificate on the first page of such application, below the title of the case, to the effect that no revision in the case lies to the District Court but lies only to the High Court either because of valuation or because the order sought to be revised was passed by the District Court.

(3) The superior court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any order made except where,–

(i) the order, if it had been made in favour of the party applying for revision, would have finally disposed of the suit or other proceeding; or

(ii) the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it is made.

(4) A revision shall not operate as a stay of suit or other proceeding before the court except where such suit or other proceeding is stayed by the superior court.

Explanation I.—In this section,—

(i) the expression "superior court" means–

(b) the High court, where the order sought to be revised was passed in a case decided by the District Court or where the value of the original suit or other proceedings in a case decided by a court subordinate to the District Court exceed five lakh rupees;

(ii) the expression "order" includes an order deciding an issue in any original suit or other proceedings.

Explanation II.— The provisions of this section shall also be applicable to orders passed, before or after the commencement of this section, in original suits or other proceedings instituted before such commencement.

[Vide Uttar Pradesh Act 14 of 2003, section 2 (w.e.f. 1-7-2002)].

Note—Also see for the effect of subsequent central amendment — section 97(1) of the CPC (Amendment) Act, 1976 given in the Appendix.

For effect of the Amendment Act, 1976, see Mangal Ram v Leelavati.[985]

Scope.—A revision against orders passed on interlocutory applications, while an appeal or revision is pending before the appellate or the revisional court is not maintainable. The legislature had emphasised the words "original suit" in section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It lays down that a revision would lie to the High Court "in cases arising out of an original suit or other proceedings, of the value of twenty thousand rupees and above". The proceedings pending in appeal or in revision, filed against a decision of the trial court cannot be held to be an original suit. Moreover, the amendment in section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure was necessary, as is apparent from the statement of objects and reasons appended to the Amendment Act, 1970, to help in reducing the pressure of work on the High Court. For that purpose, the legislature has laid down that the decision of an appeal or a revision of the District Court is not amenable to the revisional jurisdiction under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[986] A revisional court can take notice of subsequent events. However, such notice is taken in order to shorten litigation, to preserve the rights of both the parties, and to subserve the ends of justice.[987]

Madhya Pradesh Amendment Act, 1994.—An order passed by the District Judge, in the exercise of its mutually exclusive jurisdiction under section 115, conferred by the Amendment Act of 1984, and later restoring it to the High Court under section 115 by the Amendment Act of 1984, would not be amenable to revisional jurisdiction under section 115 before the High Court, merely on the ground that the court rendering the decision is a court sub-ordinate to the High Court. The words "other proceedings", used in the Explanation to section 115, will cover the proceedings of revision as the proceedings of the court of civil jurisdiction. The words "or other proceedings" used in the Explanation, as amended, cannot enlarge the scope so as to entertain a further revision against an order of the District Judge, passed in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction under section 115, as conferred on it by the Amendment Act of 1984.[988]

Orissa Amendment Act, 1991.—For section 115 substitute the following section, namely—

Section 115. Revision—The High Court, in cases arising out of original suits or other proceedings of the value exceeding one lakh rupees, and the District Court, in any other case including a case arising out of an original suit or other proceedings instituted before the commencement of the Code of Civil Procedure (Orissa amendment) Act, 1991 may call for the record of any case which has been decided by any court subordinate to the High Court or the District Court as the case may be, and in which no appeal lies thereto, and if such subordinate court appears—

(a) to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or

(b) to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, or

(c) to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, the High Court or the District Court, as case may be, make such order in the case as it thinks fit:

Provided that in respect of cases arising out of original suits or other proceedings of any valuation decided by the District Court, the High Court alone shall be competent to make on order under this section:

Provided further that the High Court or the District Court shall not, under this section, vary or reverse any order, including an order deciding an issue, made in the course of a suit or other proceeding, except where—

(i) the order, if so varied or reversed, would finally dispose of the suit or other proceedings; or

(ii) the order, if allowed to stand, would occasion a failure of justice or cause irreparable injury to the party against whom it was made;

Explanation.—In this section, the expression "any case which has been decided" includes any order deciding an issue, in the course of suit or other proceeding.

Saving.—The amendment made by this Act shall not affect the validity, invalidity, effect or consequence of anything already done or suffered, or any jurisdiction already exercised, and any proceeding instituted or commenced in the High Court under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 5 of 1908, prior to the commencement of this act shall, notwithstanding such amendment, continue to be heard and decided by such court.

[Vide —Orissa Act 26 of 1991, section 2 (w.e.f. 7-11-1991)].

Section 115A. District Courts' Powers of revision — West Bengal — After section 115, the following section shall be inserted:

115A. District Court's powers of revision.—(1) A District Court may exercise all or any of the powers which may be exercised by the High Court under Section 115.

(2) Where any proceeding by way of revision is commenced before a District Court in pursuance of the provisions of sub-section (1), the provisions of section 115 shall, so far as may be, apply to such proceeding and references in the said section to the High Court shall be construed as references to the District Court.

(3) Where any proceeding for revision is commenced before the District Court, the decision of the District Court on such proceeding shall be final and no further proceeding by way of revision shall be entertained by the High Court or any other Court.

(4) If any application for revision has been made by any party either to the High Court under Section 115 or to the District Court under this section, no further application by the same party shall be entertained by the High Court or any other Court.

(5) A Court of Additional Judge shall have and may exercise all the powers of a District Court under this section in respect of any proceeding which may be transferred to it by or under any general or special order of the District Court."

[Vide West Bengal Act 15 of 1988, section 3 (w.e.f. 1-2-1989)].

West Bengal Amendment.—It is the settled position of law that when a decree is to be executed the execution must be in full and final satisfaction. The bailiff was issued writ for the purpose of execution of decree, the assistance of police was given only to help the bailiff in executing the decree and in fact, the police is not the executive body. Therefore, the police has no authority to make an endorsement that the physical possession has been given. It is admitted position that the police without authority made the endorsement and admission is also there on behalf of the petitioner/judgment-debtor that local people immediately thereafter put the judgment-debtor/petitioner in possession of the suit premises. The decree, therefore, was not in full and final satisfaction. Therefore, in the case the question of re-execution does not arise here. Another very vital point is this, that against this order impugned in this revisional application, the respondent no 2 moved a revisional application under section 115A being civil revisional application no 67 of 2002 and that was dismissed by the learned Additional District Judge, Fast Track Court, at Alipur by an order dated 4 April 2002 and in that revisional application this petitioner/ judgment-debtor no 2 was a party. In that view of the matter also, the other revisional application cannot be said to be maintainable.[989]

PART IX

SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO THE [1][HIGH COURTS [2][NOT BEING THE COURT OF A JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER]]

[S 116] Part to apply to certain High Courts.—This Part applies only to High Courts[3] [not being the Court of a Judicial Commissioner].

Changes in the section.—By the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950, the words "for Part A States" were substituted for the words "which are or may hereafter be constituted by His Majesty by Letters Patent". Also, by section 14 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1951, the words "and Part B States" were added in this section and in the heading to this part the words "High Courts for Part A States and Part B States" were substituted for the words "Chartered High Courts".

By the Adaptation of Laws Order 1956, the words "not being the Court of a Judicial Commissioner" were substituted for the words "for Part A States and Part B States".

[S 117] Application of Code to High Courts.—Save as provided in this Part or in Part X or in rules, the provisions of this Code shall apply to such High Courts.

[s 117.1] "Save as Provided in this Part"—See Section 120

The following provisions shall not apply to the high court in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction, namely, sections 16, 17 and 20.

As to rules not applicable to high courts, see O XLIX, rule 3.

1. Substituted by Act 2 of 1951, section 14 for "CHARTERED HIGH COURTS" (w.e.f. 1-4-1951).
2. Substituted by the Adaptation of Laws (No. 2) Order, 1956 for "FOR PART A STATES AND PART B STATES". Earlier the words "FOR PART A STATES AND PART B STATES" were inserted by Act 2 of 1951, section 14 (w.e.f. 1-4-1951).
3. Substituted by the Adaptation of Laws (No. 2) Order, 1956, for "for Part A States and Part B States". Earlier the words "for Part A States and Part B States" were inserted by Act 2 of 1951, section 14 (w.e.f. 1-4-1951).

Sub-section (2) of this section, by which it was provided that "nothing in this Code shall extend or apply to any Judge of a high court in the exercise of jurisdiction as an insolvent Court" has been repealed by the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, 1909, section 127.

A suit for damages for illegal execution of legal process is not cognisable by Small Causes Court. In case the suit was instituted in the munsif's court, the decree was reversed on first appeal by the subordinate judge. Second appeal before the High Court was held to be maintainable.[4]

[s 117.2] "Save as Provided in Part X"—See Section 129

Notwithstanding anything in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC), any high court (not being the court of a judicial commissioner) may make such rules not inconsistent with the Letters Patent or order or other law establishing it to regulate its own procedure in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction as it shall think fit, and nothing herein contained shall affect the validity of any such rules in force at the commencement of the CPC.

[s 117.2.1] Changes in the Section

The words "not being the court of a Judicial Commissioner" were substituted for the words "for a Part A State or a Part B State".

[s 117.2.2] Rules as to Original Civil Procedure of high courts

Rules made under section 122 must not be inconsistent with the provisions in the body of the CPC. Under this section, any high court may make rules to regulate its own procedure in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction. Such rules may not be consistent with the provisions in the body of the CPC, but they must not be inconsistent with the laws establishing it.[5]

Where a rule has been made by a high court under this section, the provisions of the CPC do not apply. Thus, the rules of the Calcutta High Court contain provisions for default of payment by an auction-purchaser at a sale under a mortgage decree on the original side of the high court and, therefore, O XXI, rule 86 does not apply to such sales.[6] But as the Calcutta rules contain no provision for setting aside a sale on deposit, the provisions of O XXI, rule 89 do apply.[7] Likewise O IX, rule 5 is applicable to suits instituted on the original side of the High Court of Calcutta, as there is nothing in the rules framed by the high court which is repugnant to it, and therefore where the summons was returned unserved and the plaintiff failed to apply for fresh summons within three months, the suit was dismissed.[8]

A rule made by the Bombay High Court under this section empowers the court to make a pay order enforceable as a decree for the payment of the taxed costs of an attorney. This rule is valid, and the pay order may be transferred for execution to another court.[9]

[s 117.3] Rules

"Rules" means rules contained in the First Schedule or made under section 122 or section 125.[10]

[S 118] Execution of decree before ascertainment of costs.—Where any such High Court considers it necessary that a decree passed in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction should be executed before the amount of the costs incurred in the suit can be ascertained by taxation, the Court may order that the decree shall be executed forthwith except as to so much thereof as relates to the costs; and, as to so much thereof as relates to the costs, that the decree may be executed as soon as the amount of the costs shall be ascertained by taxation.

[s 118.1] Costs

Rule 289 of the Bombay High Court Rules provides that whenever costs are awarded and either party is desirous of having the decree or order drawn up before the same are taxed, the award of the costs will be inserted followed by the words "when taxed and noted in the margin hereof". It has been held that when a decree or order has been drawn up under this rule, it becomes executable without the direction of the court as required by the section.[11]

[S 119] Unauthorised persons not to address Court.—Nothing in this Code shall be deemed to authorize any person on behalf of another to address the Court in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction, or to examine witnesses, except where the Court shall have in the exercise of the power conferred by its charter authorized him so to do, or to interfere with the power of the High Court to make rules concerning advocates, vakils and attorneys.

[s 119.2] "To Examine Witnesses"

To examine or cross-examine a witness is not "acting".[12]

The Delhi High Court following the earlier Division Bench decision in Saraswati v Tulsi Ram Seth, (supra) held that conducting examination and cross-examination of witnesses by person holding the status of Senior Advocate is not restricted and the plea that a Senior Advocate can only plead and not act on behalf of a litigating party is unsustainable. It was further held that section 119 of the Code was not applicable.[13]

[s 120.2] Changes in the section

Sub-section (2) of this section by which it was provided that "nothing in this Code shall extend or apply to any Judge of a High Court in the exercise of jurisdiction as an insolvent Court" has been repealed by the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, 1909, section 127. In Sumer Builders Pvt Ltd v Narendra Gorani,[15] the Supreme Court has held that the high courts in exercise of their original civil jurisdiction, are not bound by the provisions contained in sections 16, 17 and 20 of the CPC and section 120 expressly excludes the application of these provisions to High Courts. Therefore, the provision contained in clause 12 of its Letters Patent would govern the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction in Bombay High Court.

[s 121.2] "Annulled or altered" 1491

[s 121.1] "Body of this code"

The expression "body of this Code" means the sections in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC) and not the rules in the First Schedule. The only thing that the section does is to give to these rules, the effect as if they were enacted in the body of the CPC, until, of course, they are annulled or altered.[1]

[s 121.2] "Annulled or altered"

As to the annulment and alterations of rules, see section 124.

[s 122.1] Amendments in the section

The words, "High Courts, constituted by His Majesty by Letters Patent and the Chief Court of Oudh" were replaced by the words, "Courts which are High Courts for the purposes of the Government of India Act, 1935" by the Indian Independence (Adaptation of Central Acts and Ordinances) Order, 1948. The latter expression was again replaced by the words "High Courts for Part A States" by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The words "and Part B States" were added by section 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1951.

The words "not being the court of a Judicial Commissioner" were substituted for the words "for Part A States and Part B States" by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1956.

Rules made under this section by the various high courts are set out in appendices at the end of this work.

[s 122.2] Section 122 and Section 129

In Shevaram Thadaram v Indian Oil Corp Ltd,[5] the High Court of Bombay has observed that the high court derives power to frame rules in regard to its original civil jurisdiction, both under section 122 and section 129 and that it is not correct to say that because section 129 gives such a power specifically, it cannot frame rules under section 122, in regard to its original civil jurisdiction. The powers under these two sections overlap to a certain extent. But if the high court were to make rules under section 122, in regard to its original civil jurisdiction, those rules cannot be inconsistent with the provisions in the body of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC). On the other hand, if it were to make rules in exercise of its power under section 129, such rules can be inconsistent with the body of the CPC but not inconsistent with the Letters Patent or any other law establishing the High Court in question.

In Ganpat Giri v Second Additional District Judge, Ballia,[6] the question considered was with regard to the overriding provision contained in section 97(1) of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act of 1976. The said provision reads thus:

> Any amendment made, or any provision inserted in the principal Act by a State Legislature or a High Court before the commencement of this Act shall except in so far as such amendment or provision is consistent with the provisions of the principal Act as amended by this Act, stand repealed.

It is obvious that what was done by section 97(1) of the Amending Act was to sweep away amendments made or provisions inserted in the principal Act by the state legislature, or the high court in exercise of its delegated powers of legislation, and to declare that all such amendments inconsistent with the provisions of the CPC would stand repealed. Section 129 is neither an amendment made by the state legislature, nor by the high court, and as such, it does not get overridden by section 97(1) of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976. Though, both the sections, sections 122 and 129 were noticed in Ganpat Giri's case,[7] it was not held that the impact of section 129 was, in any way, watered down by section 122. The following observations in para 5 of the judgment were quoted by Supreme Court in its subsequent decision.[8]

> The object of Section 97 of the Amending Act appears to be that on and after February 1, 1977 throughout India wherever the Code was in force there should be same procedural law in operation in all the civil courts subject of course to any future local amendment that may be made either by the State Legislature or by the High Court, as the case may be, in accordance with law. Until such amendment is made the Code as amended by the Amending Act alone should govern the procedure in civil courts which are governed by the Code. We are emphasizing this in view of the decision of the Allahabad High Court which is now under appeal before us.

Section 97 of the Amending Act does not, in any way, affect the special hierarchical status given to the proceedings before the chartered high courts on its original side. It was merely intended to standardise and make uniform the law as to civil procedure in other civil courts.[9]

[s 122.3] Section 122 and Article 254 — Assent of President Not Necessary

It is not a legislative power that is exercised by the high court under section 122 of the CPC. The high court is given power under section 122 by the Parliament itself to suitably amend the provision to the First Schedule. The only requirement that is necessary is that it should be investigated by a rule committee approved by the high court and sanctioned by the government. It is not an Act requiring the consent of the governor for coming into operation. It can be said to be a delegated power given to the high court.[10]

[s 122.4] Rules To Be Made by High Court

Sections 122–28, excepting section 125, provide for rules to be made by the high courts for regulating their own procedure and the procedure of the civil courts subject to their superintendence. The sections in the CPC which constitute its body are jurisdictional provisions giving substantive rights which can only be withdrawn or altered by the Legislature. This section, therefore, does not authorise, as is made clear by section 128, the high courts to make rules which are inconsistent with the body of the CPC.[11] But the section does authorise the high courts to make rules regulating their procedure as also the procedure of the civil courts subject to their superintendence and also by such rules to annul, alter or add to all or any of the rules in the First Schedule. These rules are, of course subject to the previous approval of the authorities mentioned in section 126. The Allahabad High Court has held that this power is not confined to rules strictly of the nature of procedure, but extends to each and every rule in the First Schedule.[12] Under section 122, the High Courts can make rules regulating their own procedure. The preamble to the Madras High Court Original Side Rules specifically states, that the rules are framed by virtue of the CPC and other enactments, set out in the Annexure.

In that sense, the modifications contained in the original side rules can be treated as part of the CPC.[13]

To regulate the filing of petitions by societies/unions and for payment of court fee, the Registrar General of the Chhattisgarh High Court issued a Circular which, inter alia, directed that petitions filed by several persons having similar but separate and distinct interest in the subject-matter of controversy involving common questions of law and facts may file a common petition but each petitioner shall pay a separate court fee. In a writ petition, the high court directed all members of the society to be impleaded as parties and further directed payment of necessary Court-fee by every member. It was held by the high court that whenever in a given case, the members of the society/union have jural-relationship having common, equal and equitable rights, for protection of such rights they have a common interest and cause, if they approach this Court, all of them need not be impleaded except the authorised person and they need not pay separate Court-fee as well.[14]

Rule 208 of the Calcutta High Court Civil Rules and Orders (1935) provides for the decree-holder to seek police help where there is "anticipated" or actual resistance to execution. It was held by the Calcutta High Court that Rule 208 is essentially different from the provisions of rule 97 of O XXI of the CPC. Procedural law under O XXI, rule 97 of the CPC cannot be used to obstruct a valid decree being put into execution, by reason of resistance of persons who cannot even put forward a bona fide claim of not being bound by the decree. It was further held that rule 208 has been specifically provided to enable the court to pass necessary orders for police help for execution of a decree even where resistance to execution was merely "anticipated".[15]

A Division Bench of the Rajasthan High Court interpreted rule 134(1) of the Rules of the High Court of Rajasthan, 1952 in order to regulate its procedure in respect of its supervisory jurisdiction under Article 227 of the Constitution and the interpretation is of far reaching consequence. It was held that the intra-court appeal, as per sub-rule (1) of rule 134 of the Rajasthan High Court Rules (1952) (as amended by Notification dated 28 June 2005) is not maintainable against any order passed by the high court (Single Judge) in supervisory jurisdiction under Article 227 of the Constitution.[16] It was observed by the Division Bench in the above case as follows:

> Section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended with object to reduce the delay in the proceedings before Civil Court and that amendment in Section 115 narrowed the High Court's jurisdiction in entertaining revision petition, therefore, only the orders passed by the subordinate courts are now challenged in writ jurisdiction of the High Court. Therefore, also in fact the High Court exercises its revisional or supervisory jurisdiction only when any order of subordinate court is challenged in writ jurisdiction. Any other interpretation resulting into providing further appeal against the order passed by the High Court in such matters will frustrate the purpose for which the Code of Civil Procedure was amended.[17]

Repelling the contention of the appellant in the above case that intra-court appeal against any order passed by the single Judge of the high court is provided under Rule 8-B of the high court of Judicature for Rajasthan Case Flow Management Rules, 2006, it was further held by the Division Bench that the language of rule 8-B is clear and it nowhere provides that any

[s 122.5] Need for framing rules

The Supreme Court had once observed that even for the civil courts in the Union Territory of Delhi, no rules of practice have been framed by the high court. It is a sad state of affairs that the High Court of Delhi has not given its thought in this regard. It is high time that the high court framed appropriate rules of practice to be observed by all the courts in the territory subordinate to it. The registrar is directed to send copies of this judgment to the concerned department of the Central Government as well as the High Court of Delhi so that appropriate rules may be made by them respectively with regard to the proceedings under the Delhi Rent Control Act, 1958 and the proceedings in the regular civil courts. The high court is requested to give its immediate attention to this matter and also cause periodic inspection of the courts subordinate to it and issue such circulars as may be necessary in order to plug the loopholes then and there.[19] In a Karnataka case, the notification was issued by the registrar as per orders issued by the Chief Justice of the high court providing for posting of public interest litigation, only before the division bench dealing with a particular subject as per sitting list is legal and not contrary to provisions under the Karnataka High Court Act, Rules, or the Constitution of India.[20]

[s 122.6] Rules in the First Schedule

Section 122 enables the high court to make, add or alter all or any of the rules in the First Schedule. It does not enable the High Court to amend any other law. Thus, if as a matter of fact, under section 60 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, a right is given for depositing the amount before confirmation of the sale, that right cannot be taken away by the amendment to O XXXIV. Thus, there is no merit in the contention regarding the challenge of constitutional validity of O XXXIV which was substituted by notification in the Kerala Code.[21]

There is certain difference in the provisions of O XXXIV enacted by the High Court of Kerala, they would affect the litigants in Kerala merely because the CPC prescribes two decrees; preliminary decree and final decree, whereas, the Kerala Code prescribes only one decree, any prejudice will be caused to the party by having one decree or two decrees. As far as the question of redemption of mortgage or sale is concerned, if the amounts are determined as per the mortgage, then there should not be any prejudice to the party.[22]

Rules made under section 122 may alter and annul the rules in the First Schedule. The Allahabad High Court had framed rules to be added to the rules in O XXI. rule 122 of these rules was held to be inconsistent with the First Schedule, O XXI, rule 23 which, by inadvertence, was not altered. It was held, however, that the effect was to alter rule 43 by implication.[23]

23. Shakir Hasain v Chandu Lal, AIR 1931 All 567 : (1932) 54 All 263.

The form prescribed under O XXXIV, rule 5, by the Calcutta High Court, requires notice to parties affected before a final decree is passed, and when an ex parte decree was passed without such notice, it was held that the judgment-debtor was entitled to apply to set it aside under O IX, rule 13, as the form becomes part of the CPC under this section.[24] The right to deposit the amount due to the mortgagee and avert the sale of mortgage property is conferred on a mortgagor-judgment-debtor under scheme under O XXXIV as substituted in Kerala (Kerala court) only prior to the sale itself and not subsequent to the sale. It can not be said that in term of section 122 of the CPC, the scheme envisaged by the Kerala Code could not be adopted in the state.[25] In a Bihar case, under the Bihar Sugar Undertakings (Acquisition) Act, 1976, rules were not framed for four years. The high court issued mandamus to make and publish rules within six months.[26] In so far as the Delhi Rent Control Act, 1958 is concerned, section 56 enables the Central Government to make rules. Rule 23 of rules framed under the Act, provides that the controller and the Rent Control Tribunal are, as far as possible, to be guided by the provisions contained in the CPC. It is absolutely necessary for the controller and the Rent Control Tribunal to see that the provisions of the statute, rules and the CPC are strictly complied with in all the proceedings before them.

[s 122.7] Rules and limitation

None of the courts empowered under this section to frame rules has power, by any rule, which it may make to alter the period of limitation prescribed by the Limitation Act, 1963.[27]

It has been held that a rule of the high court specifying the period within which an application to it should be made relates to a matter of procedure and is not ultra vires. Thus, rule 41A(2) of the Madras High Court Rules which prescribes a period of 90 days for presentation of civil revision petition has been held to be valid.[28] The question which was before the full bench for consideration was whether the period of 90 days mentioned in rule 44 of the rules of the Rules of the High Court of Kerala, 1971, be treated as prescription for the period of limitation in the matter of filing of revision petition under section 20 of Kerala Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Act, 1965. It was held, if rule 22 has to be taken as a provision prescribing period of limitation, it would certainly take the colour of substantive law. A reading of section 125 would clearly show that the power given to the high court thereunder is only for making rules regarding procedural matters. Therefore, the provisions contained under rule 44 cannot be taken as one providing a period of limitation in the matter of filing revision petition under section 20 of the Act. More so, while the legislature has specifically made the provision for limitation in the filing appeal under section 18 of the Act, no such period is prescribed under section 20.[29]

It should be noted that there is no article in the Limitation Act, 1963, providing any period of limitation for a revision petition. It has also been held that rules extending section 5 of the Limitation Act, 1963 to applications under O IX, rule 9 or O IX, rule 13, are ultra vires.[30] That section applies on its own terms to any other application to which it might be made applicable by or under any enactment.

An appellant is entitled as of right under section 12 of the Limitation Act, 1963, to exclude the time requisite for obtaining copies of the decree or order appealed from and of the judgment on which such decree may be or is founded, this right is not affected by any rules made by any high court that such copies need not accompany the memorandum of appeal.[31]

The application of section 5 of the Limitation Act, 1963 to proceedings arising under O XXI of the Code has been subject of judicial interpretation is several cases. In Ayappa Naicker's case,[32] it was observed as follows:

> Therefore having regard to the above language, it was permissible to have such a provision wherein the position is clearly changed at present. Section 5 of the present Limitation Act, 1963, states that any appeal or any application under any of the provisions of Order 21, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, may be admitted after the prescribed period if the appellant or the applicant satisfies the Court that he had sufficient cause for not preferring the appeal or making the application within such period. The Explanation is omitted as unnecessary. Therefore, with reference to applications under Order 21, Civil Procedure Code, there is the statutory bar in applying section 5 of the Limitation Act. It may also be relevant to note section 32 of the Limitation Act before it was repealed by Central Act LVI of 1974. It is stated under that section that the Indian Limitation Act, 1908 is hereby repealed. Therefore, after 1st January, 1964, sub-rule (4) of rule 105 of Order 21, Civil Procedure, could no longer be applied, because of the express language of section 5 of the Limitation Act. That is why the Central Code in rule 106 of Order 21, Civil Procedure Code, did not make any reference to the same saying that section 5 of the Limitation Act would be applicable. In view of this, the order of the Court below ought to be upheld.

It was further held in the above case as follows:

> The question of invoking inherent powers under section 151, Civil Procedure Code, does not arise in this case. That is because of the specific provision contained under rule 106 of Order 21, Civil Procedure Code. If, therefore, there is repugnancy between the Central Code, under rule 106, and the Madras Amendment under sub-rule (4) of rule 105 of Order 21, it is section 97 of the Civil Procedure Code, in relation to repeal and savings that would apply. That says that any amendment made, or any provision inserted in the principal Act by a State Legislature or a High Court before the commencement of this Act shall except in so far as such amendment or provision is consistent with the provisions of the principal Act, as amended by this Act, stand repealed.[33]

Approving the above view of the high court, the Supreme Court, in relation to a case from Kerala, observed as follows:

> 13. It is also not in dispute that the Kerala amendment providing for application of Section 5 of the Limitation Act in Order XXI, Rule 105 of the Code became inapplicable after coming into force of the Limitation Act, 1963, (Act LVI of 1964).
>
> 14. It is also trite that the civil court in absence of any express power cannot condone the delay. For the purpose of condonation of delay in absence of applicability of the provisions of Section 5 of the Limitation Act, the court cannot invoke its inherent power.
>
> 16. An application under section 5 of the Limitation Act is not maintainable in a proceeding arising under Order XXI of the Code. Application of the said provision has, thus, expressly been excluded in a proceeding under Order XXI of the Code. In that view of > the matter, even an application under Section 5 of the Limitation Act was not maintainable. A fortiori for the said purpose, inherent power of the court cannot be invoked.[34]

However, a Full Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in the undernoted case,[35] held that under section 122 of the code, the high court added sub-rule (4) after sub-rule (3) of rule 106 of O XXI of the CPC which lays down that the provisions of section 5 of the Limitation Act shall apply to all applications under sub-rule (3). The Full Bench decision distinguished the decision of the Supreme Court in Damodaran Pillai's case (supra) on the ground that the decision of the Supreme Court was with respect to a case from Kerala where there was no amendment to O XXI, rule 106 as is the case in the State of Andhra Pradesh. Explaining the rule making powers of the high court under section 122 of the Code for regulating its own procedure and the procedure in civil courts under the superintendence of the said high court, VVS Rao, J, speaking for the Bench, observed as follows:

> 12. A reading of Section 122 of CPC, leaves no doubt that in exercise of that power the High Court can even annul, alter or add Rules in the First Schedule. To our mind - at least in the field of civil judicial procedure; power conferred on High Court under Section 122 of CPC is greater than the power to amend provisions of CPC. Historically it is recognized that High Court of a State shall exercise powers of supervision and superintendence over all the courts and Tribunals subordinate to it. This power has been recognized by Constitution of India by enacting Articles 225 and 227. Under Article 227(2)(b) power is conferred on High Court to make and issue general rules and prescribe forms for regulating the practice and proceedings of subordinate courts. Therefore, the power conferred on High Court to annul, alter or add the Rules in First Schedule to CPC is not an ordinary delegated power. It is the power referable to the power conferred on the High Court by Constitution itself. In exercise of such power, it may be reiterated, High Court can even annul any of the Rules in First Schedule or add or alter any such Rules. Section 122 of CPC, which remained as it, without any substantial amendments since 1908 has been subject matter of interpretation by various High Courts in India. In all these, it is categorically held that power of High Court under Section 122 to annul, alter or add any of the Rules in First Schedule is absolute power and that even if such a Rule is in conflict with previous existing rule, it must be by implication deemed to have been annulled or/and altered by new rule.

[s 122.8] Rules and their Validity

A rule extending the provisions of O XXXVII of the CPC to suits in city civil court has been held to be ultra vires.[36] The court has its discretion under rule 227 of Bombay High Court (Original Side) Rules, 1957, as to whether to permit the summons for judgment to be withdrawn and enable the plaintiff to take out fresh summons for judgment after amending the plaint or to grant unconditional leave.[37] As also rule 21 of the Madras High Court Appellate Side Rules, 1965 prescribing the form of the vakalat to be filed and the stamp payable thereon.[38] It has been held that the addition made by the Bombay High Court to the Explanation to O XXXIII, rule 1, that in determining whether an applicant to sue in forma pauperis is possessed of sufficient means, the subject matter of the suit must be excluded, is ultra vires of section 122 as its purpose is not to regulate its own procedure or the procedure of civil courts subject to its superintendence.[39] But the same high court has held that neither rules 142–148A of the Ahmedabad City Civil Court Rules, 1961 nor the amendment of O XXXVII, rules 1 and 2 by the Bombay High Court are inconsistent with section 27 of the CPC and are not therefore ultra vires the rule-making power of the high court under this section.[40] The rules framed by the Nagpur High Court operate after the reorganisation of states within the area previously subject to the jurisdiction of that court, and have no application to other territories forming part of Madhya Pradesh.[41] Clause (b) to proviso to O XXI, rule 90 framed by the Allahabad High Court, requiring the applicant to deposit costs or give security for costs, is not in excess of the rule-making power under this section, as it relates to a matter of procedure.[42] The second proviso to O XXXIX, rule 1, as amended by the Patna High Court providing that an injunction shall not be granted to restrain a sale or confirmation of a sale; or to restrain delivery of possession where the applicant cannot lawfully prefer a claim to the property or an objection to its attachment or sale, before the executing court, is within the rule-making power under this section.[43]

The Full Bench of the Bombay High Court has held that for the purpose of regulating civil proceedings brought before it, the high court is empowered, under clause 37 of the Letters Patent, to make rules and orders provided that the court has to be guided in making such rules and orders as far as possible by the provisions of the CPC. The CPC provides section 122 for the power of the high courts (not being courts of a judicial commissioner) to make rules regulating their own procedure and even to annul, alter or add to all or any of the rules of the First Schedule of the CPC. Even the high courts which are courts of a judicial commissioner are empowered to make rules under section 128 so as to provide matters including procedure in suits and also "delegation to any Registrar, Prothonotary or Master or other official of the Court of any judicial, quasi-judicial and non-judicial duties".[44]

[s 122.9] Plaintiff represented through General Power of Attorney

The requirement is that when General Power of Attorney-holder is representing the party, the judge is required to record in writing that he is permitted to appear and act on behalf of the party. In the instant case, the procedure prescribed under rule 32 of Civil Rules of Practice has been followed.

When a person files a suit on behalf of the party, as a General Power of Attorney-holder, he enters into the shoes of that party, and except to the extent of personal knowledge, he is entitled to depose on other facts. In the instant case, what was relied upon by the plaintiffs is entirely documentary evidence, which are public documents and no personal knowledge was required to be pressed into service to establish the case of plaintiff.

Under these circumstances, no presumption adverse to the interests of plaintiffs can be drawn.[45]

[s 122.10] First hearing of suit—meaning

The definition in rule 3(6) of the Civil Rules of Practice defines "first hearing" thus:

> 'First hearing' includes the hearing of a suit for settlement of issues, and any adjournment thereof.

The word "first hearing" appears in the CPC in several places. Under O X, the court has the power to ascertain whether the allegations in the pleadings are admitted or denied at the first hearing of the suit. The oral examination of parties to elucidate matters in controversy is also permissible at the first hearing of the suit under O X, rule 2, CPC. Order XIII, rule 1, before the 1976 amendment, had dealt with the production of documentary evidence at first hearing. Since this led to some controversy, the words "first hearing" in the heading of O XIII, rule 1. were replaced by the words "at or before the settlement of the issues" and rule 1 was amended by replacing the words "at first hearing of the suit" with "at or before the settlement of the issues". Order XIV, Code of CPC again contains the words "at the first hearing". Order XIV, rule 1(5), deals with settlement of issues and this again uses the words "at the first hearing of the suit". The court frames the issues for deciding the case right after examination under O X, rule 2, CPC, and hearing the parties or other pleaders and after reading the plaint and written statement at the first hearing of the suit. O XIV, rule 6, provides that the court need not frame and record issues where the defendant at the first hearing of the suit makes no defence. Therefore, the first hearing of the suit obviously extends up to the point issues are framed. If the defendant is set ex parte, the court does not frame or record issues. That is why the definition of "first hearing of the suit" is an inclusive definition. Under O XIV, the court is empowered to pronounce judgment at the first hearing of the suit if it appears that the parties are not at issue. In fact, the heading of O XV itself reads thus: "Disposal of the suit at the first hearing". Then, sub-rule (3) of O XV deals with the manner in which suit shall be disposed where parties are at issue. The rule says that where issues have been framed, since parties are at issue, the court can still pronounce judgments, if, without further argument or evidence than the parties can at once adduce is required, the court may still proceed to determine such issues and pronounce judgments. If not, rule 2 requires the court to postpone the further hearing of the suit and thereafter, fix a date for production of further evidence or for further arguments as the case requires. The court is empowered to adopt the procedure under sub-rule (1) of rule 3 or sub-rule (2) irrespective of whether summons has been issued for the settlement of issues only or for the final disposal of the suit. But, if the summons has been issued for final disposal of the suit, then rule 4 provides that the court, in the absence of either party producing evidence on which he seeks to rely, may pronounce judgments or may after framing and recording issues, adjourn the suit for production of such evidence that is necessary for decision on those issues. Therefore, from this, it is clear that the first hearing of the suit can be any of the dates up to the date on which issues are actually framed and hence Civil Rules of Practice, rule 3(6) defines "first hearing" to include the date on which the suit is posed for hearing for settlement of issues at any adjourned date. So, the words "first hearing of the suit" may be extended to any date until the issues are actually settled.

If the words "first hearing of the suit" is so understood, then under section 12(2) of the Tamil Nadu Court-fees and Suits Valuation Act, 1955, the defendant can plead either by written statement or otherwise the defence relating to improper valuation of suit or insufficiency of court fee before the first hearing of the suit. If the issues have been settled, the first stage before which the defendant could have raised his objection has passed.[46]

[s 122.11] Filing of Affidavit

Since rule 59 of the Andhra Pradesh Civil Rule of Practice, 1990 does not mandate that the application has to be supported by the affidavit of the concerned petitioner and since there is no provision in the rules which mandates that the applications filed without the affidavit sworn to by the party concerned should not be entertained, the fact that the respondent did not swear the affidavit in support of the application is not of any consequence.[47]

There is no legal bar in giving the affidavit by the pleader's clerk himself in support of the petition filed in this case seeking to set aside the ex parte decree. There is no legal bar, as discussed above, to give the affidavit either by the counsel or by his clerk or by some third party, on behalf of the party, who is filing the petition. Who should give the affidavit in support of a particular interlocutory application, of course, depends upon the facts peculiar in each case. Therefore the observation of the court below that the affidavit has not been filed by the party himself and in consequence thereof, the petition should fail, cannot, therefore, legally be sustained.[48]

A combined reading of the rules 59, 54 and 48 of Civil Rules of Practice prescribed by the high court with the previous approval of the Governor of Andhra Pradesh, shows that the interlocutory application need not necessarily be signed by the party himself. It can either be signed by the party himself or his counsel. Every interlocutory application shall be accompanied by an affidavit, which affidavit should contain the statement of facts made on information or belief of the deponent and the source or ground of such information or belief. Nowhere has it been mentioned that the affidavit filed in support of the petition shall be given by the party himself. Anybody who is conversant with the statement of facts which are necessary to be furnished for maintaining an interlocutory application can therefore give the affidavit.[49]

> The practice of advocate filing his affidavit in a petition filed under Order 9, Rule 9 CPC is totally wrong and illegal. Such practice has to be deprecated. Order 9, Rule 9 or Order 9, Rule 13, CPC contemplates that the application has to be filed by the party concerned only and not by the counsel. The counsel only is permitted to represent his client, he cannot step into the shoes of a client. Admittedly this order passed by the learned judge is totally wrong and illegal. But any way this practice is prevalent in the State of Andhra Pradesh. Therefore, as an exception this time the order is sustained. All concerned should note the law laid down by this Court. Under these circumstances only this Court does not wish to interfere with the said order.[50]

With reference to Andhra Pradesh Civil Rules of Practice, 1990, rules 59, 54, 48 in interlocutory applications, affidavit, can be signed either by party himself or by an advocate or anybody, including the clerk of the advocate, who is conversant with statement of facts, which are necessary to be furnished for maintaining interlocutory application.[51]

The Kerala High Court has held that the language of rule 27(1) of the Civil Rules of Practice does not admit of any doubt that the pleader accepting the vakalat is not entitled to attest the vakalat despite him personally knowing the executant and making an endorsement regarding the same on the vakalat. It was further hold that the corresponding rule in the Criminal Rules of Practice, which permit the pleader accepting vakalat to attest the same, is irrelevant.[52]

[s 122.12] Subsistence Allowance and Travelling Allowance to Witness

About payment of witness of subsistence allowance and travel allowance the provisions of law designed in the civil rules of practice relating to payment of witness is far from satisfactory and requires a thorough review.[53]

[s 122.13] Appeal Against Order of Registrar — Delhi High Court Rules

Appeal would lie under rule 4 of the Delhi High Court (Original Side) Rules, 1967 against any order made by the registrar under rule 3, irrespective of fact whether any appeal has been provided under CPC or the Delhi High Court Act, 1966.[54]

[s 122.14] Death of party

The judgment should contain full particulars of the parties and decree has to follow the judgment. In case name of a deceased party (originally impleaded) is washed off while substituting legal representatives, it is likely to mislead as it shall not be possible in future to ascertain extent of rights to be determined with respect to the estate of a deceased party. When a person dies, right of substitution is not on the basis of succession, but a person, who is competent to represent the estate of a deceased party and has no interest adverse to the deceased's estate will be permitted to be substituted as his legal representative.

To ensure to keep the record straight and to avoid misconception and/or ambiguity in future; statutory provisions specifically provide that when a party to a suit/proceeding dies, a note be made to that effect against said party and "legal representatives" be brought on record as per rule 37, General Rules (Civil) and Allahabad High Court Rules.

It, therefore, naturally follows that in an application for substitution of legal representatives, prayer for deletion/striking off/or washing off/to erase/removal of the name of "deceased party" on record, is misconceived, untenable and not approved in law, prayer to the above effect in the amendment application for substitution of legal representatives is totally misconceived and cannot be legally allowed. It is not permissible in law to erase the name of original deceased party and to do the contrary is also being uncalled for.

Once party is impleaded and/or brought on record, proceedings started must be concluded with their names and continue till perpetuity. In the matter of death of any such party, in case of substitution of legal representative "on an application made in that behalf, court shall cause legal representative of the deceased, plaintiff/defendant to be made a party to proceed with the suit" "and if legal representatives are not to be substituted, then a note shall be made against a party of his death, but in no case the name of the deceased party shall be deleted or removed or struck-off".[55]

In its extension to the State of Sikkim omit Section 123.

[s 123.2] Amendments to the Section

The Amendment Act, 1976 leaves sub-sections 1 and 2 of the section intact. Under sub-section 3 of the section, as it stood before the amendment, the members of the rules committee were appointed by the chief justice or the chief judge as the case may be. There was also a proviso to sub-section 3 which provided that if the Chief Justice or the Chief Judge were elected to be a member of the committee, the number of other judges appointed to be the members, should be two and the chief justice or the chief judge should be the president of the committee. In view of the amendment that the members of the committee shall be appointed by the high court and not by the chief justice or the chief judge, there can no longer be any possibility of the chief justice or the chief judge electing to be a member and then acting as the president of the committee. In consonance with the amendment of sub-section 3, the proviso thereto is now omitted. Since it will be the high court and not the chief justice who is the appointing authority the words "Chief Justice" or "Chief Judge" appearing in sub-sections 4 and 5 are replaced by the words "High Court".

[S 124] Committee to report to High Court.—Every Rule Committee shall make a report to the High Court established at the town at which it is constituted on any proposal to annul, alter or add to the rules in the First Schedule or to make new rules; and before making any rules under section 122 of the High Court shall take such report into consideration.

[s 125.1] Rules Should not be Inconsistent..... 1505
[s 125.2] Rules for Referring Matter to Lok Adalat, Arbitration..... 1505

[s 125.1] Rules Should not be Inconsistent

Rules under this section should not be inconsistent with the provisions in the body of this CPC.[73]

[s 125.2] Rules for Referring Matter to Lok Adalat, Arbitration

One of the modes to which the dispute can be referred is arbitration. Section 89(2) provides that where a dispute has been referred for arbitration or conciliation, the provisions of the Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996 (Arbitration Act) shall apply as if the proceedings for arbitration or conciliation were referred for settlement under the provisions of 1996 Act. Section 8 of the Arbitration Act deals with the power to refer parties to arbitration where there is arbitration agreement.[74] The Arbitration Act, however, does not contemplate a situation as in section 89 of the CPC where the court asks the parties to choose one or other ADRs including arbitration and the parties choose arbitration as their option. Of course, the parties have to agree for arbitration. Section 82 of the Arbitration Act enables the high court to make rules consistent with this Act as to all proceedings before the court under the Arbitration Act. Section 84 enables the Central Government to make rules for carrying out the provisions of the Act. The procedure for option to arbitration among four ADRs is not contemplated by the Arbitration Act, and, therefore, section 82 or section 84 has no applicability where parties agree to go for arbitration under section 89 of the CPC. For the purposes of section 89 and O X, rules 1A, 1B and 1C, the relevant sections in Pt X of the CPC enable the high court to frame rules. If reference is made to arbitration under section 89 of the CPC, Arbitration Act would apply only from the stage after reference and not before the stage of reference when options under section 89 are given by the court and chosen by the parties. On the same analogy, the Arbitration Act in relation to conciliation would apply only after the stage of reference to conciliation. The Arbitration Act does not deal with a situation where after a suit is filed, the court requires a party to choose one or other ADRs including conciliation. Thus, for conciliation also, rules can be made under Pt X of the CPC for purposes of procedure for opting for "conciliation" and up to the stage of reference to conciliation. Thus, there is no impediment in the ADR rules being framed in relation to civil court as contemplated in section 89 upto the stage of reference to ADR. The Arbitration Act comes into play only after the stage of reference, up to the award. Applying the same analogy, the Legal Services Authority Act, 1987 or the rules framed thereunder by the state governments cannot act as impediment in the high court making rules under Pt X of the CPC covering the manner in which option to Lok Adalat can be made being one of the modes provided in section 89. The Legal Services Authority Act, 1987 also does not deal with the aspect of exercising option to one of the four ADR methods mentioned in section 89. Section 89 makes applicable the Arbitration Act and the Legal Services Authority Act, 1987 from the stage after exercise of options and making of reference.

A doubt was expressed about the applicability of ADR rules for dispute arising under the Family Courts Act, 1984 since that Act also contemplates rules to be made. It is, however, to be borne in mind that the Family Courts Act, 1984 applies the CPC for all proceedings before it. In this view, ADR rules made under the CPC can be applied to supplement the rules made under the Family Courts Act, 1984 and provide for ADR in so far as conciliation/mediation is concerned.[75]

[76][[S 126] Rules to be subject to approval.—Rules made under the foregoing provisions shall be subject to the previous approval of the Government of the [77]State in which the Court whose procedure the rules regulate is situate or, if that Court is not situate in any [74]State, to the previous approval of [78][Central Government].]

[s 129.1] Changes in the section

The words "not being the court of a Judicial Commissioner" were substituted for the words "for a Part A State or a Part B State".

[s 129.2] Effect of 1976 Amending Act

Section 97(1) of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976 (Amending Act, 1976) reads thus:

> Any amendment made, or any provision inserted in the principal Act by State Legislature or a High Court before the commencement of this Act shall except insofar as such amendment or provision is consistent with the provisions of the principal Act as amended by this Act, stand repealed.

It is obvious that what was done by section 97(1) of the Amending Act, 1976 was to sweep away amendments made or provisions inserted in the principal Act by the state legislature, or the high court in exercise of its delegated powers of legislation, and to declare that all such amendments inconsistent with the provisions of the CPC would stand repealed. Section 129 is neither an amendment made by the state legislature, nor by the high court, and as such, it does not get overridden by section 97(1) of the Amending Act, 1976.[84]

> ... The object of Section 97 of the Amending Act appears to be that on and after February 1, 1977 throughout India wherever the Code was in force there should be same procedural law in operation in all the civil courts subject of course to any future local amendment that may be made either by the State legislature or by the High Court, as the case may be, in accordance with law. Until such amendment is made the Code as amended by the Amending Act alone should govern the procedure in civil courts which are governed by the Code. We are emphasising this in view of the decision of the Allahabad High Court which is now under appeal before us.[85]

Section 97 of the Amending Act, 1976, does not, in any way, affect the special hierarchical status given to the proceedings before the chartered high courts on its original side. It was merely intended to standardise and make uniform the law as to civil procedure in other civil courts.[86]

[s 129.4] Non-obstante clause

Section 129 begins with a non-obstante clause and seems to suggest something to the contrary. At least as far as chartered high courts are concerned, section 129 seems to invest them with the power to make rules with regard to the regulation of their own procedure, which may be inconsistent with the CPC itself, as long as such rules are consistent with the Letters Patent establishing the high courts. The section also ends with the words: "nothing herein contained shall affect the validity of any such rules in force at the commencement of this Code".[87]

Taking into account the extrinsic evidence, i.e., the historical circumstances in which the precursor of section 129 was introduced into the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 by a specific amendment made in 1895, the non-obstante clause used in section 129 is not merely declaratory, but indicative of Parliament's intention to prevent the application of the CPC in respect of civil proceedings on the original side of the high courts.[88]

[s 129.5] Purpose

Far from doing away with the Letters Patent, the Amending Act of 2002 has left unscathed the provisions of section 129 and what follows therefrom.[89]

The purpose of retaining section 129 in the present form is exactly the purpose for which it was inserted, in the first place, in the Code of Civil Procedure 1882 by Amending Act No 13 of 1895, namely, "to recognise the practical expediency of leaving such high courts some latitude in the direction of adapting the provisions of the ordinary law to meet their requirements", and further, "it had been found by experience that these provisions were not in all respects convenient in the case of original proceedings in those Courts". The amendment, therefore, became necessary "to bring the Code into perfect harmony with the provisions of the Letters Patent and to enable the High Courts referred to regulate the exercise of their original civil jurisdiction accordingly".[90]

[s 129.6] Rules as to Original Civil Procedure of High Courts

Rules made under section 122 must not be inconsistent with the provisions in the body of CPC. Under section 129, any high court may make rules to regulate its own procedure in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction. Such rules may not be consistent with the provisions in the body of the CPC, but they must not be inconsistent with the laws establishing it (Letter Patent or other law establishing the high court in question).[91]

The petition does not mention the names of the persons who attested the Will. However, as required by rule 374 of the Bombay High Court (Original Side) Rules 1980, the plaintiff has filed the original Will and annexed a copy thereof to the petition which mentions the names of two attesting witnesses. But that does not satisfy the requirement of proper pleadings regarding the Will having been duly attested. It is not enough to aver in the petition that Will was duly executed but it must be averred specifically that the Will was duly executed. Execution of document and attestation thereof are two different things. Execution of a document consists of signing a document written of, read over and understood. It does not consist of merely signing a paper or document which are not required to be attested, but only those documents which law requires, are required to be attested by witnesses, for example, a mortgage deed and a Will. These documents cannot merely be executed but they necessarily have to be attested by witnesses. Attestation means the act of witnessing the executant signing the document and subscribing the name of witnesses in testimony of such fact. By attestation, it is meant that signing of the document to signify the attestor and his witness to the execution of the document.[92]

Where a rule has been made by a high court under this section, the provisions of the CPC do not apply. Thus, the rules of the Calcutta High Court contain provisions for default of payment by an auction-purchaser at a sale under a mortgage decree on the original side of the high court and, therefore, O XXI, rule 86 does not apply to such sales.[93] But as the Calcutta rules contain no provision for setting aside a sale on deposit, the provisions of O XXI, rule 89 do apply.[94] Likewise O IX, rule 5 is applicable to suits instituted on the original side of the High Court of Calcutta, as there is nothing in the rules framed by the high court which is repugnant to it, and therefore where the summons was returned unserved and the plaintiff failed to apply for fresh summons within three months, the suit was dismissed.[95] Except for the objection taken that the plaint had not been accompanied by an affidavit in support of the pleadings, it is nobody's case that the plaint had not been otherwise verified in keeping with the unamended provisions of the CPC and rule 1 of Chapter VII of the Original Side Rules. In fact, as has been submitted at the Bar, the plaint was accepted, after due scrutiny and duly registered and only during the hearing of the appeal was such an objection raised.

In a case from Himachal Pradesh, It was held that where the defendant did not file written statement even during the extended time allowed by the court, it would not mean that the defendant has lost his right to file the written statement after ninety days of the service of summons as provided under rule 1 of O VIII of the CPC, because O VIII, rule 1 is not applicable in suits filed in the Original side of High Court of Himachal Pradesh. Proceedings on Original side of high court shall be governed by Original Side Rules, 1997 even if one or more rules are inconsistent with the provisions of the CPC.[96]

In a case under the Bombay High Court (Original Side) Rules, 1980, it has been held by the Supreme Court that where the respondent was a caveator in the beginning but later became a party to the suit, she was certainly an interested person in the suit. As such she would be entitled to certified copy of miscellaneous application which enacted out of the said suit, containing allegations of perjury against her adversary, the appellant. But by mere grant of certified copy, the respondent would not be entitled to participate in the perjury application. It was for the court to decide the issue as to whether the respondent can join the said proceedings.[97]

Even though the amended provisions of O VI are attracted in the matter of filing of plaints in the original side of the Calcutta High Court on account of the reference made to O VI and rule 1 of Chapter VII of the Original Side Rules, non-compliance thereof at the initial stage did not render the suit non-est.[98]

In the case of arrest of a ship/vessel, it is usual and common practice to issue warrant of arrest if the affidavit filed under rule 4 of Calcutta High Court Rules (Original Side) contains all particulars required. Thus, it cannot be said that arrest of the ship was obtained by plaintiffs suppressing material facts which would warrant stay of admiralty suit by the court.[99] Considering article 3(1) of the Brussels Convention, 1952 and also rule 52 of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 (53-54 victoria, ch 27), Bombay High Court (Original Side) Rules, 1957 and also rule 367 of the Rules of the High Court of Bombay (Original Side) 1957. The claimant was liable in damages for wrongful arrest of the ship. It was also stated that the wrongful arrest caused irreparable loss and damages to the ship owner. Therefore, the plaintiff was liable to compensate the defendant as the arrest of the ship was found to be wrongful, and was liable to pay damages to defendant for wrongful arrest. The wrongful arrest caused irreparable loss and damages to the ship owner.[100]

Where in a suit invoking admiralty jurisdiction, order of arrest and state of vessel directing advocate commissioner to disburse expenditure amount and deposit remaining amount in High Court, subsequent suit invoking admiralty jurisdiction was filed in another high court — order of attachment was passed in subsequent suit, there was failure of plaintiff in subsequent suit to bring to notice of court, that the other high court had already seized the matter, and such suit in that high court was filed much earlier, it was held that claim should be filed by plaintiff under O XLII, rule 11 of Madras High Court Rules.[101]

In a suit based on contract for insurance premia for a "fleet", where the term of contract of insurance policy provided for exercising lien on any member of the fleet jointly or severally, and the insurance premium for each ship in the fleet was also capable of being identified separately, then, the plaintiff could maintain action in personam and seek reliefs in those proceedings against the "fleet" but action in rem in respect of ship constituting fleet is not maintainable.[102]

A rule made by the Bombay High Court under this section empowers the court to make a pay order enforceable as a decree for the payment of the taxed costs of an attorney. This rule is valid and the pay order may be transferred for execution to another court.[103]

[s 129.7] Letter Patent Not Subordinate Legislation to the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908

Are the Letters Patent, and the rules made thereunder by the high court for regulating its procedure on the original side, subordinate legislation and, therefore, must give way to the superior legislation, namely, the substantive provisions of the CPC? There are two difficulties in accepting this argument. In the first place, section 2(18) of the CPC defines "rules" to mean "rules and forms contained in the First Schedule or made under section 122 or section 125". The conspicuous absence of reference to the rules regulating the procedure to be followed on the original side of a chartered high court makes it clear that those rules are not rules as defined in the CPC. Secondly, it is not possible to accept that the Letters Patent and rules made thereunder, which are recognized and specifically protected by section 129, are relegated to a subordinate status.[104]

To submit that a Letters Patent is a subordinate piece of legislation is to not understand the true nature of a Letters Patent. As has been held in Vinita Khanolkar's case[105] and Sharda Devi's case,[106] a Letters Patent is the charter of the high court. As held in Shah Babulal Khimaji's case[107] a Letters Patent is the specific law under which a high court derives its powers. It is not any subordinate piece of legislation. As set out in aforementioned two cases, a Letters Patent cannot be excluded by implication. Further, it is settled law that between a special law and a general law the special law will always prevail. A Letters Patent is a special law for the concerned high court. The CPC is a general law applicable to all courts. It is well-settled law, that in the event of a conflict between a special law and a general law, the special law must always prevail.[108]

[s 129.8] Plea as to Jurisdiction of High Court — Two Inconsistent Decisions

The trial court has negatived the plea relating to lack of jurisdiction apparently on the finding that the entire cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of Madras High Court. If the contention of the appellant would be accepted now, it would give rise to two inconsistent decisions. So far as principal amount (subject to the question of adjustment of amount already paid) is concerned, it will be taken as if the court had jurisdiction, whereas, so far as other contentions are concerned, such as grant of interest at a higher rate and the adjustment of amount paid first towards principal would give rise to another inconsistent finding to the effect that the Madras High Court did not have jurisdiction to deal with the suit in the absence of any leave as contemplated under clause 12 of the Letters Patent. Obviously, the court cannot countenance such a contention which would give rise to two inconsistent conclusions. Therefore, the contention of the appellant, so far as jurisdiction is concerned, is bound to be rejected.[109]

[s 129.9] Power of High Court to Frame Rules for Trial of Election Petition

There is no provision in the Representation of the Peoples Act, 1951 which empowers the high court to frame the rules governing the procedure of trials before the high court. However, the high court is not entirely powerless in the matter of framing the rules of procedure. Article 225 of the Constitution of India confers powers on the high court, inter alia, to make rules of court for the purpose of hearing, trying and deciding any matter lying within the jurisdiction of the high court. The high court can thus frame rules of procedure regarding the trial of election petitions under Article 225 of the Constitution of India. This source of power emanates from the Constitution of India and, is therefore, very potent. Section 129 of the CPC is another source of power of high court to make rules to regulate its own procedure in

MISCELLANEOUS

[S 132] Exemption of certain women from personal appearance.— (1) Women who, according to the customs and manners of the country, ought not to be compelled to appear in public shall be exempt from personal appearance in Court.

(2) Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to exempt such women from arrest in execution of civil process in any case in which the arrest of women is not prohibited by this Code.

[s 132.1] Appearance in Court

Whether the woman is a pardanashin is a question of fact, which must, if in dispute, be decided on evidence adduced.[1] When once it is found that the woman is a pardanashin, then she is entitled, as a matter of course, to be examined on commission, unless the application is made mala fide and amounts to an abuse of the process of court.[2] It is not a ground for refusing to issue a commission to examine a pardanashin lady that the application has been delayed,[3] or that she has appeared in public in her father's village, unless she is shown to have abandoned the custom of parda.[4] But it has been held that a change in the mode of life of a particular lady can be taken into consideration in exercising a discretion in the grant of the application for examination on commission.[5] The fact that the junior wife of a Muslim does not observe gosha, does not mean that his senior wife has also done so, so as to disenable her from claiming exemption under this section.[6] This section provides for exemption of pardanashin ladies from personal appearance in court but not from, attendance in court. The word "appearance" means that a pardanashin lady shall not be compelled to come forth into view or to become visible to the public gaze. The court, therefore, has power to order a pardanashin lady to give evidence in court provided she is not compelled to come forth into view or to become visible to the public gaze.[7]

[s 132.2] "Custom and Manners of the Country"

The phrase "custom and manners of the country" mean current custom and manners not of the country as a whole but of the particular community, class or section to which the woman belongs, or, it may be of a particular locality, but not of any particular person.[8]

[s 132.3] "Personal appearance" and "personal attendance"

The Allahabad High Court has held that the words "personal appearance" mean "personal attendance" and that a pardanashin lady cannot be compelled to attend court either as a party or as a witness.[9] The Madras High Court has also held that whatever the etymological difference between the words "attendance" and "appearance", the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 makes no distinction between them.[10]

[s 133.1] History of the Section 1517
[s 133.2] Constitutionality of the Section 1517
[s 133.3] Members of Tribunals 1518

[s 133.1] History of the Section

Sub-section (1) was substituted by the Code of Civil Procedure Amendment Act of 1956 in place of the old sub-section which ran as follows:

> Section 133. (1) The State Government may by notification in the official Gazette, exempt from personal appearance in court any person whose rank, in the opinion of such Government, entitles him to the privilege of exemption.
>
> Sub-section (2) which was omitted by the Civil Procedure Code Amendment Act, 1956, ran as follows:
> (2) The names and residences of the persons, so exempted shall, from time to time, be forwarded to the High Court by the State Government and a list of such persons shall be kept in such court, and a list of such persons as reside within the local limits of the jurisdiction of each court subordinate to the High Ccourt shall be kept in such subordinate court.

The words "so exempted" which followed the words "any person" in sub-section (3), were omitted by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1956.

[s 133.2] Constitutionality of the Section

It was held in Shersingh v Ghansiram,[14] that section 133 (1) as it stood prior to its amendment in 1956, was repugnant to Article 14 of the Constitution, as exemption on the basis of rank rested on no valid classification, and that accordingly a jagirdar who was exempted under a state notification of the year 1934 could not claim the privilege of exemption under section 133, as the notification became void on the coming into force of the Constitution. In Rana Bashist Chand v Radhika Dei,[15] the Punjab High Court had also held that notifications granting exemption under section 133 would be bad under Article 14. But in that case the party was the ruler of Kothi State, who had been exempted under the section by a notification of the year 1909, and it was held that the personal privilege of the ruler had been saved by the instrument of accession and that there was therefore a proper classification. Apart from any such notification, an ex-ruler cannot claim exemption under this sub-section.[16] In Amarsinghji v Ufsar Lal,[17] a notification issued in 1934 under the Marwar Civil Procedure Code was upheld on the ground that it exempted classes of persons and that as the word "person" in section 133 would include "persons", exemption of a class was intra vires the section. All doubts have now been set at rest by the amendment of sub-section (1) by the Amendment Act of 1956 which has substituted classes of persons in the place of a person of rank. On the section as it stands, it is no ground for issuing a commission that the person sought to be examined is a person of rank. It was accordingly held that a bishop was not entitled to be examined on commission, because of his rank as a spiritual head and dignitary of the church and that an exemption granted under section 133 of the Travancore Civil Procedure Code was of no avail, as it ceased to operate after the Code of Civil Procedure came into force.[18]

Members of the Administration Tribunal are not immune from appearance in the court. Normally, a witness (whether a party or otherwise) is to be examined in court when the presiding officer gets an opportunity to note the demeanour of the witness and of observing the way in which various questions put to him in cross-examination are answered by him. The presiding officer makes an assessment of his credibility. Where the witness is credible, it is hardly material whether he gives evidence viva voce in court or before a commission or by affidavit or otherwise. It shall not, however, be assumed always that a witness is credible. The high court can exercise its writ jurisdiction over the Administrative Tribunal, except as regards matters specifically excluded.[19]

[S 135] Exemption from arrest under civil process.—(1) No Judge, Magistrate or other judicial officer shall be liable to arrest under civil process while going to, presiding in, or returning from, his Court.

(2) Where any matter is pending before a tribunal having jurisdiction therein, or believing in good faith that it has such jurisdiction, the parties thereto, their pleaders, mukhtars, revenue-agents and recognised agents, and their witnesses acting in obedience to a summons, shall be exempt from arrest under civil process other than process issued by such tribunal for contempt of Court while going to or attending such tribunal for the purpose of such matter, and while returning from such tribunal.

(3) Nothing in sub-section (2) shall enable a judgment-debtor to claim exemption from arrest under an order for immediate execution or where such judgment-debtor attends to show cause why he should not be committed to prison in execution of a decree.

[s 135.1] Alterations in the Section

1. The words, "other than process issued by such tribunal for contempt of court," in sub-section (2), were added to give effect to a Calcutta decision.[20]

2. sub-section (3) was substituted for the words "except as provided in section 337A, sub-section (5), and sections 256 and 643," which occurred at the commencement of sub-section (2) in the Code of Civil Procedure 1882.

[s 135.2] Grounds of Exemption From Arrest

The exemption conferred here is not for the personal benefit of the individual, but for furthering public interests and the better administration of justice. In other words, the exemption is not the privilege of the person attending the court, but that of the court which he attends. If, therefore, a witness does not believe bona fide that his attendance was required, there is no privilege.[21] For the same reason, where a writ of attachment for contempt of court has been issued against a party to a suit, the party cannot claim privilege from arrest while proceeding to court for the purpose of attending the hearing of the suit.[22]

[s 135.3] While Going to or Attending and While Returning from Court

A party to a suit is exempt from arrest under this section, while going to or attending the court before which the suit is pending, and while returning from such court. The word "while" implies that there is a period of exemption and what period is reasonable is a question of fact to be determined by the court in each case.[23] The following are the leading cases bearing on this part of the section:

(i) Where a plaintiff who was a native of Patna, and who had instituted a suit in the High Court of Madras, left Patna on receiving a letter from his solicitors that his presence was required, and arrived at Madras on 24 October, and the suit having come on for hearing on 27 October was adjourned till 25 December, and he was arrested in execution of a decree against him on 10 November, it was held by the High Court of Madras that he was privileged from arrest.[24] This decision was disapproved by the Allahabad High Court[25] in the case cited in clause (ii) below, but it is in accordance with the decision of the House of Lords in the under mentioned case.[26]

(ii) A, residing in Bombay, goes to Benares to prosecute an application to set aside an ex parte decree passed against him by the Benares courts, and puts up at a Dak Bungalow in Benares. On the date fixed for the hearing of the application, A attends the court when his application is heard and dismissed. He then leaves the court, returns to the Dak bungalow, and hence proceeds to the railway station where he is arrested in execution of the decree while actually seated in the train. It is found on evidence that A had taken a ticket for Allahabad when arrested. On the above facts, the High Court of Allahabad held that A's arrest was legal. The court said;

> In the present case A had left the court and had returned to the place where [he] was staying in Benares; he then left that place and [was] actually on his way to Allahabad, which is not his home. In these circumstances we cannot hold that he, at the time of arrest, was returning from a tribunal within the meaning of section 135.[27]

A somewhat similar case was that of a resident of Haidernagar who came to Daltonganj and put up in temporary lodgings with his pleader and attended the court there; returned to his lodgings; went for a walk; and was arrested. The Patna High Court held that the arrest was legal although he had to attend the court the next day. The court said that the same rule must apply to a person who takes lodgings to attend a court as to a person who lives at the place where the court is situated.[28]

(iii) The exemption from arrest continues during such period as is reasonably occupied in going to, attending at, and returning from the place of trial.[29] But if there is a deviation, the privilege is forfeited. A party to a suit was arrested at an office in the same compound as the court house, an hour after the court had risen for the day and as it was not shown that he was returning to his residence, the arrest was held to be legal.[30] But it is not a deviation sufficient to forfeit the privilege if the shortest road home is deviated from, and a less crowded and more convenient road adopted.[31]

(iv) A debtor, who is released from jail under an order of the court on the ground that the order under which he was committed was illegal, may be arrested under civil process immediately after he is released. He is not privileged from arrest as returning from court. It does not follow, because imprisonment followed on an order which was illegal, that he should be treated when released from jail as returning from court.[32]

(v) A is arrested in execution of a decree obtained against him by B, and is brought before the court. While he is in the custody of the court's officers, he is arrested in execution of a decree obtained against him by C. A is not exempt from arrest in execution of C's decree. It cannot be said that A, while he was under arrest in execution of B's decree, was voluntarily in court in connection with the execution of B's decree.[33]

[s 135.4] Parties

A defendant in a summary suit under O XXXVII is privileged from arrests, though he has not obtained leave to defend the suit.[34] An accused ordered to attend a criminal court is entitled to the protection of this section.[35]

[s 135.5] Civil Process

This section applies only to witnesses and parties arrested under writs issued by courts to which the CPC applies. It does not apply where a party is arrested under a writ issued from a small cause court. As there is no provision in the Provincial Small Cause Court Act, 1887 corresponding to this section, questions as to exemption from arrest in the case of persons arrested under writs issued by small cause courts must be governed by the principles of the English law on the subject. They are very much the same, as those set forth in the present section.[36]

Where a judgment-debtor arrested in execution of a decree claims exemption from arrest under this section, but the exemption is not allowed, the order is one under section 47, and is appealable.[37]

[s 136.2] Changes in the Section

In sub-clause (4), the words "West Bengal" were substituted for the word "Bengal" by the AO 1947.

[s 136.3] This Section and O XXXVIII, Rule 5—Attachment Before Judgment

In section 136 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC), it is stated that the district court shall, on receipt of the order of attachment or order of arrest, as the case may be, cause the attachment or arrest to be made by its own officers or by a court subordinate to itself. The court which passes the attachment before judgment passes the same under O XXXVIII, rule 5 of CPC. The said rule gives authority to the court to pass attachment before judgment after being satisfied by affidavit or otherwise, that the defendant, with intent to obstruct or delay the execution of any decree that may be passed against him may try to dispose of the property. Before issuing such order of attachment, the court must satisfy itself that the defendant is about to dispose of the whole or any part of his property, or is about to remove the whole or any part of his property from the local limits of the jurisdiction of the court.

It is only on the satisfaction of these conditions, the court can pass an order of attachment under O XXXVIII, rule 5. Rule 7 of O XXXVIII says that such attachment shall be made in the manner provided for the attachment of the property in execution of a decree.

Section 136 of the CPC lays down the procedure to be followed where the person to be arrested or property to be attached is outside the district court which passes the order of arrest or attachment. section 136 only lays down the procedure in case the property is situated outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The district court to which such order of attachment is sent is only effecting the attachment and the power under O XXXVIII, rule 5 is not as such exercised by that court.

The order of attachment is sent to the district court when the property is situated outside the jurisdiction of the issuing authority. It is only to maintain the comity of courts as, in some cases, the attachment order might be issued by the munsif / civil judge (junior division) and the property to be attached might be within the jurisdiction of the civil judge (senior division)/subordinate judge and in the fitness of things, section 136 lays down the procedure that under such circumstances, the order of attachment should be sent to the district court which is having supervisory jurisdiction over all the subordinate courts within that district. It is only a procedure and if the owner of the property raised an objection to the effect that the procedure was not complied with, court can issue appropriate direction to cure the defect in the procedure. If such an objection was not raised within a reasonable time, it does not seem that the attachment order itself could be treated as invalid.

It is also pertinent to note that by the Amending Act of 1976, a new sub-rule was added to rule 5 of O XXXVIII to the effect that if an order of attachment is made without complying with the provisions of sub-rule (1) of the said rule, such attachment shall be void. Therefore, the importance is given to the mandatory conditions under rule 5(1) of O XXXVIII and there is no such similar insertion in section 136. Therefore, the failure, if any, on the part of the court which issued the attachment order in sending the attachment order and the connected papers to the district court will not invalidate the attachment order as such.[42]

[s 136.4] Arrests and Attachment Otherwise than in Execution of Decree

It is clear from the provisions of the CPC, that the powers of the executing court can be exercised only when the judgment-debtor or his property is within the jurisdiction of the court with only one exception regarding the attachment of salary. As the judgment-debtor or the garnishee in whose custody the property of the judgment-debtor is there, are not within the jurisdiction of the lower court, the order prohibiting the respondent garnishees from making payment of the judgment-debtor is beyond the jurisdiction of the court.[43]

This section prescribes the procedure to be followed where a person is to be arrested or where property is to be attached otherwise than in execution of a decree. The court may under the procedure enacted in this section, attach, before judgment, property outside the local limits of its jurisdiction and may also under O XXI, rule 58 read with O XXXVIII, rule 8, order the removal of the attachment,[44] but the actual attachment must be effected through the district court in whose jurisdiction the property is situated.[45] Where, pursuant to a warrant issued under this section by the Subordinate Judge of Kurnool to the district court, Bellary, a lorry was attached, and a claim having been preferred thereto, the district judge made an order raising the attachment on the claimant furnishing security, it was held that the only court which could hear the claim was the court which made the order for attachment and not the court which actually effected the attachment and that in consequence the order of the district judge releasing the property from attachment on security being furnished was illegal.[46]

[s 136.5] Order of Arrest for Contempt of Court

It has been held in Calcutta that a judge of the Calcutta High Court sitting on its original side has no power to direct a mofussil court to execute a warrant of arrest for contempt of court. But if he grants an injunction and the order is disobeyed, he may direct the arrest and detention of the offender under O XXXIX, rule 2, in which case the present section will apply.[47]

The Madras High Court has held that when an injunction issued by a division bench of the high court on the appellate side is disobeyed by a party residing in the mofussil, the bench has the power to send to the appropriate mofussil court, the warrant of arrest of execution, whether this section applies in terms or not, and the mofussil court, on receipt of the warrant, must proceed as provided in this section.[48] In the Madras case, the court treated the disobedience of the injunction as contempt of court. It is difficult to understand why, when an injunction had actually been granted, the court did not proceed under O XXXIX, rule 2 in which case, there could have been no doubt as to the applicability of the present section to the case.

[s 136.6] Defective Order: Effect

An order for attachment of properties under this section has to be sent to the district court within whose jurisdiction they are situated. But if the order is sent directly to the court within whose jurisdiction the properties are situated, and not to the district court, to which it is subordinate, is an attachment effected thereunder illegal? On this, judicial opinion is divided. One view is that as the question is one of procedure, it is a mere irregularity, not affecting the jurisdiction of the court, and the attachment is valid.[49] The other view is that an order addressed to any court except the district court would be a nullity, and the attachment effected might be ignored as void and where the property is actually sold, the sale must be held to be one made without any attachment, liable to be set aside under O XXI, rule 90, on proof of substantial injury.[50] The view of Mysore High Court also is that where a subordinate court affects an attachment in the absence of a direction from the district court to which it is subordinate, such attachment is invalid since such subordinate court does not get jurisdiction to give effect to the order of attachment issued by another court unless the district court directs it to do so.[51] The conflicting opinion of high courts now seem to have been put at rest by the Supreme Court in a case[52] according to which; the order of attachment is sent to the district court when the property is situated outside the jurisdiction of the issuing authority. It is only to maintain the comity of courts as, in some cases, the attachment order might be issued by the munsif / civil judge (junior division) and the property to be attached might be within the jurisdiction of the civil judge (senior division)/subordinate judge and in the fitness of things, section 136 lays down the procedure that under such circumstances, the order of attachment should be sent to the district court which is having supervisory jurisdiction over all the subordinate courts within that district. It is only a procedure and if the owner of the property raised an objection to the effect that the procedure was not complied with, the court could issue appropriate direction to cure the defect in the procedure. If such an objection was not raised within a reasonable time, the attachment order itself could be treated as invalid.

[S 137] Language of subordinate Courts.—(1) The language which, on the commencement of this Code, is the language of any Court subordinate to a High Court shall continue to be the language of such subordinate Court until the [53][State Government] otherwise directs.

(2) The [53][State Government] may declare what shall be the language of any such Court and in what character applications to and proceedings in such Courts shall be written.

(3) Where this Code requires or allows anything other than the recording of evidence to be done in writing in any such Court, such writing may be in English; but if any party or his pleader is unacquainted with English, a translation into the language of the Court shall, at his request, be supplied to him; and the Court shall make such order as it thinks fit in respect of the payment of the costs of such translation.

[s 137.1] State Amendments

Rajasthan.—The following amendments were made by Rajasthan Act 7 of 1983, section 2, (w.e.f. 16-5-1983).

In its application to State of Rajasthan, in section 137 for sub-section (3), substitute as follows:—

(3) Wherever this Code requires or allows, anything other than the recording of evidence to be done in writing in any such Court, such writing shall be in Hindi in Devnagari script with the international form of Indian numerals:

Provided that the Court may in its discretion accept such writing in English on the undertaking of the party filing such writing, to file a Hindi translation of the same, within such time as may be granted by the Court and the opposite party shall have a right to have a copy of such writing in Hindi.

Uttar Pradesh.—The following amendments were made by Uttar Pradesh Act, 17 of 1970, section 2, (w.e.f. 8-4-1970).

In section 137, in sub-section (3) insert the following proviso:—

Provided that with effect from such date as the State Government in consultation with the High Court may by notification in the Gazette appoint the language of every judgment, decree, or order passed or made by such Courts or classes of Courts subordinate to the High Court and in such classes of cases as may be specified shall only be in Hindi in Devnagari script with the international form of Indian numerals.

[s 137.2] Scope

This section has come up for consideration before several high courts, with reference to enactments prescribing Hindi as the language of the court. In LM Wakhare v State,[54] the question was as to the validity of the Madhya Pradesh Official Language Act 24 of 1950. specifying Hindi or Marathi as the language of the courts. It was held that the enactment did not contravene any of the constitutional provisions, and was valid, and that English could be used in accordance with sub-section (3). In Dayabhai Poonambhai v Natwarlal Sombhai,[55] discussing the scope of the Madhya Bharat Official Language Act, 1950, the court held that as English had been the language of the court before, it could continue to be used, after the enactment as there was nothing in the Act which barred it. A similar decision was given in Sarshwati Bai v Allahabad Bank Ltd,[56] where the question was whether in view of rule 15 framed by the government under the powers conferred by Article 227(2)(b) of the Constitution. prescribing Hindi in Devanagari script as the language of the court, a plaint presented in English was valid. It was held that in the absence of an executive direction prohibiting the use of English, which had been the language of the court before, the plaint was valid. On the same reasoning, a written statement filed in Urdu was held to be valid as that was in use in the state previously.[57]

(c) any person appointed in this behalf by such other Court as the State Government may, by general or special order, empower in this behalf.

[s 139.2] High Court Amendment

Calcutta High Court.—The following modifications were made by Calcutta Gazette, dated 20 April 1967, Part 1, p 760.

In its application to all suits or proceedings in the Court of Small Causes of Calcutta, in s 139, after the words, "under this Code", in the first line add the words, "or under the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882" and after the words "courts which", in clause (c), add the words "or by any judge whom".

[s 139.3] Clause (b)

The words "or other person" in clause (b) mean a person other than the officer of that court.

The deputy registrar of the high court is also not included within the meaning of "oath commissioner".[62]

In Umesh Kumar,[63] the chief secretary of the State Government filed an undated affidavit attested by a joint secretary before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court took strong objection to filing of such an affidavit and said that the attestation of the undated affidavit is in utter disregard to the provisions of section 139. The Supreme Court Rules, 1966[64] under O XI, rule 7 therein also require adherence to the provisions of section 139. It was further held that the reply filed by the chief secretary was therefore not worth taking on record and being undated, rendered the same to be a piece of waste paper. The court did not consider it to be an excusable mistake and passed stricture against the deponent - chief secretary.

A Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court has held that the provisions contained in chapter 4 of the high court Rules do not exclude either expressly or by necessary implication the presentation of affidavits sworn before the Notaries in proceedings before the high court. Therefore, it cannot be held that only those affidavits which are sworn before the Oath Commissioners appointed by the Chief Justice of the high court can be presented and accepted in proceedings before high court.[65]

As held by the Calcutta High Court, affidavit affirmed in England before Notary Public is acceptable in absence of any notification regarding reciprocal recognition of acts done by foreign notaries in our country as per section 14 of the Notaries Act, 1952.[66]

Oath Commissioner, ipso facto, has no authority to administer oath and receive solemn affirmation in respect of high court. Oath Commissioner has to be appointed for the said purpose by high court as per CPC or by high court/sessions Court as per Cr PC.[67]

In writ proceedings, the affidavit affirmed before a notary public is not admissible.[70] The history of admiralty jurisdiction has been traced in a Bombay case.[71]

For the admiralty jurisdiction of various high courts, see an Orissa judgment.[72]

[S 140] Assessors in causes of salvage, etc.—(1) In any Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty cause of salvage, towage or collision, the Court, whether it be exercising its original or its appellate jurisdiction, may, if it thinks fit, and shall upon request of either party to such cause, summon to its assistance, in such manner as it may direct or as may be prescribed, two competent assessors; and such assessors shall attend and assist accordingly.

(2) Every such assessor shall receive such fees for his attendance, to be paid by such of the parties as the Court may direct or as may be prescribed.

[s 140.1] Non Appointment of Surveyor—Effect

An admiralty suit instituted wherein a prayer as made for release of an arrested foreign ship. The suit was based on the allegations that the cables underneath the sea were broken on account of a certain vessel. The government did not appoint any surveyor to assist court and conclusion was arrived at that vessel in question, was one highly probable for breakage of the cables. It was held that the vessel cannot be released without imposing condition.[73]

[S 141] Miscellaneous proceedings.—The procedure provided in this Code in regard to suits shall be followed as far as it can be made applicable, in all proceedings in any Court of civil jurisdiction.

HIGH COURT AMENDMENT

Calcutta.—Add the words "and in the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882", after the words "in this Code" and before the words "in regard to suits"; add the words "and except as therein otherwise provided", after the words, "be made applicable"; omit the words "be followed" after "shall" and put them after the words "otherwise provided"; substitute the words "in the Court of Small Causes of Calcutta" in place of "in any Court of civil jurisdiction" after the words "in all proceedings". Vide Cal. Gaz., Pt. I, dated April 20, 1967.

[s 141.2] Territorial Jurisdiction—This Section, Section 20(c) and Writ Proceedings

Although in view of section 141 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC) the provisions thereof would not apply to a writ proceeding, the phraseology used in section 20(c) of the CPC and clause (2) of Article 226, being in pari materia, the decisions of the Supreme Court rendered on interpretation of section 20 (c) of the CPC shall apply to the writ proceedings also. Before proceeding to discuss the matter further it may be pointed out that the entire bundle of facts pleaded need not constitute a cause of action as what is necessary to be proved, before the petitioner can obtain a decree, is the material facts. The expression, "material facts" is also known as integral facts.

Keeping in view the expressions used in clause (2) of Article 226 of the Constitution of India, indisputably even if a small fraction of cause of action accrues within the jurisdiction of the court, the court will have jurisdiction in the matter.

The facts pleaded in the writ petition must have a nexus on the basis whereof a prayer can be granted. Those facts which have nothing to do with the prayer made therein cannot be said to give rise to a cause of action which would confer jurisdiction on the court.[75]

In Purno Agitok Sangma v Pranab Mukherjee,[76] the petitioner had challenged the appointment of Pranab Mukherjee as the President of India on the ground that he held an office of profit, ie Chairman, Indian Statistical Institute. The Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court was seized of a question that whether by virtue of section 141, the provisions of the CPC can be made applicable in dealing with election petitions under the Presidential and Vice Presidential Elections Act, 1952. The majority comprising of Justices Kabir, Sathasivam and Nijjar held that section 141 of the CPC is not required to be incorporated into a proceeding taken under O XXXIX of the Supreme Court Rules, 1966[77] read with Part III of the Presidential and Vice Presidential Elections Act, 1952 which includes sections 14 to 20 of the aforesaid Act and Article 71 of the Constitution of India and held that the petition did not require a full and regular hearing. Justice Gogoi dissented, but did not give any direct finding on the applicability of section 141 of the CPC. Justice Chelameshwar held that the submission that section 141 of the CPC applies to the conduct of an election petition under the Presidential and Vice Presidential Elections Act, 1952 is untenable.

[s 141.3] This Section Does not Apply to Proceedings in Execution

Section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1882, as it stood when that Code was first enacted, ran as follows:

> The procedure herein prescribed shall be followed, as far as it can be made applicable, in all proceedings in any court of civil jurisdiction other than suits and appeals.

The question arose under that section whether the words "proceedings other than suits and appeals" included proceedings in execution; in other words, whether that section had the effect of rendering the provisions of the Code relating to suits applicable to proceedings in execution of a decree. On the one hand, the High Courts of Allahabad[78] and Bombay,[79] held that that the section applied to applications for execution of decrees, so that the procedure relating to suits was applicable to applications for execution. On the other hand, the High Court of Calcutta held that that section did not apply to proceedings in execution.[80] In this state of authorities the legislature intervened, and an explanation was added to the section by the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment Act) 1892, which ran as follows:

> Explanation—This section does not apply to applications for the execution of decrees which are proceedings in suits.

The effect of the above explanation was to supersede the Allahabad and Bombay rulings above referred to, and to give legislative sanction to the Calcutta decision.

In the meantime, one of the Allahabad cases referred to above, namely, the case of Fakir-ullah v Thakur Prasad,[81] was taken up to the Privy Council, and that tribunal held, in the year 1894, that independently of the explanation, section 647 (now section 141), did not apply to applications for execution, but only to original matters in the nature of suits, such as proceedings in probates, guardianships, and so forth, thus overruling the Allahabad and Bombay cases.[82] If this decision had come three years earlier, it would have made the enactment of the explanation unnecessary. The Privy Council decision and the recognition of the rule that section 647 did not apply to execution proceedings, rendered that explanation redundant and hence was omitted from the section.[83] The Supreme Court also has held that the section has no application to execution proceedings.[84] At the same time, two alterations have been made in the section, namely:

(a) the words "in regard to suits" have been added; and

(b) the words "other than suits and appeals" have been omitted.

In doing so, the legislature has now done what it could have done as well in 1892.

This section, we have said, does not apply to proceedings in execution.[85] Hence, the procedure provided in the CPC in regard to suit does not apply to applications for execution of decrees. The following are the leading decisions on the subject:

(i) The provisions of section 11 relating to res judicata in regard to suits do not apply to applications for the execution of decrees. But though these provisions, do not in terms, apply to applications for execution, they are governed by principles analogous to those of res judicata.[86]

(ii) If the provisions of O I, rule 10 cannot be invoked for impleading the heirs of the deceased defendant, due to non-applicability of section 141, the heirs can certainly rely upon the inherent powers of the courts under section 151 of the CPC. What is to be noted is that rule 9 of O XXII enables only the plaintiff or the person claiming to be the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff to apply for an order to set aside an abatement—the legal representative of a deceased defendant are not so enabled.[87]

(iii) The provisions of O II, rule 2 (Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, section 431) do not apply to applications for execution. Hence, where a decree awards two distinct reliefs, an application to enforce one relief is no bar to a subsequent application to enforce the other relief, though both reliefs are awarded by the same decree,[88] or where an application for the amount of the principal due under a decree is allowed, a subsequent application for interest is not barred.[89] Where payment of the amount deposited by the judgment-debtor in court does not completely discharge a money-decree, a fresh application for the realisation of the balance due to the decree-holder is maintainable, so long as the executing court has not become functus officio.[90]

(iv) The provisions of O IX do not apply to applications for execution. Hence, if the applicant fails to appear at the hearing of the application, the court cannot dismiss the application under O IX, rule 8, though it may do so under its inherent power.[91] And where in the exercise of this power an application for execution is dismissed, the court has no power to restore it to the file under O IX, rule 9[92] as that rule does not apply to execution proceedings. But though the court has no power to restore to the file, an application, which has once been dismissed for default, such dismissal is no bar to a fresh application for execution.[93] On the power of the court to restore such applications in its inherent jurisdiction, see the under mentioned cases[94] and notes under section 151.

(v) The provisions of O XVII, rules 2 and 3 do not apply to an application for execution. Hence, an order dismissing an application for default is no bar to a fresh application for execution.[95]

(vi) An application under O XXI, rule 90 to set aside a sale in execution, is an application in execution and therefore the provisions of O XXXII, rule 7 as to consent of guardian do not become applicable to it under section 141.[96]

(vii) The provisions of O XXIII, rule 1 do not apply to applications for execution. Hence the withdrawal of an application, though it be without the leave of the court, is no bar to a fresh application for execution.[97]

(viii) See note to section 144, "Whether a proceeding under this section is a proceeding in execution".

(ix) See O XXII, rule 12.

(x) The execution court cannot refer a dispute to arbitration, and a fortiori, a court hearing an execution appeal cannot.[98] Section 141 is inapplicable in execution proceedings. Copy of sale proclamation need not be annexed to the notice to the judgment-debtor under O XXI, rule 66. It cannot be argued that by virtue of the provisions of section 141, the provisions governing suits contained in O V, rules 1 and 2 are applicable to execution applications.[99]

Other cases under this section are considered in their proper places.

[s 141.4] Proceedings in any Courts of Civil Jurisdiction

As stated earlier, the Privy Council in Thakur Prasad v Fakir-ullah took the view that this section did not apply to applications for execution but applied only to "original matters" in the nature of suits, such as proceedings, in probates, guardianship and "so forth". The words "so forth" used by the Privy Council were understood to mean proceedings ejusdem generis with the instances preceding them and would include proceedings such as in divorce, insolvency, for succession certificates, land and the like. In other words, this section applies to original matters, ie matters which originate in themselves and not those which spring from a suit or from some other proceeding or arises in connection therewith.[100] Thus, an application for probate may be dismissed for default under O IX and then restored.[101] Rejection of an application for restoration would be appealable under O XLIV, rule 1(e). Following the dictum of the Privy Council, the Calcutta High Court in Sarat Krishna Bose v Bisweswar Mitra,[102] held that this section did not make O IX applicable to proceedings under O IX. Therefore, when an application under O IX, rule 9 for restoration of a suit was dismissed for default under rule 4 of that order, no application lay under O iX, rule 9 for setting aside that order of dismissal and for its restoration. The view that the provisions of O IX had no application to a proceeding under that order, was restated by the Orissa High Court in Kunj Behari v Chanchala Das.[103] Likewise, a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court, following Sarat Krishna Bose v Bisweswar Mitra, held that where a suit is dismissed for default and an application for its restoration under O IX, rule 9 is also dismissed for default, a further application to restore the application under O IX, rule 9 does not attract this section, the reason given being that this section contemplates only proceedings which are original matters in the nature of suits such as proceedings in probate, guardianship and so forth and also applications which are ejusdem generis with such proceedings.[104] In this decision, the high court considered several decisions of different high courts stating varying views as to the applicability of this section to such matters and the view held there, that in any case, resort could be had to the inherent powers of the court under section 151. However, in Ramkarandas Radhavallabh v Bhagwandas,[105] the Supreme Court held that where an application is made to set aside a decree for ejectment under O XXXVII, rule 4 and the finding is that no special circumstance is made out to set aside such a decree, there is no scope for the applicability of section 151, since inherent powers are to be exercised in exceptional cases in respect of which the CPC does not lay down any procedure. This view appears to have been understood as being contrary to the decisions cited earlier, although neither this section nor O IX was involved in it. The decision, which specifically runs contrary to the Privy Council dictum in Ramchandra v State of Uttar Pradesh,[106] where the question canvassed was whether a proceeding before a civil court arising out of a reference under section 146 (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 (CrPC) is a civil proceeding as contemplated by this section. In dealing with that question, the Supreme Court observed that the expression "civil proceeding", in this section, is not necessarily confined to an original proceeding like a suit or an application for appointment of a guardian, etc, but that it applies also to a proceeding which is not an original proceeding. This observation is certainly in conflict with the Privy Council dictum followed by the Bombay, Calcutta and Orissa High Courts that this section contemplates proceedings which are original matters in the nature of suits, such as proceedings in probate, guardianship and so forth. In the light of the above observations of the Supreme Court, a proceeding under O IX for restoration of an application dismissed for default under that order, would be a civil proceeding within the meaning of this section and that there being a remedy provided by the Code, no resort can be had in such cases to section 151. Contrary to the Calcutta and Bombay view, the Punjab and Haryana High Court in decision, has held that an application under O IX, rule 9 is competent if it sought restoration of an earlier application seeking restoration of the suit in the event that the suit and the earlier application have both been dismissed for default.[107]

The Gauhati High Court has held that where an appeal is dismissed for default and an application for its re-admission is pending, such an application gives rise to a proceeding within the meaning of section 141 of the Code. Since it is merely the procedural part of the Code which is applicable to a proceeding under section 141 of the Code, the substantive part of the code, such as, section 94(c) would not be applicable to a proceeding for re-admission of an appeal under O XLI, rule 19 of the Code. Thus a court cannot grant temporary injunction during the proceeding for restoration of an appeal. However, it was further held that the court may grant such injunction taking recourse to section 151 of the Code if the situation so demands.[108]

The Allahabad High Court has held that the expression all proceedings in any court of Civil jurisdiction" in section 141 is of wide import and an application filed for restoration of second appeal dismissed as being abated and substitution application would fall within the ambit of the said expression. Therefore, it is open to Court to pass appropriate orders for injunction or stay during the pendency of such applications.[109]

An application under section 5(4) of the Assam Urban Area Rent Control Act, 1972 for deposit of rent in court cannot be treated as a proceeding within the meaning of section 141 of the Code as the court cannot be said to be adjudicating any dispute between the landlord and tenant. Therefore, provisions of O IX, rule 4 of the CPC do not apply for restoration of the said application.[110]

In another case, the Gauhati High Court has held that an application under O XXXIX, rule 2-A against violation of injunction order gives rise to a "proceeding" within the meaning of section 141 and therefore, the same can be adjourned invoking O XVII, rule 1 of the Code. In the same case, it has been further held that an application for temporary injunction cannot be treated as a proceeding under this section reiterating its earlier view in Yogesh Shah's case (supra).[111]

Where a suit was decreed ex parte and an application under O IX, rule 13 for restoration of the suit was also dismissed for default, in view of the amended provisions of section 141, two alternative remedies were available to the applicant. He could file an application under O IX, rule 9 read with section 141 for restoration of the application dismissed for default or an appeal under O XLIV, rule 1(c). As the CPC provides for alternative remedies, remedy under section 151 was not available.[112] In 1988, Calcutta High Court held that where a miscellaneous case (an application under O IX, rule 4, 9 or 13) is dismissed for default, application for the restoration of such miscellaneous case is maintainable under O IX, read with section 141.

Proceedings under O IX are to be treated as miscellaneous proceedings within the meaning of section 141, (as amended in 1976). Limitation for such an application for restoration would be governed by Article 137 of the Limitation Act, 1963. However, the high court observed that amendment in the law should be made so that such application would be governed by Article 122 of the Limitation Act, 1963.[113]

The proceeding within this section must be a proceeding in a court of civil jurisdiction. An application for letters of administration can be stayed under section 10, pending the disposal of such an application filed earlier in another court having jurisdiction.[114] An application under section 18 of the Religious Endowments Act, 1863, is a proceeding of this nature. Hence, it must be verified as required by O VI, rule 15, of the CPC.[115] But an application for settlement of rents made to a revenue officer under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act 8 of 1885 is not a proceeding in a court of civil jurisdiction. Hence, the petition need not be signed as required by O VI, rule 14.[116] A petition by a company to the high court under the Indian Companies Memorandum of Association Act, 1895, for the confirmation of a special resolution altering the memorandum of association of the company, is a proceeding within the meaning of this section. Therefore, where the petition was dismissed and the company applied for leave to appeal to the Privy Council, the case was dealt with by the court under section 595 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1882, [now section 109].[117] Similarly an application to set aside an ex parte payment order made under the Indian Companies Act 6 of 1882, is a proceeding in a court of civil jurisdiction. Hence the provisions of O IX, rule 13 apply to the case.[118] An order passed by a civil court under section 120 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, is in exercise of its power as a court of civil jurisdiction under this section.[119] Proceedings under section 187 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, are proceedings in a court of civil jurisdiction.[120] The court has power under O XXIII, rule 3 read with section 141, to record a compromise entered into in the course of proceedings under the Companies Act.[121] It can order amendment of pleadings under O VI, rule 17.[122] It can pass interlocutory orders as provided in section 94 in proceedings under section 186(1) of the Companies Act, 1956.[123]

This section is applicable to proceedings under section 235 of the Companies Act, 1956 and where a creditor who had filed a petition under that section died, it was held that an application of his legal representative to come on record was governed by O II and must be filed within the period of limitation prescribed for petitions under O II.[124] An application under section 12 of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890, is a proceeding in a court of civil jurisdiction. Hence, a receiver may be appointed in such a proceeding under O XL, rule 1,[125] and the receiver so appointed will have all the powers of a receiver under the CPC.[126] The court cannot dismiss an application for the appointment of a guardian summarily, and on a perusal of the pleadings, as the provisions of the Code are, under this section, applicable to proceedings under that Act and a decision should be given only after hearing the parties and taking evidence.[127] An application under O IX, rule 13, is a proceeding referred to in this section and so section 21 as to objection to jurisdiction applies to such an application.[128] But an application for a succession certificate under the Succession Certificate Act, 1889, is not such a proceeding. Hence, a receiver cannot be appointed under O XLI in such a proceeding.[129] An application for the appointment of a common manager under section 93 of the Bengal Tenancy Act 8 of 1885, is a proceeding of the kind contemplated by this section; a receiver, therefore, may be appointed under O XL, rule 1, pending the application.[130] Disciplinary proceedings taken under section 14 of the Legal Practitioners Act 18 of 1879 are "not proceedings in any court of civil jurisdiction" within the meaning of this section; therefore, the procedure provided by section 24 of the CPC does not apply to those proceedings.[131] An issue referred to a civil court under the Agra Tenancy Act, 1926, by a revenue court is an original matter in the nature of a suit and the civil court has jurisdiction under this section (read with O IX) to entertain an application for setting aside an ex parte decision passed by it.[132] An inquiry before a commissioner appointed by a court to ascertain the amount of mesne profits payable by one party to another is a proceeding within the meaning of this section. Hence, the provisions of O XVIII, rule 1 apply to the proceeding.[133] In a suit on a mortgage an application under O XXXIV, rule 5(3), for a final decree,[134] or under O XXXIV, rule 6 for a personal decree[135] is not a proceeding in execution, but a proceeding contemplated by this section, and so the provisions of O IX apply.[136]

The provisions of the CPC have been held to be applicable to proceedings under section 24 of the Code,[137] as also to petitions under O XXXIII, rule 1.[138] It has been observed that an application for amendment is not within this section, as it is not a proceeding original in its nature but is purely interlocutory.[139] This decision requires reconsideration in view of the Supreme Court decision in Ramchandra v State of Uttar Pradesh.

The Supreme Court has held that the CPC is applicable to proceedings in court under the Arbitration Act, 1940 (now replaced by Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996), and that where, after an award was given by the arbitrator, the parties entered into a compromise, the court has the power to record it under O XXIII, rule 3, read with this section, and make it part of the decree either by incorporating it in the operative portion thereof or the schedule thereto.[140] An arbitrator, appointed under the Defence of India Act, 1939, for purposes of settlement of compensation under section 19 of that Act, is a court of civil jurisdiction, to whose proceedings this section applies.[141] This section also applies to proceedings under the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1947.[142] It has been held that the provisions of the CPC are applicable to proceedings under Displaced Persons (Debts Adjustment) Act, 1951, and so an application dismissed for default could be restored under O IX.[143] section 141 has no application to proceedings which come to a civil court under the provisions of the CrPC.[144] An order passed ex parte in proceedings under section 146 of the CrPC cannot be set aside under O IX, rule 13;[145] nor could petitions under section 195(1)(b) or (c)[146] or under section 476[147] of the CrPC dismissed for default of appearance be restored under O IX, rule 9, of the Code. The Supreme Court has held that even before commencement of arbitral proceedings, an application under section 9 of the Arbitration Act, 1996 can be filed and such application, being original in nature, shall be treated as to be at the same footing as the proceedings within the meaning of section 141.[148]

It has been held that the provisions of the Code are applicable to proceedings under the Lunacy Act;[149] under the Madras Agriculturists Relief Act, 1938;[150] under the Madras Hindu Bigamy Prevention and Divorce Act, 1949.[151]

The Supreme Court has held that section 141 has no application to inquiries under sections 7 and 45 of the Administration of Evacuee Property Act, 1950.[152] The provisions of the Code have been held to be inapplicable to proceedings before the rent controller under Jaipur Rent Control Order[153] or to proceedings under UP Land Reforms (Supplementary) Act 1952.[154]

On the question whether section 141 is applicable to revision petitions, the preponderance of authority is in favour of the view that it does not.[155] The contrary view was taken in the under mentioned case.[156]

[s 141.5] The Procedure Provided in This Code

Section 141 of the Act leaves no doubt that in a proceeding where an application is filed for passing the decree on the basis of the award submitted by the arbitrator, the provisions of the CPC are applicable and there is no provision which excludes operation of O IX. Similarly, in view of section 141 of the CPC, the procedure prescribed in it is to be followed as far as it can be made applicable to all proceedings in the court of civil jurisdiction. Hence, in the proceedings initiated for making the award, a rule of the court, the provisions of the CPC, including O IX, rule 13 would be applicable. As per the explanation to section 141, the expression "proceedings" includes proceedings under O IX.[157]

Explanation 2 of section 141 of the CPC introduced by 1976 Amendment Act specifically includes proceedings under O IX within the purview of the said section. Thus, there will be no difficulty in applying section 141 to proceedings arising under O IX, CPC, including applications to restore an application filed for restoring the suit dismissed for default in view of specific inclusion of said proceedings within the ambit of section 141.[158]

This section extends the procedure provided in the CPC in regard to suits and to proceedings in civil courts. It does not confer any substantive right not expressly given elsewhere by the Code, eg, a right of appeal.[159] Hence, no appeal lies from an order passed in a "proceeding" of the kind contemplated by this section unless the order comes within the purview of O XLIII.[160]

Nor does an appeal lie from an order returning a memorandum of appeal to the proper court.[161] Further, the section does not confer upon any court entertaining such proceedings a power not expressly given elsewhere by the CPC, eg, the power to refer questions to the high court (section 113).[162]

The right conferred on a ruler under section 86 is one of substance and cannot be claimed under section 141 in a probate proceeding,[163] nor the right to apply for review, which is not a procedural but a substantive right.[164]

[s 141.6] Explanation

As against the dismissal of the restoration application under rules 2 and 3 of O IX read with section 141, CPC, a two-fold remedy is provided under rule 4 of O IX read with section 141, wherein it is provided that where the suit is dismissed under rule 2 or rule 3, CPC, the plaintiff may (subject to the law of limitation) bring a fresh suit, or he may apply for an order to set the dismissal aside, and if he satisfies the court that there was sufficient cause for such failure as is referred to in rule 2, or for his non-appearance, as the case may be, the court shall make an order setting aside the dismissal. Thus, from a plain reading of rules 2, 3, 4 and 5 read with section 141, it is clear that the plaintiff-appellant had two remedies either to bring a fresh suit or may apply for setting aside the dismissal under rule 4 of O IX with the aid of section 141CPC or may bring fresh suit (subject to law of limitation) under rule 5(2) of O IX. Both these remedies are simultaneous and would not exclude either of them. The application under O IX, rule 4 read with section 141 CPC for restoration of miscellaneous application is maintainable.[165]

Judicial opinion is divided on the question whether section 141 applies to Writ Petitions under Article 226 of the Constitution. It has been held by a Full Bench of the Punjab High Court that it applies,[166] and that is also the view of the High Court of Andhra Pradesh.[167] But a different view has been taken by the High Courts of Calcutta[168] and Madras.[169] A Single Judge of the Punjab High Court, also, has held, though without referring to that High Court's earlier decision, in Sona Ram Ranga Ram v Central Government, (Supra) that this section does not apply to Article 226 proceedings as the high court, when it exercises its extraordinary jurisdiction, cannot be said to be a court of civil jurisdiction.

The explanation inserted in 1976 resolves the judicial controversy both as regards the applicability of the provisions of the CPC under this section to applications for setting aside ex parte proceedings or orders of dismissal for default under O IX, rule 9 and also as regards the applicability of the provisions of the CPC to writ proceedings under Article 226. It, now, provides that in the case of the former, they apply and in the case of the latter they do not.

Though writ proceedings are not proceedings within the meaning of this section and therefore they are not governed by the CPC, the explanation does not run counter to the high court exercising its jurisdiction under Article 226 and invoking this section in doing so. This is done, not because the writ proceedings are governed by the CPC, but because its provisions are in conformity with the rules of natural justice. A writ petition dismissed for default can be restored upon a reasonable cause being shown.[170]

The high court, while exercising jurisdiction under Article 226 of the Constitution of India has jurisdiction to pass appropriate orders.[171] Proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution of India stand on a different footing when compared to the proceedings in suits or appeals arising therefrom.[172]

Section 141 of CPC provides that procedure provided in the Code in regard to suits shall be followed in all proceedings in any court of civil jurisdiction. But, the explanation to section 141 states that the expression "proceedings" does not include any proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution of India.[173]

When the high court exercises extraordinary jurisdiction under Article 226 of the Constitution, it aims at securing a very speedy and efficacious remedy to a person, whose legal or constitutional right has been infringed. If all the elaborate and technical rules laid down in the CPC are to be applied to writ proceedings, the very object and purpose is likely to be defeated. In view of the conflicting opinions expressed by the different courts, the Parliament, by the aforesaid amending Act (1976), introduced the explanation saying that in section 141 of the Code, the expression "proceedings" does not include any proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution and statutorily recognised the views expressed by some of the courts, that writ proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution shall not be deemed to be proceedings within the meaning of section 141 of the CPC. After the introduction of the Explanation to section 141, it can be said that when section 141 provides that the proceedings prescribed in the CPC in regard to suits shall be followed, as far as it can be made applicable "in all proceedings in any court of civil jurisdiction" it shall not include a proceeding under Article 226 of the Constitution. In this background, it cannot be held that the provisions contained in O XXII of the CPC are applicable per se to writ proceedings.[174] Notwithstanding rule 24 of Writ Proceeding Rules, 1997 Andhra Pradesh (AP), the provisions of the CPC cannot be made applicable to any extent to any of the proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution and the high court in dealing with such matters should be left to adopt its own procedure for granting relief to concerned person and by adopting a procedure which can be held not only reasonable but also expeditious.

With the total exclusion of the proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution from the purview of section 141 of the CPC, there is no question of making applicable the procedure of the Code "as far as it can be made applicable to such proceedings". If, inspite of it, the provisions of the Code are made applicable to the proceedings under Article 226 of the Constitution, it would be repugnant to the extraordinary powers of the high court thereunder.[175] The Supreme Court, while dealing with a writ petition under Article 226 of the Constitution, has not totally excluded the possibility of allowing oral application made under Article 226 in emergent cases. It is so, because the procedural provisions of the CPC are not made applicable to writ proceedings under Article 226 by virtue of the explanation to section 141 of the CPC. It was observed that the practice of entertaining oral application and issuing interim orders by any court in matter of consequence without any affidavit having been shown to as a prima facie proof of allegation and without any record being kept before the court, may lead to very serious abuse of the process of the court. However, if some grossly iniquitous act is about to be perpetrated and any delay would result in the fait accompli of a monstrosity, urgent oral applications may be moved and urgent interim orders issued. But even in such cases, at least a skeletal application setting out the bare acts and the questions involved should be insisted upon. A detailed application could be permitted to be filed later.[176]

[s 144.1] State Amendment

Uttar Pradesh.—The following amendment were made by Uttar Pradesh Act 24 of 1954, section 2 and Schedule, Item 5, entry 7, dated 30 November 1954.

In Section 144, for sub-section (1), the following shall be substituted:—

(1) Where and in so far a decree or an order is varied or reversed in appeal, revision or otherwise, the Court of first instance shall, on the application of any party entitled to any benefit by way of restitution or otherwise, cause such restitution to be made, as will, so far as may be, place the parties in the position which they would have occupied but for such decree or order or such part thereof as has been varied or reversed and for this purpose, the Court may make any orders, including orders for the refund of costs and for the payment of interest, damages, compensation and mesne profits, which are properly consequential on such variation or reversal.

HIGH COURT AMENDMENT

Calcutta High Court.—The following modification were made by Calcutta Gazette, dated 20 April 1967, Pt 1, page 760.

Section 144 extended to all suits or proceedings in the Court of Small Causes, Calcutta

[s 144.2] Changes in the Section

The corresponding section before it was restructured by the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 (CPC) was section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1882. The section then provided that "when a party entitled to any benefit (by way of restitution or otherwise) under a decree passed in an appeal under this chapter desires to obtain execution of the same, he shall apply to the court which passed the decree against which the appeal was preferred; and such court shall proceed to execute the decree passed in appeal according to the rules hereinbefore prescribed for the execution of decrees in suits". The language of the section confined the relief of restitution only in cases where the decree was reversed or varied in appeal preferred against the original decree and not to variation or reversal otherwise than in appeal, nor to a reversal or variation by the Privy Council in appeal[184] or in review by the same court.[185] The section was recast by the CPC to give legislative sanction to a practice which had been established by that time under which a wider interpretation was given to the section. As to recast, the section did not contain any limitation as to the manner in which a decree was varied or reversed as did the old section 583 which contained, the words "a decree passed in an appeal." The effect of the change was to extend the operation of the section to all cases where the decree was varied or reversed including reversal by a superior court, by the same court in the same proceedings or by a different court in different proceedings.[186] The Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1976, inserted the words "or an order" after the word "decree", the effect of which was to extend the application of the section to cases where an order also was varied or reversed.

The Amendment Act, 1976 has, for the words "varied or reversed, the court of first instance" in sub-section 1, substituted the words "varied or reversed in any appeal, revision or other proceeding or is set aside or modified in any suit instituted for the purpose, the court which passed the decree". It has also, for the words "Such part thereof as has been varied or reversed" substituted the words "such part thereof as has been varied, reversed, set aside or modified." Lastly, it has, for the words, "consequential on such variation or reversal" substituted the words, "consequential on such variation, reversal, setting aside or modification of the decree or order." The effect of these changes in sub-section (1) is to clarify, what some of the high courts had already done, that the benefit of the section shall also apply to variation or reversal, of the original decree, not only in appeal by a superior court but also by the same court in the same proceedings by review and to modification or setting aside of the decree by another competent court in a separate suit for setting aside the decree on grounds such as fraud, want of jurisdiction. The Explanation has been added because the words "the court of first instance" in the unamended sub-section (1) would obviously be inapposite in cases where the decree was set aside or modified by another court in a separate suit filed for that relief or where the court which passed the original decree has ceased to exist or has ceased to have jurisdiction to execute it.

Sub-section (2) has been retained unaltered.

The principle of restitution has been statutorily recognised in section 144 of the CPC. section 144 of the CPC speaks not only of a decree being varied, reversed, set aside or modified but also includes an order on par with a decree. The scope of the provision is wide enough so as to include therein almost all the kinds of variation, reversal, setting aside or modification of a decree or order.[187]

The Hon'ble Supreme Court[188] laid down the grounds in which section 144 CPC is applicable:

1. Restitution sought must be in respect of a decree or order which has been varied or reversed;
2. The party applying must be entitled to the benefit of restitution;
3. The relief which is claimed must be consequential to the reversal or variation of the decree or order.

In the present case there is no decree or order by the trial which mandate to hand over the possession to the defendant and hence, the present case is not fit for applicability of section 144 CPC.

[s 144.4] Doctrine of Restitution

The doctrine of restitution contemplates the case where property has been received by a decree-holder in execution of a decree, and the decree, or part thereof, is subsequently varied or reversed on appeal by the judgment-debtor, or even in a separate suit[189] or otherwise, as for instance, on an application under the Bengal Money Lenders Act or Agriculturist Relief Act.[190] A filed a suit for a declaration that grant of bhumidari rights by the revenue authority in favour of B was illegal and sought for recovery of possession. The suit was decreed by the trial judge. A first appeal against the decree was dismissed. In second appeal, the high court held that civil courts had no jurisdiction to entertain a suit relating to bhumidari rights under section 84 of the Delhi Land Reforms 1954, and dismissed the suit. On such dismissal, B became entitled by way of restitution to possession of the land from A who had taken possession in execution of the decree passed by the trial judge.[191]

In a suit for injunction the plaintiffs claimed to be the owner of the property and obtained interim order of injunction from the court allegedly by making false statements and raised construction during the operation of the interim order. Later, the plaintiff got the suit dismissed for default after raising the construction. It was held the petition under section 144 of the Code by defendant for removal of construction and restoration of status quo is not maintainable, because admittedly, the questions whether the plaintiffs are owners of the property or the defendant occupied the same as owners were not decided by a competent court and the rights of both parties were under question.[192]

Where the appellants admittedly took benefit of the interim order passed by the Supreme Court,[193] they cannot, having regard to the doctrine of "unjust enrichment", retain the undue advantages derived by it, and were accordingly asked to pay back the amount received either directly or indirectly on account of MSIL Distributor Public Sector Undertaking; the doctrine of restitution was, thus, applied.[194]

Once the doctrine of restitution is attracted, the interest is often a normal relief given in restitution. Such interest is not controlled by the provisions of the Interest Act, 1978.[195]

Where the decree remains valid and unaltered but becomes inexecutable due to intervening circumstances, such as enforcement of a new law, the doctrine of restitution is not available.[196]

[s 144.5] Act of Court

The legal maxim actus curiae neminem gravabit, means that an act of court shall prejudice no man.[197]

That no one shall suffer by an act of the court is not a rule confined to an erroneous act of the court; the "act of the court" embraces within its sweep all such acts as to which the court may form an opinion in any legal proceedings that the court would not have so acted had it been correctly apprised of the facts and the law. The factor attracting applicability of restitution is not the act of the court being wrongful or a mistake or error committed by the court; the test is whether on account of an act of the party persuading the court to pass an order held at the end as not sustainable, has resulted in one party gaining an advantage which it would not have otherwise earned, or the other party has suffered an impoverishment which it would not have suffered but for the order of the court and the act of such party.[198]

The injury, if any, caused by the act of the court shall be undone and the gain which the party would have earned unless it was interdicted by the order of the court would be restored to or conferred on the party by suitably commanding the party liable to do so.[199]

Having considered the submissions made on behalf of the respective parties and having gone through the materials on record, the Supreme Court was inclined to accept the submissions made on behalf of the decree holder/respondent. Having withdrawn the Special Leave Petition which had been filed by (appellant) against the order by which his share in the suit property had been conveyed to the decree holder/respondent, the question of restitution to the position prior to the execution of the decree does not and/or cannot arise. In Supreme Court's view, the order passed by the Madras High Court in CRP having become final with the withdrawal of SLP is no longer open to the judgment debtor/appellant to pray for restitution notwithstanding the decision in the case of Hameed Joharan[200] or that of Prasanna Kumar Roy Karmakar.[201] The fact situation is such that it does not call for any interference with the impugned order passed by the High Court at Madras and the appeals must, therefore, fail and were dismissed.[202]

[s 144.6] Duty of the Court

The procedure to be adopted by the judgment-debtor is to apply under this section to the court of first instance for restitution of the property and for consequential relief. On such application being made, the court shall cause restitution to be made to the judgment-debtor (the successful appellant). The duty of the court, when awarding restitution under section 144 of the CPC, is imperative. It shall place the applicant in the position in which he would have been if the order had not been made and for this purpose, the court is armed with powers (the "may" is empowering, not discretionary) as to mesne profits, interests and so forth.[203]

When a claim for restitution is ordered under this section, it is the duty of the court to make all consequential orders, and not refer the parties to a suit.[204] In Lala Bhagwandas v Lala Kishen Das,[205] stating the principle underlying this section, the Supreme Court observed that:

> On the reversal of a judgment, the law raises an obligation on the party to the record who received the benefit of the erroneous judgment to make restitution to the other party for what he had lost and that it is the duty of the Court to enforce that obligation unless it is shown that restitution would be clearly contrary to the real justice of the case.

To make restitution for what a party has lost, it is the duty of the court to do so, unless it feels that in the facts and on the circumstances of the case, the restitution would far from meeting the ends of justice, would rather defeat the same.[206]

The very ex parte decree made in suit was set aside in view of the restoration of the suit. In such cases, the court has got a duty to enforce its obligation to restitute the property to the applicant who was deprived of his possession based on the decree or order, inasmuch as it is a settled law that whenever an ex parte decree or order is set aside, the party who was dispossessed or evicted in pursuance of such ex parte decree or order is entitled to restitution forthwith, in spite of the fact that, ultimately, on merits, he might lose the cause; and that whenever an ex parte decree or order is set aside, no person who has entered into possession through the party obtaining the ex parte decree or order, can resist or obstruct restitution on the ground that he is a bona fide transferee.[207]

[s 144.7] Restitution

The word "restitution" in this section means restoring to a party, on the variation or reversal of a decree, what has been lost to him in execution of the decree or directly in consequence of that decree, though not through proceedings under it.[208] The Amendment Act, 1976 has now clarified that the remedy by way of restitution would extend to cases where a decree has been varied or reversed in proceedings other than an appeal or revision or review, that is, where it is set aside or modified in a separate suit in another competent court filed for that purpose. The section does not apply unless the property was lost in execution of the decree or directly in consequence of that decree.[209] Where the decree was for payment of money and the judgment-debtor sold his house to the decree-holder voluntarily and independently of the decree and on reversal of the decree in appeal, he applied for possession of the house it was held that though the sale was for satisfaction of the decretal debt, he was not entitled to the possession of the house as the sale was not a direct consequence of the decree.[210] The principle of the doctrine of restitution is that on the reversal of a decree in appeal, the law imposes an obligation on the party to the suit who received the benefit of the erroneous decree to make restitution to the other party for what he has lost.[211] Section 144 is founded on the equitable principle that one who has taken advantage of a decree of a court should not be permitted to retain it, if the decree is reversed or modified. The word "restitution" in the marginal note of section 144(1) in its etymological sense, means resorting to a party on the modification, variation or reversal of a decree. In such a proceedings, the party seeking restitution is not required to satisfy the court about its title or rights to the property save and except showing its deprivation under a decree and the reversal and variation of decree.[212]

However, in Binayak v Ramesh Chandra,[213] the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Orissa High Court in Ramesh Chandra v Binayak[214] where the high court had refused restitution on the ground that though the decree was reversed in appeal, the suit was remanded and on remand, the same decree was confirmed. The Supreme Court held that the subsequent passing of the same decree did not validate the execution of the decree which was reversed in appeal.

The restitution to be made must be such as will, so far as may be, place the parties in the position which they would have occupied but for the decree appealed from or such part thereof as has been varied or reversed.[215]

In directing restitution, it is to be noted that the parties must be placed in the same position as they were previously in irrespective of any other rights accruing to any of them during the litigation.[216] Thus tenants who had been ejected under a decree of court land who became subsequently entitled to recover possession by way of restitution under the UP Zamindari Abolition and Land Reforms Act, 1951, cannot claim adivasi rights on the basis of section 20(b) of the Act as those rights were created subsequent to their ejectment.[217] Where an order is made against a party for restitution, but restitution is not made, the order may be enforced by sale of his property [section 36].[218]

It is contended on the part of the respondents here (that is, A in the present illustration), that the principal sum being restored to the present petitioners (that is, B in the present illustration), they have no right to recover from them any, interest. It is obvious that, if that is so, injury, and very grave injury, will be done to the petitioners. They will by reason of an act of the court have paid a sum which it is now ascertained was ordered to be paid by mistake and wrongfully. They will recover that sum after lapse of a considerable time, but they will recover it without the ordinary fruit which are derived from the enjoyment of money. On the other hand, those fruits will have been enjoyed, or may have been enjoyed by the person who by mistake and by wrong obtained possession of the money under a judgment which, has been reversed. So far, therefore, as principle is concerned, their Lordships have no doubt or hesitation in saying that injustice will be done to the petitioners, and that the perfect judicial determination, which it must be the object of all courts to arrive at, will not have been arrived at unless the persons who have, had their money improperly taken from them have the money restored to them, with interest, during the time that the money has been withheld.

These observations apply equally to mesne profits which form the subject of the next illustration.

(iii) A obtains a decree against B for possession of certain immovable property and in execution of the decree obtains possession of the property. The decree is subsequently reversed in appeal. B is entitled to possession of the property together with mesne profits during the period of dispossession.[221] If the property has, in the meantime, been let out by A to tenants, B is entitled to remove any tenant who refuses to vacate.[222]

(iv) A obtained a decree against B for possession. B filed an appeal against the decree and obtained stay of delivery. The appeal was allowed and the suit dismissed. Against the dismissal, A preferred a second appeal and that was allowed and the decree of the trial court restored. A applied in restitution for mesne profits from the date of the stay order of the first appellate court to the date of the decree of the second appellate court. It was held that he was entitled to do so under this section.[223]

[s 144.8] Restitution—Ambiguous Term

It was observed in South Eastern Coalfields Ltd v State of Madhya Pradesh,[224] as follows:

> The Law of Contracts by John D Calamari and Joseph M Perillo has been quoted by Black to say that 'restitution' is an ambiguous term, sometimes referring to the disgorging of something which has been taken and at times referring to compensation for injury done.
>
> Often, the result in either meaning of the term would be the same.... Unjust impoverishment as well as unjust enrichment is a ground for restitution. If the defendant is guilty of a non-tortious misrepresentation, the measure of recovery is not rigid but, as in other cases of restitution, such factors as relative fault, the agreed upon risks, and the fairness of alternative risk allocations not agreed upon and not attributable to the fault of either party need to be weighed.

[s 144.9] Restitution—Three Senses

In law, the term "restitution" is used in three senses: (i) return or restoration of some specific thing to its rightful owner or status; (ii) compensation for benefits derived from a wrong done to another; (iii) compensation or reparation for the loss caused to another.[225]

[s 144.10] Quantum of Restitution

The quantum of restitution, depending on the facts and circumstances of a given case, may take into consideration not only what the party excluded would have made but also what the party under obligation has or might reasonably have made. There is nothing wrong in the parties demanding being placed in the same position in which they would have been, had the court not intervened by its interim order when at the end of the proceedings the court pronounces its judicial verdict which does not match with and countenance its own interim verdict. Whenever called upon to adjudicate, the court would act in conjunction with what is the real and substantial justice.[226]

[s 144.11] Exclusion of Restitution — Effect

Any opinion to the contrary would lead to unjust if not disastrous consequences. Litigation may turn into a fruitful industry. Though litigation is not gambling yet there is an element of chance in every litigation.

Unscrupulous litigants may feel encouraged to approach the courts, persuading the court to pass interlocutory orders favourable to them by making out a prima facie case when the issues are yet to be heard and determined on merits and if the concept of restitution is excluded from application to interim orders, then the litigant would stand to gain by swallowing the benefits yielding out of the interim order even though the battle has been lost at the end. This cannot be countenanced. Therefore, the successful party finally held entitled to a relief assessable in terms of money at the end of the litigation, is entitled to be compensated by award of interest at a suitable reasonable rate for the period for which the interim order of the court withholding the release of money had remained in operation.[227]

The injury, if any, caused by the act of the court shall be undone and the gain which the party would have earned unless it was interdicted by the order of the court would be restored to or conferred on the party by suitably commanding the party liable to do so.[228]

[s 144.12] Restitution — Not Discretionary

The granting of restitution, however, is not discretionary.[229] The words "so far as may be" are empowering and not discretionary.[230]

[s 144.13] Restitution — Three Conditions

In order that section 144 of the CPC, would be applicable, three conditions are necessary to be satisfied, namely:

(i) the restitution sought must be in respect of the decree or order which had been varied or reversed;

(ii) the party applying for restitution must be entitled to a benefit under a reversing decree or order; and

(iii) the relief claimed must be properly consequential on the reversal or variation of the decree or order.[231]

This is so also where the decree is varied or reversed in other proceedings or where it is modified or set aside in a separate suit filed for that purpose. It arises automatically on the reversal or modification and necessarily carries with it the right to restitution of all that has been done under the erroneous decree[232] and the court in making restitution is bound to restore the parties, as far as they can be restored, to the same position they were in, at the time when the court, by its erroneous action, had displaced them from it.[233]

[s 144.14] Restitution — Properly Consequential

The restitution, moreover, must be "properly consequential" on the variation or reversal of the decree,[234] or on its being modified or set aside.

For the purpose of making such restitution as aforesaid, the court may make any orders, including orders for the refund of costs,[235] and for the payment of interest,[236] damages,[237] compensation and mesne profits,[238] which are property consequential on such variation or reversal. The underlying principle is that when the main judgment or order is varied or reversed on appeal, all orders consequential or depending upon it are affected and wrongs done under them have to be corrected by granting restitution.[239]

[s 144.15] Ordinary Case for Restitution

The ordinary case for restitution is where something has been taken from a party in execution of a decree which has been varied or reversed, but the section is not confined within these precise limits, for a person against whom a decree for possession has been made may very well give up possession without insisting that any process of execution should be taken against him. When a person gives up possession in consequence of a decree, which is afterwards varied or reversed, he is entitled to restitution under this section.[240] The principle applies with equal force whether restitution has or has not been directed in the appellate decree.[241]

[s 144.16] Interim Order

The interim order passed by the court merges into a final decision. The validity of an interim order, passed in favour of a party, stands reversed in the event of final decision going against the party successful at the interim stage. Unless otherwise ordered by the court, the successful party at the end would be justified with all expediency in demanding compensation and being placed in the same situation in which it would have been if the interim order would not have been passed against it. The successful party can demand (a) the delivery of benefit earned by the opposite party under the interim order of the court, or (b) to make restitution for what it has lost; and it is the duty of the court to do so unless it feels that in the facts and on the circumstances of the case, the restitution would far from meeting the ends of justice, would rather defeat the same. Undoing the effect of an interim order by resorting to principles of restitution is an obligation of the party, who has gained by the interim order of the court, so as to wipe out the effect of the interim order passed which, in view of the reasoning adopted by the court at the stage of final decision, the court earlier would not, or ought not, to have passed. There is nothing wrong in an effort being made to restore the parties to the same position in which they would have been if the interim order would not have existed.[242]

[s 144.17] Mesne Profit

As regards mesne profits, the test is not what the party excluded would have made but what the party in possession has or might reasonably have made: Surendra v Sultan.[243] If the landlord has taken possession in execution of a decree against a tenant and the decree is subsequently reversed, the tenant is entitled to get credit for the rent due to himself. In Tagore v Mathura Kanta Das,[244] where a suit for possession by a usufructuary mortgagee and a suit by mortgagors for redemption were tried together and the former was decreed and latter dismissed and the mortgagee obtained possession in execution, but the decree of dismissal was reversed on appeal and an account was directed to be taken and it was found that the mortgagors were entitled to redeem without having to pay anything, it was held that they were entitled to recover possession under this section but that, as regards the claim for mesne profits, the mortgagees were held to have been in possession in their character as mortgagees and were liable to account only as provided in section 76 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.[245] When a decree under which possession has been taken is reversed, mesne profits should be awarded in restitution from the date of dispossession and not merely from the date of the decree of reversal.[246]

[s 144.18] Interest

Interest is part of normal relief given in restitution[247] and that is not controlled by the provisions of the Interest Act[248] of 1839 or 1978.[249] The question has frequently come up for consideration before the courts whether the decree-holder is liable to pay interest on money deposited into the court by the judgment-debtor under O XLI, rule 5, pending an appeal preferred by him and not drawn by him and the decree is thereafter varied or reversed in appeal. Judicial opinion on this question has not been uniform.[250] The trend of the authorities in Madras was in favour of the view that the judgment-debtor was entitled to interest as a matter of course. The question was fully considered by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Pappu v Ramanatha,[251] and on an elaborate review of the decisions, the court thus summed up the law:

> We may now briefly classify the case in which a question of payment of interest as part of restitution might arise: (1) Where money is paid under the erroneous decree to the decree-holder; (2) Where money is deposited in court in satisfaction of the decree and no restriction is placed on the decree-holder drawing the amount; (3) Where money is deposited towards the decree and there is an obstacle to the withdrawal of the amount like furnishing of security, but the decree-holder furnishes such security and draws the amount. (Really in such a case, the obstacle must be held to have been removed, albeit by the act of the decree-holder who thereafter will have the benefit of the money); (4) Where money is deposited towards the decree and there is an obstacle placed like furnishing of security but the decree-holder either because he is unwilling to or unable to furnish the required security, allows the money to remain in court and does not use it. In the first two of the four cases, the decree-holder would be bound to pay interest on the amount which he is obliged in repay from the date of payment of deposit. In the third class of case he will be bound to pay interest on such amount from the date when the obstacle is removed as laid down in AIR 1943 Pat 427. In all the above cases, there is a correlation between the benefit to the decree-holder and the detriment to the other party.

The fourth class of cases presents a difficulty. Normally speaking, the decree-holder would not be liable for interest on moneys which he could not take on account of the conditions imposed as to its withdrawal. This is the case contemplated by Balakrishna Aiyar, J.[252] But even this cannot be laid down as an invariable rule. There may be circumstances in which the court might come to the conclusion notwithstanding the fact that the money was not withdrawn, that the decree-holder should be directed to pay the interest. Those however are exceptional and indeed extraordinary cases.[253] In cases of restitution, interest when awarded must be not only up to the date of the reversing judgment but up to the date when payment is made or the amount withdrawn from the court is re-deposited.[254] If there was an obstacle against withdrawal by the decree-holder, interest would become payable from the date of removal of such obstacle.[255] When agreement for supply of natural gas were entered into between the ONGC and different industries,[256] ONGC was entitled to claim interest from the purchasers for the delayed payment of the principal amount.[257]

Where the mortgagors obtained a decree for redemption and having deposited the amount due under the decree into court recovered possession in execution, and on appeal, the suit was dismissed as time-barred, it was held that while the mortgagees were entitled by way of restitution to recover possession of the properties with mesne profits, the mortgagors were entitled as a matter of equity to credit for interest on the amount deposited by them into court and that it did not matter that the mortgagees had not withdrawn it.[258] Variation of rate of interest ordered in two appeals pertaining to two different banks by the Supreme Court is possible keeping in view rate at which interest was allowed by special courts in two suits.[259]

[s 144.19] Execution of Decree by Trial Court—Appeal does not Become Infructuous

When the decree has been executed the question is whether the appellate court, on the said ground can dismiss the appeal of the appellants without considering the case of the appellants on merits appellate court without considering the provisions of section 144 of CPC has disposed of the appeal. If the appellate court on merits had come to the conclusion that the judgment and decree granted by the trial court shall require to be set aside in such an event appellate court had every power to allow the appeal and dismiss the suit of the plaintiffs by reversing the judgment and decree of the trial court. In such an event, appellants were entitled to invoke the provisions of section 144 of CPC and request the court for restitution. But if appellate court, without considering the provisions of section 144 of CPC and the case of the appellants on merit, has dismissed the appeal as having become infructuous. The procedure followed by the appellate court is bad in law and order of appellate court requires to be set aside.[260]

[s 144.20] Effect of Tripura Land Revenue and Land Reforms Act, 1960 Before Restitution

The respondents had been dispossessed from the suit lands in execution of a decree which then existed in favour of the appellant. The decree was set aside in appeal. As a consequence thereof, the respondents were entitled to be restored possession of the lands. Even if the respondents were unauthorised occupants of the lands, since they were dispossessed in execution of a decree which had been set aside on appeal, they were entitled to restoration of the possession. In the normal course it may be correct to say that possession obtained in execution of a decree has to be restored to the party dispossessed, on the decree being set aside. But a statute has intervened. The Tripura Land Revenue and Land Reforms Act, 1960 contains a vesting provision as a result whereof the land in suit automatically vested in the state government. The statute has taken away the right of possession of the lands of the party who was earlier in possession of the lands. The statutory provision has such a salutary effect that even if somebody was in actual possession of the land on the date of promulgation of the statute, he/she would lose the right to possession and would have to hand over the possession to the state government. Therefore, the respondents do not have any right to ask for possession of the lands by way of restitution.[261]

[s 144.21] Splitting of Claim for Restitution

It has been held by the High Courts of Patna, Calcutta, Madras and Allahabad that the provisions of O II, rule 2 do not apply to a proceeding under this section. A obtains a decree against B for possession of certain immovable property, and recovers possession of the property pursuant to the decree. B appeals from the decree, and the decree is reversed in appeal. B then applies for restitution of the property, and the property is restored to him. Subsequently B applies for mesne profits for the period during which A was in possession of the property. Is B debarred from claiming mesne profits on the ground that he ought to have included the claim for mesne profits in the application for restitution of the property? No.[262] Similarly, a judgment-debtor who applies for and obtains restitution of a sum of money on reversal by the appellate court, of the decree pursuant to which he had paid the sum to the decree-holder, is not precluded from making a fresh application for recovery of interest for the period during which the decree-holder had the use of the money.[263]

[s 144.22] Names of Parties

An application for restitution should not be thrown out merely on the ground that there was a dispute as to whether the defendant was a proprietary concern or a partnership firm.[264] An indivisible decree cannot be interfered with unless all the parties in whose favour such decree was passed are before the court. Hence, where during pendency of an appeal before the Supreme Court, some of the heirs of one of the judgment-debtor are deleted from the array of party at the risk of appellant, it was held since the decree passed in restitution proceeding had been made in favour of the judgment-debtor, any variation of the said decree I not possible in the absence of the judgment-debtor and in whose favour the impugned decree was passed by the high court.[265]

[s 144.23] Inherent Power to Grant Restitution

Section 144 of the CPC is not the fountain source of restitution, it is rather a statutory recognition of a pre-existing rule of justice, equity and fair play. That is why it is often held that even away from section 144, the court has inherent jurisdiction to order restitution so as to do complete justice between the parties.[266]

Section 144 states that on the reversal or modification of a decree or order, the party who received the benefit of any such erroneous decree or order shall restitute to the other party for the loss. The Supreme Court in Citibank NA v Hiten P Dalal[267] has summarised the principles that shall be followed while ordering restitution. It observed thus:

> In the ultimate analysis we find that the law on restitution under Section 144 CPC is quite well settled. It vests expansive power in the court but such power has to be exercised to ensure equity, fairness and justice for both the parties. It also flows from more or less common stand of parties on the principle of law that for ascertaining the value of the property which is no longer available for restitution on account of sale., the court should adopt a realistic and verifiable approach instead of resorting to hypothetical and presumptive value. It is also one of the established propositions that in the context of restitution the court should keep under consideration not only the loss suffered by the party entitled to restitution but also the gain, if any, made by other party who is obliged to make restitution. No unmerited injustice should be caused to any of the parties.

The Supreme Court also held that:

> Section 144 accords a statutory recognition to an already existing rule of justice, equity and fair play and, therefore, even apart from section 144, the courts have inherent jurisdiction to order restitution so as to do complete justice between the parties.

The power of a court to grant restitution is not confined to the cases covered by the provisions of this section. It extends also to cases which do not come strictly within this section. The reason is that a court has an inherent power under section 151 irrespective of this section to order restitution.[268] The power of restitution is not confined to section 144 of the CPC, as the court has inherent power to grant restitution in exercise of power under section 151 of the CPC.[269] It was held in Wahid v Jubeda Begum,[270] that section 144 has no application to orders passed under the Guardian and Wards Act, 1890, as they were not decrees under the CPC and that accordingly, no restitution could be ordered under this section. But this decision is no longer law after the amendment of the section in 1976 under which there can be restitution even when an order is varied or reversed. Where the standard rent fixed by the rent controller under the West Bengal Premises Rent Control Act, 1950, was reduced in appeal, it was held that a claim for restitution of the excess rent paid under the order of the controller was not maintainable under this section but it could be sustained on general principles of restitution.[271]

The principle of restitution will be of no avail as against a party to the suit who get the property otherwise than under the decree or the order of the court. Hence, where the petitioner gets the possession of the property under executive order, its restitution cannot be ordered.[272] In Jai Berham v Kedar Nath Marwari,[273] the Lordships of the Privy Council said:

> It is the duty of the court under section 144 of the Civil Procedure Code to place the parties in the position which they would have occupied for such decree or such part thereof as has been varied or reversed. Nor indeed does this duty or jurisdiction arise merely under the said section. It is inherent in the general jurisdiction of the court to act rightly and fairly according to the circumstances towards all parties involved.

As was said by Cairns, LC, in Rodger v Comptoir descompte de Paris:[274]

> One of the first and highest duties of all courts is to take care that the act of the court does no injury to any of the suitors and when the expression, the act of the court is used, it does not mean merely the act of the primary court, or of any intermediate court of appeal, but the act of the court as a whole from the lowest court which entertains jurisdiction over the matter up to the highest court which finally disposes off the case."

This is also on the principle that a wrong order should not be perpetuated by keeping it alive and respecting it.[275] In Jai Berham's case, a sale in execution of a decree was set aside on the ground that the sale certificate comprised property different from that which was attached. The property was purchased by a stranger to the decree, and the price paid by him in to court was applied towards satisfaction of the decree. The judgment-debtor applied for possession. Their Lordships held that both under section 144 and section 151, the purchaser was entitled to be paid the excess of the purchase price over the mesne profits. This decision, it is submitted, is an authority for the proposition that where an application for restitution does not come strictly within the purview of this section e.g. where the sale alone is set aside in execution proceedings, but the decree is not "varied or reversed",[276] or where the decree and the sale are set aside in a separate suit, the court may entertain the application under the inherent power conferred upon it by section 151. The Allahabad High Court has however taken the view that a case for restitution would fall within the terms of section 144, even when the decree is set aside in a separate suit,[277] or where the court itself sets aside its own ex parte decree.[278] This view has now been confirmed by the Amendment Act, 1976 which declares in express terms, that restitution is available in cases where a decree is set aside or modified in another subsequent suit filed in another court for that purpose. Where subsequent to the decree, the UP Zamindari Abolition and Land Reforms Act, 1951, was enacted and under rule 5 framed under the Act, the suit abated and the decree became a nullity, it was held that this section applied in regard to a claim for restitution based on the statute as the reversal of the decree could not merely be in appeal but also in another suit and even by a process of legislation.[279] The High Courts of Madras,[280] Madhya Pradesh,[281] and Patna[282] have also held that section 144 will apply when the decree or order is reversed, otherwise than in appeal as in an independent proceeding or by legislation. When a sale was set aside on an application under O XXI, rule 90, the judgment-debtor was awarded mesne profits under section 151 from the decree-holder purchaser for the period he was in possession.[283] When the judgment-debtor's property was sold in execution, the execution court impliedly holding that the decree was then alive and the judgment-debtor made a deposit under O XXI, rule 89 and on appeal by the judgment-debtor against another order of the executing court the appellate court held that the decree was barred by limitation and the Allahabad High Court held that the judgment-debtor was entitled on an application to get back his deposit.[284] In another case,[285] A, in execution of a money decree, brought property to sale as of his judgment-debtor and purchased it himself. B and C who held decrees against the same judgment-debtor, applied for rateable distribution. A, therefore, paid the sale proceeds into court and they were rateably distributed between A, B and C. Co-sharers of the judgment-debtor then obtained a decree exempting part of the property from the operation of the sale. The amount available for rateable distribution was, therefore, reduced and A was held entitled to a proportionate refund from B and C. But the Bombay High Court has held that an application under this section cannot be made if the decree under which a party has been deprived of property or other benefit is set aside by a decree in a different suit between some of the parties to the first decree and strangers.[286] This decision is no longer good law after the 1976 amendment of the section which makes restitution available where the decree is set aside or modified in a separate suit. In a decision, the high court held, even before the amendment was made, that the section would apply when a decree is varied or reversed in whichever way such variation or reversal is brought about.[287]

An order of attachment before judgment without following the procedure is void. The defendant can bring it to the notice of the court that the order of attachment was a void order, and was not one which could be acted upon. Defendant could ask the court to recall the same under section 151, as also to review the same under section 144 as being one patently without jurisdiction and void.[288] In a Bombay case, possession of land was delivered under a decree. Subsequently, ad interim stay was granted under O XLI, rule 5. It was held that possession could not be ordered to be restored either under section 144 or under section 151.[289] The plaintiff, in a suit for injunction against the defendants for restraining them from interfering with the construction of a wall in a passage, wrongly obtained an ex parte interim injunction by misleading the court, inasmuch as the sale deed, on the basis of which the plaintiff claimed ownership of the suit property was not placed before the court and the defendants were not heard before passing the order of interim injunction. After obtaining the order, the plaintiff completed the construction of the wall and then applied for the withdrawal of the suit and prayed for dismissal of the injunction application, as "not pressed". It was held that the order passed by the court under section 151 for demolition of the wall would be justified, even if section 144 was not applicable.[290]

In the exercise of their inherent power, the courts have applied the principle of this section to other cases which were not strictly within the terms of the section. Thus, where A sued B to establish his right to a fund in court, and B was allowed to draw the money on giving an undertaking to the court to repay it if A succeeded in the suit, and A succeeded in establishing his title, it was held that though the undertaking given by B did not provide for the payment of interest, the court had inherent power to order B to repay the money with interest.[291]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that a decree, be of any court, including the Apex Court, can be subjected to execution and enforced by different modes, may be, under the provisions of O XXI, rule 35 or section 144 or section 151 of the CPC, depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case, and the imperative need to give quietus to the litigation expeditiously and forever. It is a matter of option of the decree-holder who succeeded in the litigation and it is for the court to execute such decree by applying appropriate provisions for effective enforcement of the decree.[292]

Where a tenant had instituted a suit for possession of immovable property, alleging that he was forcibly dispossessed by the person who claimed to have purchased the property from the landlord, obtained possession in execution of ex parte decree, the application for restitution by the landlord, after having the ex parte decree set aside, cannot be challenged by the tenant on basis of plea that the facts that he was a tenant and was unlawfully dispossessed, should be taken into account to refuse the restitution, when he withdrew the suit after the ex parte decree was set aside. The question of plaintiff being a tenant and having been dispossessed forcibly were the questions, which could not have been validly considered in order to determine an application under section 144 of the CPC. The extent of inquiry under section 144 cannot be enlarged to usurp the jurisdiction of the regular court, especially when that court has the question raised before it, by the parties but was not permitted to adjudicate finally. The court cannot enter upon right of the parties, which were, in fact, the subject matter of the suit and decide them in the proceedings under section 144 of the CPC.[293] The evictee was not considered entitled to restoration of possession in view of the fact that it was a chronic defaulter and did not cooperate in the matter of ascertainment of arrears of rent. Tenant however, could be compensated for the period he had been kept out and awarded Rs 1,00,000 as compensation for the loss caused due to forcible dispossession.[294] So long as the status quo order and ad interim injunction maintaining the possession of the respondent continue to subsist, the execution of the decree in the suit filed by the appellant, though became final without impleading the said respondent is to overreach the order of the injunction and is the abuse of the process of court.[295] Landlord, in suppression of the material fact and in brazen violation of the provisions of West Bengal Municipal Act, succeeded in demolishing the suit premises with the help of police and the chairman of the local corporation. It was held that the court can direct restitution of tenant in demolished premises by directing landlord and municipality to reconstruct the building, if necessary, and put the tenant in original possession.[296]

In an appeal from a preliminary decree, the high court allowed the parties to withdraw, pending the appeal money deposited to the credit of the suit up to the limit of their shares as fixed by the district court. As a result of the appeal, those shares were reduced and when the case went back to the district court for a final decree, that court was entitled under its inherent jurisdiction to order a refund of the amounts overdrawn.[297] The inherent jurisdiction to pass an order in restitution can be exercised by a persona designata entrusted with functions of a court as for example by a district munsiff to whom the decree is transferred for execution under section 66 of the Madras Village Courts Act, 1889.[298]

Municipal corporation is under a statutory obligation to see that public streets are not encroached upon by anyone. In case the encroachment is made, then the same should be got removed at the earliest possible. Thus, where the municipal corporation demolishes the encroachment, during the period when the stay was vacated, a claim for restoration of the demolished structure by invoking provisions and relief under section 144 of the CPC, cannot be granted.[299] In case of unjust enrichment of the government cess and levies, the government is entitled to invoke the doctrine of restitution to recover the unjust enrichment made by the other party.[300] Where a decree is held to be not binding on the plaintiffs, the sale of property in execution of a decree would also not bind them and consequently plaintiffs would be entitled to the restitution of the property.[301]

[s 144.24] Place the Parties in the Position Which They Would Have Occupied but for Such Decree as has Been Reversed, Varied, Modified or Set Aside

These words have to be applied with attention to the substance and reality of the matter. The court of first instance awarded the plaintiff Rs 49 as costs and in execution of this decree for costs two jotes were sold and purchased by the plaintiff. In appeal, the decree was varied and the costs reduced to Rs 36. The defendant then claimed to recover the two jotes by way of restitution. Rankin, CJ held that he could not recover the jotes unless he showed that the sale of the jotes was in substance and in truth a consequence of the error in the original decree. As the defendant gave no evidence that if the original decree had been for Rs 36 he would have been able to pay it and save the jotes, he was only held entitled to recover the difference between the two amounts with interest.[302] A party is not entitled under this section to restitution of property which was not in his possession before suit, but was in possession of the opposite party, and which, therefore, could not have been taken out of his possession under any decree of the court. A applies for letters of administration to the estate of X. B sets up a will of the deceased. The movable properties in dispute are in the possession of B. B delivers the properties to a commissioner appointed by the court who locks them up in a room under seal. The high court directs probate of the will to be granted to B. Thereafter on B's application, the movables are handed over to her. Subsequently, the order of the high court is reversed by His Majesty in Council and letters of administration are directed to be granted to A. A then applies under this section for restitution of the properties to him. A is not entitled to restitution. The case is not one of restitution at all, for A was never in possession of the properties.[303] Again, the plaintiff sued for redemption of a mortgage and deposited the mortgage money in court and the court allowed redemption but directed that the plaintiff should get possession of only three out of the four properties mortgaged. The lower appellate court varied the decree and directed that plaintiff should have possession of the fourth property also. The plaintiff then applied for mesne profits of the fourth property from the date of deposit of the mortgage money until he got possession. The high court held that the claim was not maintainable under section 144 as the plaintiff had not been in possession of the fourth property.[304] But the fact that the property had been taken from a receiver appointed by the court does not affect the right of the true owner to restitution, for, the receiver was in possession on behalf of the true owner.[305]

As a result of the amendment of sub-section (1), parties have to be placed in the position which they would have occupied but for such decree or order, or even a part thereof as has been varied, reversed or set aside or modified in the same proceedings or in appeal or other proceeding or a separate suit in another court.

The word "consequentially" lays emphasis on the obligation of the party to the suit or proceedings which received the benefit of the erroneous decree to make restitution to the other party for what he has lost. The court, therefore, is bound to restore the parties as far as they can be, to the same position, they were at the time, when the court, by its erroneous action, has displaced them from it. Equally, where a sum of money was recovered in execution by a decree which was subsequently reversed or varied, the judgment-debtor is entitled to get back not only the sum recovered but also the interest thereon or damages or compensation for the period that the amount has been retained by him. The owner or the person interested in the land when recovered the compensation under the award and decree which was reversed, varied or modified on appeal, the court is empowered under section 144 of the CPC, to restitute the amount to the state with interest or quantified damages or by way of compensation. Since granting of interest or damages or compensation is consequential to the variation, reversal or setting aside the enhanced compensation.[306]

[s 144.26] Who may Apply for Restitution

"Any party entitled to any benefit by way of restitution or otherwise" may apply under this section.

[s 144.26.1] Where Decree Proceeds on a Common Ground

The expression "any party" is not confined to parties to the appeal in which the decree has been reversed or modified. It includes every person against whom the decree appealed from was passed, though he was not a party to the appeal, provided, the appeal is in effect and substance in favour of such person.[307] This would especially be the case where the decree appealed from proceeds on a ground common to all the plaintiffs or to all the defendants.[308] A obtains a decree against B and C. The decree proceeds on a ground common to both B and C. B alone appeals from the decree. The decree is reversed in appeal. C is entitled to claim restitution under this section, though he was not a party to the appeal. This is so because as the Calcutta High Court has pointed out the word "party" used in the section does not mean only a party in the technical senses. The words "entitled to any benefit by way of restitution or otherwise" are intended to include any beneficiary under the final judgment it be in the technical sense a party or not in the suit or appeal.[309]

Where a decree for damages was passed jointly against A, B and C and the amount was deposited into court by C and on an appeal preferred by A and B, the amount was reduced and then A and B applied for restitution, of the excess amount, it was held that C, who had paid the amount alone was entitled to apply for restitution and that, accordingly, an order made on the application of A and B was without jurisdiction and the sale held in execution of that order was null and void.[310] Where a decree was passed ex parte against A, B and C and their properties sold in execution and subsequently the ex parte decree was set aside as against A who thereafter applied for redelivery of possession and for mesne profits, it was held that the relief should be limited to his half share in the properties and proportionate mesne profits and that B and C could not claim restitution.[311]

[s 144.26.2] Transferee of a Decree

Further, the expression "any party" includes the transferee of a decree passed in appeal. A obtains a decree against B for Rs 5000. B appeals from the decree. Pending the appeal, A realises from B Rs 5000 in execution. The decree is subsequently reversed in appeal. B assigns the decree passed in appeal (in his favour) to C. C is entitled, as transferee of B's decree, to the benefit of that decree and he may apply under this section for an order directing A to pay him what B would be entitled to, namely, Rs 5000 and interest.[312]

[s 144.26.3] Auction-Purchaser

A sale in execution of a decree may be set aside in a proper case even against a purchaser who is a stranger to the decree, either in execution proceedings, or in a separate suit, e.g., where the sale certificate comprises property different from that which is attached,[313] or when a decree is obtained on a mortgage executed by a Hindu father on behalf of himself and his minor son, and the decree and the sale of the mortgaged property, in execution of the decree are set aside in a suit by the minor against the decree-holder and the auction-purchaser on the ground that the mortgage does not bind the minor.[314] But the auction-purchaser is entitled in such cases, before restoring possession to the judgment-debtor, to be paid the purchase price by the successful judgment-debtor, less the mesne profits, if the sale is set aside in execution proceedings, under this section,[315] and, if the sale is set aside by a decree in a separate suit, under section 47 or section 151.[316] It has been held by the High Court of Rangoon that an auction-purchaser, who is not a party to the original suit or to the appeal or to the execution proceedings, is not entitled to apply under this section.[317] A party seeking restitution is not required to satisfy the court about its title or right to the property save and except showing its deprivation under a decree and the reversal of variation of the decree.[318]

[s 144.26.4] Authorised Representatives

The appellant was described as a firm and the person through whom the petition was defended in the trial court, filed application for restitution under section 144, on reversal of decree in appeal. The plaintiff objected as to maintainability of the application under section 144, on behalf of the said authorised representative, on the ground that the applicant is not the defendant from whom the possession had been recovered. The objection was dismissed as the description of the petitioner in the application for restitution being the same as in the decree court.[319]

[s 144.27] Against Whom Restitution may be Claimed

[s 144.27.1] Transferee of Decree Reversed in Appeal

In two Allahabad cases, decided under the old section, it was held that restitution could not be claimed by application under that section against the transferee of a decree reversed in appeal, though the transferee had obtained the full benefit of the decree by execution, unless he was joined as a party to the appeal.[320] The point of the decision may be explained by an illustration. A obtains a decree against B, and assigns the decree to C. C applies for execution of the decree against B, and obtains payment of the decretal amount. B appeals from the decree, and the decree is reversed in appeal. It was held under the old section that B could not claim restitution against C by summary process under that section unless C was joined as a party to the appeal.[321] But this decision has been dissented from and the High Court of Madras holds that a judgment-debtor from whom the assignee of a decree has realised the decretal amount in execution, is entitled to restitution when the decree is reversed on appeal.[322] On the other hand, in a Calcutta case, A obtained an ex parte decree for possession against B and leased the land to C. The ex parte decree was set aside and A's suit dismissed. B then applied for restoration of possession. The court held that he was entitled to an order as against A but not as against A's lessee C. This was said to be on the principle that restitution can only be had in respect of matters done under the decree or as an immediate consequence of it and that the summary procedure under section 144 is wholly unsuited for adjudicating the complicated questions that may arise if rights which strangers may have acquired in the meantime are to be investigated.[323] This case has been dissented from by an Allahabad Judge on the ground that the decree-holder's lessee is a representative of the decree-holder and the winning party is entitled to restitution free from all encumbrances created by the holder of the reversed decree.[324] The Bombay High Court has also dissented from the Calcutta decision and held that an order for restitution can be made against representatives in interest of the party liable to make restitution.[325] In a Gauhati case, decree-holder, having obtained possession of a property in execution, sold it to a third party. Subsequently, on the decree being reversed, the judgment-debtor applied for restitution. The third party who had purchased it from the decree-holder cannot resist restitution on the ground that his purchase was bona fide.[326]

Where in execution of a decree for specific performance, the plaintiff got possession of the properties and then transferred them to another person and the decree was then reversed on appeal, it was held that the defendants were entitled to get restitution under this section from the transferees from the original decree-holder.[327] Where in execution of an order of the rent controller for ejectment of a tenant, the landlord obtained possession of the lands and inducted new tenants and thereafter in a suit filed by the evicted tenant, the court declared the order of the rent controller illegal and void, it was held that the tenant was entitled to an order for possession under this section against the tenants inducted by the landlord.[328] In Manikchand v Gangadhar,[329] the landlord obtained a decree in ejectment against the defendant and got into possession after evicting the defendant's tenants and inducted his own tenants. The decree was reversed in appeal and thereafter the defendant applied for restitution against the plaintiff and the tenants inducted by him. It was held that though the premises were, on the date of the order, in actual possession of tenants, the defendant was entitled to recover khas possession in restitution and that further he was entitled to an order in restitution against the tenants inducted by the plaintiff.

The suit for arrears of rent, filed by the plaintiff as a trustee against the tenant, was decreed by the lower court pending the second appeal. The high court stayed execution of the decree, on the tenant depositing certain amount for payment to plaintiff. The second appeal was allowed and the decree was reversed on the ground that the plaintiff had no locus standi to file the suit as a trustee. In such a case, in view of the fact that the suit was filed by the plaintiff, on behalf of the trust, if the plaintiff had withdrawn the amount deposited by the tenant in pursuance of the interim order of the high court as a defect trustee and used the same for the purpose of the trust, then only the trust would be liable to pay back the amount to the tenant by way of restitution under section 144. But if the plaintiff had utilised the amount for his own purposes, then he would be bound to pay back the amount to the tenant.[330]

The Madras High Court has held that restitution can be claimed against a decree-holder who has attached and realised in execution of a decree which has been reversed on appeal.[331]

This is on the ground that the attaching decree-holder is for the purposes of execution a representative of the original decree-holder. The Madras High Court, in Rego v Ananthamathi, extended the scope of restitution under section 151. In that case, A had executed a mortgage in favour of B, alleging the mortgaged properties to be his self acquired properties. The mortgagee sued him and in the suit joined his sons C and D also as parties. C and D pleaded that the properties were ancestral family properties and the mortgage was not binding on the family properties. The trial court overruled their defence and passed a mortgage decree. During the pendency of the appeal by the sons, the mortgaged properties were sold and were purchased by the decree-holder A. Thereupon, the sons made a deposit under O XXI, rule 89. X, a creditor of A attached a portion of the deposit money and the portion attached was paid to him. Thereafter, the appeal of the sons was allowed and the mortgage-decree was set aside. Thereafter, the sons applied for refund from A's creditor, the sum of the deposit taken by them. It was held that as X had not attached the mortgage decree, he was not a representative of A, so the case did not come under section 144, but still the court could direct X to refund under section 151.

[s 144.27.3] Auction-purchaser

Except in cases of the kind mentioned under the heading "Who may apply for restitution", restitution cannot be obtained under this section against a bona fide purchaser for value at an auction-sale held by a court which had jurisdiction to order the sale.[332] A stranger, who had purchased at the court sale pending an appeal, would be regarded as a bona fide purchaser even if he was aware of the pendency of the appeal; otherwise sales held pending appeal would not be likely to fetch proper price.[333] It is otherwise, however, where the decree-holder, himself is the purchaser.[334] The Patna High Court has held that restitution can be ordered under the section, against a stranger purchaser provided he was aware of the merits of the controversy in regard to the property purchased by him and was also aware that the validity of the decree was under challenge.[335] An assignee from a decree-holder auction-purchaser cannot be equated with a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Persons who purchase at a court auction, who were strangers to the decree, are afforded protection by the court, because they are not any way connected with the decree. Unless they are assured of title; the court-auction would not fetch a good price and would be detrimental to the decree-holder. When outsiders purchase from a decree-holder, who is an auction-purchaser, clearly their title depends upon the title of the decree-holder auction-purchaser. It is defeasible title, liable to be defeated if the decree is set aside. A person, who takes an assignment of the property of such a purchaser, is expected to be aware of the defeasibility of the title of his assignor.[336]

A suit for declaration of title and confirmation of possession was dismissed by the trial Court on ground of limitation as the plaintiff did not move court from the date possession was delivered to the auction-purchasers. The appellate court reversed the finding by holding that the plaintiffs were found in possession of the suit land and it cannot be said that the suit was barred by limitation. Moreover, in an appeal filed against auction-sale the entire procedure of auction-sale was set aside. It was held by the Jharkhand High Court that the order of the first appellate court allowing the suit of plaintiffs cannot be said to be illegal or erroneous and no interference is called for.[337] MY Eqbal, J, observed in the above decision as follows:

> From the aforesaid order passed by this Court it is clear that although delivery of possession of auction sold property was taken by the defendants but that remained on paper only and the possession of the suit land actually remained with the plaintiffs at all point of time. Even assuming that by virtue of auction sale the defendants alleged to have come in possession of the suit property, but the auction sale having been set aside, the defendants cannot be allowed to become the owner of the property on alleged plea of adverse possession. It is well settled that Section 144, CPC is not an exhaustive provision but there are various circumstances in which restitution is to be ordered to restore status quo ante for the ends of justice. The Court has inherent power to grant restitution even in such case where Section 144, CPC does not apply.[338]

[s 144.27.4] Surety

This section applies only to the parties or their representatives and does not apply to sureties. Hence, restitution cannot be claimed under this section against a surety.[339]

[s 144.27.5] Bona Fide Purchaser for Value

The proceedings before the Supreme Court are a continuation of those in the original suit and the principle of lis pendens as well as restitution shall apply to proceedings before the Supreme Court.[340]

[s 144.27.6] Tenant

Where the landlord evicted the tenant in execution of an ex parte eviction decree but later on the eviction decree is set aside and that order has become final, the landlord becomes liable to restore possession of the premises to the tenant. The effect of setting aside the decree is that there is no eviction decree against the tenant and therefore, the landlord cannot claim or retain possession of the tenant premises. If another tenancy has been created by the landlord, the inductee or the new tenant would be liable to be dispossessed as per law. The new tenant would be deriving his title to the premises only from the landlord and if the landlord's own title was defected or not legal, he could not bestow a better title on the alleged tenant. Even if a fresh tenancy is created by the landlord in favour of the third party who had no knowledge of litigation between the landlord and the present tenant, on the ex parte eviction decree in favour of the landlord being set aside, he was bound to restore possession of the premises to the tenant judgement-debtor.[341]

as available to it under section 149(2) of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988, in view of the language of section 149 (7), and the mandate in Itbar's case. And at the same time, the insurer cannot be made liable otherwise than in accordance with sections 149(1) and (2) of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988. Of course, as held by the Supreme Court in S Kandia Insurance Co's case,[342] as also in Kamla's case[343] and Lehru's case,[344] it is for the insurer to prove the defence, in order to successfully avoid its liability. Likewise, in view of CM Jaya's case[345] read with the RSRTC's case,[346] the insurer cannot be compelled to make payment of any amount beyond the limits of its liability, so as to, or expressly leaving it open, to the insurer to recover the amount, either wholly, or the excess part from the insured.[347]

The entire awarded compensation, seldom reaches the hands of the claimants, intact. While in the event of enforcing restitution, the insurer would obviously recover back the entire amount, and then the difficulties, the decree holder claimant is expected to face, in realising the amount from the owner, or driver by executing the award, can very well be comprehended, even in some rare cases, where, the owner or driver is possessed of means capable of satisfying the decree, leaving apart cases where the owner or driver are not possessed of sufficient means. It is to take care of this situation that the provisions of section 149(4) and (5) of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1988 can be interpreted, to be in the nature of an exception to section 144, CPC rather as an exception to the aforementioned established legal principle "actus curie namimum gravbit", and they have been so interpreted, with a view to make the relief provided to the claimants as real as possible, leaving the difficulties of the insurer to rest in the realm of "the Insurer's misfortune" as observed by the Supreme Court in Itbar's case.[348] The provisions of sections 149 (4) and (5), on being so interpreted, to provide non-restitution from the claimants, even in the event of the award of the learned tribunal being varied, reversed, or modified in the insurer's appeal and while upholding the claim, exonerating the insurer, clearly upholds the purpose and philosophy of this beneficial legislation and extends enough protection to the claimants.[349]

It cannot be laid down as a legal proposition that in every case even where the insurer is able to properly take and prove, one or more of the defences provided by section 149 (2) of the new Motor Vehicles Act, 1988, or for that matter section 96(2) of the old Act, yet the insurer should make the payment to the claimant, and then should always be left only to recover from the insured. Of course, if for any reason, or under any circumstances, somehow the insurer happens to make payment of the awarded amount, which award subsequently happens to be varied, reversed, or modified in appeal, then in that event the insurer would be entitled to recover back the amount from the insured, instead of the claimants, only, in cases where the insured is found liable, however, if the claim is completely dismissed, then of course, the ordinary principles of section 144, Code of Civil Procedure would be attracted.[350]

There was no sub-section (2) to section 583 of the CPC 1882. Under that section, proceedings for execution had to be commenced by an application for exemption of the appellate decree. This was required by the very terms of the section. The section also required that the appellate decree should be executed "according to the rules prescribed for the execution of decree in suits." These words gave rise to the question whether the rule contained in section 244 (now section 47) which provided that all questions relating to execution should be determined by the court executing the decree and not by a separate suit, was one of the rules referred to in section 583. It was held, in some cases, that it was, and that a separate suit for restitution was therefore barred. In other cases it was held that a separate suit could be maintained for restitution.[351] The section as redrafted in 1908 omitted all references to execution. It was also transferred from the chapter headed "Of appeals from original decrees" to Part IX headed "Miscellaneous". A new sub-section, sub-section (2) was added to end the controversy and which in express terms barred a separate suit where an application for restitution lay under the section. The court, under the section, is empowered to make such orders as it deems proper for restitution. Such order, if not complied with, can be enforced as a decree[352] (see also section 36). The Amendment Act, 1976 has made no change in sub-section (2).

It must be observed that the suit that is barred under this section is a suit to obtain restitution, compensation or other relief which could be obtained by application under this section. Therefore, if restitution could be had, not under this section, but under section 151 in the inherent jurisdiction, a suit would not be barred. Thus, if a sale is set aside on an application under O XXI, rule 90, a suit for mesne profits will not be barred.[353] Likewise, when an execution sale is set aside under section 23 of the Madras Agriculturist Relief Act, 1938, a suit by the judgment-debtor to recover possession is not barred under this section as the right to restitution arises under section 151 of the CPC.[354] Again, compensation awarded under this section is consequential on the variation or reversal of the decree. It follows that if the compensation claimed is not consequential on such variation or reversal, a separate suit for such compensation will not be barred under this section.[355] Where the plaintiffs obtained possession of lands in execution of a decree and that was modified by consent in appeal by declaring that all the parties were jointly entitled to the lands and to certain cash allowances, it was held that while the defendants were entitled to ask for joint possession by way of restitution, no claim can be made for sharing of cash allowances under this section, as that was not consequential on the reversal of any decree.[356] Where an auction-purchaser, in execution of a decree, redeemed a mortgage to which the properties were subject and the sale was subsequently set aside, it was held that he was not entitled to recover, in restitution, the amount paid by him in discharge of the mortgage and that his remedy as to enforce his claim in an independent, suit.[357] Where in execution of a decree, the decree-holder was put in possession of a larger area of land than he was entitled to, and he demolished certain constructions standing on the lands, it was held that while the judgment-debtor was entitled to recover possession of the excess area in restitution under section 151, the claim for compensation for demolition of buildings must be enforced in an independent suit.[358] Where a landlord obtained possession of demised properties in execution of an ex parte decree and then by order of the Calcutta Corporation, one of the structures standing on the land which was in a dilapidated condition was demolished, it was held that on the setting aside of the ex parte decree, the defendant was entitled to get restitution of land but that his claim for compensation as regards the structure could not be enforced in restitution.[359] Conversely, where the plaintiff obtained possession of house in execution of a decree and effected improvements and on the reversal of the decree, the defendant applied for restitution, the plaintiff has no right to put forward in those proceedings a claim for improvements made by him.[360] A tenant had got the possession of the first floor, on account of the temporary injunction, which he had obtained in a civil suit. The suit was subsequently withdrawn by him and the temporary injunction stood vacated. It was held that he must restore the possession of the first floor to the landlord under section 144 of the CPC. On the facts, application for restitution was held to be the only remedy available to the landlord, since a fresh suit was barred by section 144(2).[361]

[s 144.29] Decree

An order for rateable distribution made under section 73 is not a decree within the meaning of this section.[362] After the addition of the words "or order" by the Amendment Act, 1956, the section applies in cases of orders also.[363]

[s 144.30] Where a Decree or Order is Varied or Reversed or Set Aside or Modified

The text of the old section 583 set out earlier, shows that section applied only where the decree of reversal was a decree passed in first appeal or where by virtue of section 587 (now section 108] it was one passed in second appeal. It did not apply where restitution was claimed on reversal of a decree in appeal to the Privy Council[364] or in review by the same court.[365] This was because of the words "under a decree passed in an appeal under this chapter" (i.e., chapter 41 relating to appeals from original decrees) occurring in section 583. The CPC recast the section in wider terms and was consequently held to be applicable when a decree was varied or reversed on appeal by the Privy Council.[366] By the addition, in 1956, of the words "or order", the remedy by way of restitution has been made available where an order is varied or reversed.

There was, nonetheless, a conflict of judicial opinion on the question whether the section applied where variation or reversal of a decree occurred in consequence of a decree passed in a subsequent suit filed in another court for that purpose. The Madras High Court took the view that the section applied, howsoever, the decree was varied or reversed, even if it be by a separate suit. There the transferee of a mortgage-decree obtained an order recognising the transfer and then executed the decree. The judgment-debtor then filed a suit for a declaration that the transfer was invalid. His suit ended in a decree in his favour. The high court held that the judgment-debtor was entitled to restitution under this section, to the extent of the amount realised in execution by the transferee.[367] In reaching this conclusion, the high court relied on the Privy Council case of Shama Prasad v Harro Prasad[368] where Turner, LJ referred to the rule that money recovered under a decree or judgment cannot be recovered back in a fresh suit or action whilst the decree or judgment under which it was realised, remained in force and said that the rule did not apply if the original decree or judgment had been reversed or superseded by some ulterior proceeding.[369] In Jogendra Nath Singh v Hira Sahu,[370] a Full Bench of the High Court of Allahabad after considering a number of decisions held that there was no reason why the words "varied or reversed", though commonly applicable to a case where a decree had been set aside on appeal or revision by a superior court, could not be applied, also to a case where the decree has been set aside or varied by some other court, even if that court was competent to vary or set it aside. They also observed that the words "the court of first instance" in sub-section (1) only made it clear that the application for restitution could be made to the first court and not to any of the superior courts. For example, if a suit had been dismissed by the trial court and then on appeal, the plaintiff's suit had been decreed but it was subsequently held that the decree was vitiated by fraud or want of jurisdiction or for any other reason, the application for restitution would have to be made to the first court even though the decree was passed by the appellate court. In a later case, the same high court also held that a decree could be varied or reversed by a subsequent legislation, such as abatement of proceedings under rule 5 of the rules framed under the UP Zamindari Abolition and Law Reforms Act, 1951, and restitution in such an event could be claimed under this section.[371] This view has also been shared by the Madhya Pradesh High Court.[372] The Patna High Court also took the view that the expression "varied or reversed" was unqualified and ought to receive full force and effect. A decree, it said, may be varied or reversed not only in appeal or revision before a superior court but could also be varied or reversed in review by the same court which passed it, or by another court in another suit, such as where such decree was obtained by fraud or for want of jurisdiction. The section did not prescribe for an order of restitution to be made in a particular forum or proceeding or by any particular court.[373] The Madhya Pradesh High Court went a step further and held that there can be a reversal or variation of a decree by an order or direction in a writ proceeding, exclusion of which from the operation of section 144 would not be a correct way of interpretation of this section.[374]

Rankin, CJ, on the other hand, in Gopal Paroi v Swarna Bewa,[375] expressed dissent against the Madras decision and said:

> But if the decree is set aside either by a proceeding in the suit itself or if it is set aside by a decree in another suit altogether or if, without being set aside by such a decree is 'Superseded' to use the language of Turner, LJ in a Privy Council case these are matters which are not within the words of the section. 'Varied or reversed' has a quite different > meaning for lawyers in this country and it appears to me that the observation in the case of Subbarayudu v Seshasani[376] failed to take account of the correct use of language in this matter.

The learned Chief Justice accordingly, held that the section applied only when a decree was varied or reversed by a superior court on appeal or revision or on reference and expressed concurrence with Calcutta and, Patna cases which had taken that view.[377] This view was also adopted by Lahore High Court.[378] But soon after Gopal Paroi's case, there emerged a difference of opinion in the Calcutta High Court itself when in Ramnath Karmarkar v Shaikh Asanulla,[379] Mukerji, J held that the words "court of first instances" in sub-section (1) pointed to the intention of the legislature to confine the applicability of the section only to cases where variation or reversal had been made or was the consequence of an order passed by a superior court. However, Guha J sitting with him accepted the wider construction of the section as adopted by the Madras High Court. In Shivappa v Ramlingappa,[380] the Bombay High Court also held that the reversal or variation of the decree must be in the same proceedings between the same parties on appeal against the decree, or in review, or in any other manner, provided by the CPC, but not in another suit not connected with the suit in which the application for restitution has been made. But in a decision, a division bench of the high court, though concerned with the application for restitution arising out of setting aside of an ex parte decree under O IX, rule 13 observed that there was great preponderance of judicial opinion in support of a liberal interpretation of the section and that was that this section would apply whenever a decree was varied or reversed, howsoever such variation or reversal thereof was effected.[381] The Patna High Court, however, following the line of thought adopted by Rankin CJ held that if an ex parte decree has been set aside, restitution cannot be had under this section but can be had under the inherent jurisdiction.[382] Some cases have, however, accepted the Madras interpretation and held that where an ex parte decree is set aside, restitution can be had under this section.[383] In some cases where a decree or order was superseded, reference was made to section 47.[384] A suit under O XXI, rule 63 has been considered as an appeal against the order passed in the claim case and so cost decreed in the claim case and paid by him, was held to be recoverable under this section by the successful plaintiff in the suit under O XXI, rule 63.[385]

Parliament has, by the Amendment Act, 1976, stepped in and resolved the conflict of judicial opinion by substituting the words "varied or reversed in any appeal, revision or other proceeding or is set aside or modified in any suit instituted for the purposes" in place of the words "varied or reversed" in sub-section (1), thereby accepting the wider interpretation given to sub-section (1) by the Madras and Allahabad High Courts, that remedy by way of restitution under this section is available not only where a decree or order is varied or reversed in appeal or revision to a superior court, but also where such decree or order is varied or reversed in the same proceedings, before the same court or where it is set aside or modified by another court in another suit filed for that purpose. In a decision, the Calcutta High Court has held that the word "reverse" has a wide connotation including the setting aside of an ex parte decree by the trial court itself, under O IX, rule 13 and the Parliament has confirmed such an interpretation by adding the words "in any appeal, revision or other proceeding" after the words "varied or reversed" in sub-section (1) as amended by the Amendment Act, 1976.[386]

Where there is no decree or order passed by a court which is either reversed or varied by the appellate court and the appellate court ordered restitution under section 151 of the Code ignoring section 144, it could not adjudicate the matter. Revision against the order of restoration against status quo under Article 227 of the Constitution is maintainable. The question whether appeal was available against such order and decree passed by the trial court is also one of the questions to be considered.[387]

Where a suit for declaration and possession was dismissed by the first appellate court and the order of dismissal was affirmed in second appeal, the Supreme Court held that the appellant in ordinary course would be entitled to possession of suit land from the receiver appointed during the pendency of the suit and the impugned order of the high court rejecting restitution is liable to be set aside.[388]

The term "set aside" in section 144, would carry the same meaning as in O IX, rule 13. Even if the provisions of section 144 (as amended) are not attracted, the inherent power of the court may be exercised to order restitution where a party has been injured by act of the court.[389] Restitution is now available even when the decree is set aside under O IX, rule 13 of the CPC.[390]

The claim for restitution has to be in respect of matters properly consequential on variation, reversal, setting aside or modification of the decree or order. In Lal Bhagwan Singh v Sri Kishendas,[391] a decree declared the amount payable by the judgment-debtors and provided that in case they failed to pay it, their properties should be sold to the decree-holders. The judgment-debtors committed default and the properties were sold to the decree-holders and put in their possession in execution. Thereafter, the decretal amount was reduced under the provisions of the UP Encumbered Estates (Amendment) Act, 1951, which was enacted subsequently. The judgment-debtor applied under this section for the cancellation of the sale and for recovery of possession and mesne profits. The Supreme Court held that as the judgment-debtors were not in a position to have paid even the reduced amount at the time of the execution, the sale was inevitable and therefore relief by way of restitution could not be granted as it was not consequential to the modification of the decree. A similar result would follow where the decretal amount is reduced in appeal but it is not proved that the judgment-debtor could have paid off the reduced amount ultimately decreed and thus prevented the sale.[392]

When the decree is neither varied nor reversed, but only the sale is set aside on an application under O XXI, rule 90, it was held that this section would not apply but relief by way of restitution could be claimed under section 151.[393] The question whether restitution was ordered under this section or under the inherent jurisdiction was hardly a matter of practical importance except when a question under sub-section (2) arose as regards the bar of suit.[394] After the addition of "Order" in sub-section (1) by the Amendment Act, 1956, restitution in such cases, can be claimed under this section and not under section 151.

Restitution can be claimed not only when the decree or order is reversed but also when it is varied, or set aside or modified in another proceeding or even a subsequent suit filed for that purpose. Thus, if A obtains a decree against B for Rs 1000 and in execution, B's property is sold and purchased by A himself, and the decree is varied in appeal by reducing the amount to Rs 100, the court has power under this section to order A to restore the property to B on payment of Rs 100 by B.[395] A similar order would be made where the decree is superseded in another suit filed for that purpose. A decree formally drawn up is not necessary.[396]

[s 144.31] Independent Suit when Required

Plaintiff's suit for declaration of title and for permanent injunction was decreed by the first court. On appeal by the defendants, the claim of the plaintiff in respect of the remaining portion was dismissed. The plaintiff preferred second appeal to the high court and there was a cross-objection by the defendant. The second appeal by the plaintiff was dismissed by the high court and the cross-objection by the defendant was allowed, dismissing the suit as a whole. Some of the defendants (with the consent of other defendants) took out execution petition for delivery of possession of the premises, demolishing the construction made thereon by the plaintiff. The plaintiff contested this move of the defendants, stating that the defendants could not ask for such independent reliefs. However, the lower court granted the reliefs to the defendants under section 144. It was held that section 144 did not apply. It was not the case of the defendants that the plaintiff had obtained possession pursuant to a court order or in consequence of, or under the colour of an order of the first court, or the decree of the lower appellate court. The defendants claimed that the plaintiff got into possession unlawfully, and the proper remedy was only by way of an independent suit.[397] In second appeal against a decree of ejectment, the high court granted stay on condition that certain amount should be deposited by the defendant. Because of the commencement of consolidation proceedings, the second appeal abated high court, directed that the amount deposited should be paid to the party that was successful in the consolidation proceedings. It was held that in view of the order of a superior court (high court) the trial court was not competent to order refund of the deposited amount.[398]

[s 144.32] The Court Which Passed the Decree

Before the Amendment Act, 1976 altered the section, the section provided that it would be the court of first instances which could grant relief by way of restitution. The principle is that it is the court which has passed an erroneous decree or order which must rectify its error and place the parties in the position which they would have occupied, but for such decree or order, as has been varied or reversed. Where a decree or order is varied or reversed by a superior court in its appellate or revisional jurisdiction, there would be no difficulty, since it would be the court of first instance which passed the decree which was varied or reversed which would be the court where an application for restitution would have to be made. The superior court, which varied or reversed the decree or order, cannot be called upon to grant the relief by way of restitution because it is not that court which has to rectify its error. Indeed, it is not even necessary for such superior court to include, in its judgment, a direction ordering restitution; but where a decree or order is set aside or modified in a separate suit, filed in another court, for instance, on the ground of fraud or want of jurisdiction, the question would be which is the court of first instances in such a case, the court which in the first instance passed the decree or order or the court which set it aside or modified it. To clarify the position, the amendment Acts has substituted the words "the court which passed the decree or order" for the words "the court of first instance" and added an explanation defining the expression the "court which passed the decree or order." Clause (a) of the Explanation provides that where the decree or order has been varied or reversed by a superior court on appeal or revision, it is the court of first instance to which application for restitution is to be made and not the superior court. This is so, because it is the court of first instance which passed the erroneous decree or order, which it must rectify. Clause (b) provides that where the decree or order has been set aside or modified in a separate suit, filed in another court, it is again the court of first instance which has to rectify its error and there it is that court and not the court which has superseded the erroneous decree or order which has to rectify its error. Clause (c) makes provision for the situation where the court of first instance has ceased to exist or has ceased to have jurisdiction to execute it. A court ceases to exist where, for instance, it is abolished. It ceases to have jurisdiction where a part of its jurisdictional area is transferred or shifted to another court or where some special jurisdiction conferred upon it is withdrawn. Clause (c) gives a wider meaning to the expression "court which passed the decree" for the purposes of applications for restitution in that it empowers the court which, if the suit wherein the decree or order was made were instituted at the time of making the application for restitution, would have jurisdiction to try such suit.

The application for restitution is to be made to the court of first instance. The Supreme Court cannot grant restitution, the same can only be done by the trial court.[399] Section 144(1) clearly indicates that it is a "court of first instance, in which the proceedings in the suit had been initiated and a decree was passed or the suit was dismissed, but subsequently on appeal decreed or vice-versa. The court of first instance would, therefore, mean the court which passed the decree or order. The transferee executive court is not the court that passed the decree or order since the property sought to be executed or the person who is liable for execution is situated or residing within the jurisdiction of that executive court.[400]

Where the decree passed by the Andhra Pradesh High Court in partition suit was transmitted to Bangalore Court for execution and the latter court executed it but subsequently the decree was set aside by the Andhra Pradesh High Court, and interim order that the decree should not be executed, was passed, it is the Bangalore Court which was competent to entertain the application under section 144 of the CPC and could pass order for restoration of possession.[401]

The words "the courts of first instance" in clauses (a) and (b) mean the court which decided the case in the first instance. The right to apply for restitution is vested in the party to make such application before the court of first instance whose decree or order has been varied or reversed. It is the court which passes the wrong order on account of the reversal of which the right of restitution arises which is the proper court to entertain the application for restitution.[402] In a suit for ejectment under the Agra Tenancy Act, 1910, the court of first instance is the revenue court which heard the suit and not the court of appeal.[403] If the court of first instance has been abolished or has ceased to have jurisdiction, it would be the court which, if the suit wherein the decree or order was passed were instituted at the time of making the application for restitution, would have jurisdiction to try such suit, which can give relief of restitution.[404] The court to which the decree is transferred for execution, has no jurisdiction to entertain an application for restitution under this section.[405] Where a decree for possession of lands was passed ex parte by court A and possessions taken thereof in execution and after the ex parte decree was set aside and the suit restored and court A having been abolished in the meantime, the same was transferred to court B which dismissed the suit. It was held that court B was the proper court under section 150, to entertain the application for restitution.[406]

Though the explanation uses the words "shall be deemed to include", the definition contained therein is not an inclusive definition. Such an inclusive definition ordinarily means that it includes something which would not be covered in its natural and ordinary meaning. In the context in which the expression, "the court which passed the decree or order", is used, it can only mean the court specified in clauses (a), (b) and (c). For instance, where a decree or order is varied or reversed by a superior court in its appellate or revisional jurisdiction, although such a superior court passes the ultimate decree or order, it is not that court to which a restitution application is to be made. Application to any other court except the one which passed the decree or order in the first instance, would be contrary to the principle of restitution that rectification of the error is to be caused by the court which has passed the erroneous decree or order. It is only in the cases set out in clause (c), that principle cannot be followed and therefore a wider meaning had to be given since the court of first instance does no longer exist or has lost its jurisdiction.

An application for restitution under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 was held to be one by way of execution.[408] There is a conflict of opinion, whether a proceeding under this section is a proceeding in execution. It has been held by the High Courts of

Madras,[409] Bombay,[410] Patna,[411] Madhya Pradesh[412] and by the Chief Court of Oudh,[413] that it is, while it has been held by the High Courts of Allahabad,[414] Calcutta[415] and Nagpur,[416] that is not. Although the Allahabad High Court holds that it is not a proceeding in execution, yet it also holds that the rules of execution proceedings do in substance apply so that the provisions of O XX, rule 2 are not applicable.[417] On the other hand, although the Madras High Court has held that an application for restitution is an execution proceeding, it also holds that it need not, in every case, be strictly in the form prescribed by O XXI, rule 11.[418] A single judge of the Rangoon High Court held in 1930 that an application for restitution is not a proceeding in execution;[419] but three years later, a bench of the same high court, without referring to this decision, held that it was.[420] In Eliakutty v Pudukkad Public Bank, plaintiff had attached before judgment a decree in favour of the defendant, and realised the amounts due thereunder, even before the suit was heard. The suit having been dismissed, defendants applied for recovery of the amount in restitution. It was held by the Kerala High Court that the claim did not fall under section 144, as the amount was not realised in execution of any decree but that restitution could be ordered under section 151.[421] Restitution proceeding is a proceeding in execution of a decree. Appellate Court can stay it under O XLI, rule 8. It cannot be said that the restitution proceedings cannot be stayed by the appellate court, when the decree in pursuance of which restitution is sought for is appealed against. It is settled law that the restitution is a proceeding in execution. The obligation imposed under section 144, cannot abridge or restrict the power of the appellate court to a particular category of cases.[422]

The Supreme Court has, by its decision in Mahijibhai v Manibhai,[423] finally resolved the conflict of opinion prevailing in the various high courts. The Supreme Court has observed that under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1882, the courts understood then, that an application for restitution was an application in execution and that such an application was governed by Article 179 of the Limitation Act, 1887, corresponding to Article 182 of the Act of 1908 (now Article 136 of the 1963 Act). It was in this background that the legislature in passing the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 (CPC) introduced section 144, therein making the section more comprehensive than the old section 583; but the section "does not either expressly or by necessary implication, change the nature of the proceedings. Its object is limited. It seeks to avoid the conflict and to make the scope of the restitution clear and unambiguous. It does not say that an application for restitution, which till the new CPC was enacted, was an application for execution, should be treated as an original petition. Whether an application is one for execution of a decree or is an original application, depends upon the nature of the application and the relief asked for. Where a party who lost his property in execution of a decree, seeks to recover the same by reason of the appellate decree in his favour, he is not initiating any original proceeding, but he is only concerned with the working out of the appellate decree in his favour. The application flows from the appellate decree and is filed to implement or enforce the same. He is entitled to the relief of restitution, because the appellate decree enables him to obtain that relief either expressly or by necessary implication. He is recovering the fruits of the appellate decree. Prima facie, therefore, having regard to the history of the section, there is no reason why such an applications shall not be treated as one for the execution of the appellate decree." The court then examined several judgments of the high court and observed:

> On a procedural matter pertaining to execution when a section yields to two conflicting constructions, the court shall adopt a construction which maintains rather than disturbs the equilibrium in the field of execution. The historical background of s 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the acceptance of the legal position that an application for restitution is one for execution of a decree by a number of High Courts, the inevitable adoption of the said legal position by innumerable successful appellants within the jurisdiction of the said High Courts, the possible deleterious impact of a contrary view on such appellants, while there will be no such effect on similar appellants within the jurisdiction of the High Courts which have taken a contrary view, also persuade us to accept the construction that the application for restitution is one for execution of a decree.

This decision was followed by the Supreme Court a year hence in Maqbool Alam Khan v Mst Khodaija.[424]

With the resolution of the conflict of opinion and an application for restitution under this section having been held to be an application in execution, the distinction arising from the two conflicting positions held by the high courts in regard to limitation, court fees and the applicability of section 141 pointed out in the previous edition, no longer survives and therefore need not be considered here. An application for restitution being an application for execution of a decree it follows that a competent court entertaining such an application, must be deemed to be an executing court and therefore cannot recognise a payment made by the judgment-debtor unless certified under O XXI, rule 2(3).[425] The application for restitution under section 144 of the CPC is an application for execution of decree within the purview of section 2(2) read with O XXI of the CPC. As the application for restitution under section 144 is an application for execution of the decree, no ad valorem court fee is required on the value of the suit land or mesne profit except the required court fees for the purpose of execution of decree or order.

It is true that for the execution of decree, the provisions of O XXI, rule 11 requires formal application for execution of the decree or order. However, it is not necessary in the case of enforcement of an order passed under section 144.[426]

[s 144.35] Restitution and Compromise

Where, in a proceeding for restitution, a compromise petition is filed, the court cannot dispose of the main proceeding without first dealing with the compromise petition. If the compromise is lawful and genuine and is to the satisfaction of the court and is in respect of the subject matter of the proceeding the court must act on it.[427]

Where an application was filed for restitution of suit properties in terms of the arbitral award, and a writ petition challenging the award was filed, the parties entered into a settlement during the pendency of the writ petition in a conciliation proceedings in terms of section 89 of CPC. It was held that when the parties agreed that there subsisted no dispute between then, decree can be drawn up in terms of the settlement. Hence the order restoring the suit property to original possession was held to be improper.[428]

A proceeding for restitution under this section being now settled as a proceeding in execution Article 136 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act, 1963 applies.

The starting point of limitation begins from the date when the decree becomes enforceable. Thus, where the judgment and order of the high court on appeal by decree-holder was set aside by Supreme Court and the decree of the trial court was reversed, the very cause of action which had accrued for restitution vanished. Finally the decree of trial Court was set aside on 31 October 1969 which gives rise to a fresh cause of action for restitution. Therefore, the limitation for filing application for restitution would start from that date and not from any anterior date. Consequently the restitution application was held to be within limitation.[429]

[s 144.37] Applicability of Section 141

Since an application under this section is an application by way of execution, the provisions of section 141 do not apply.

The determination of a question under this section is a decree and appealable as such[430] and this is so even if the court exercises the power of granting restitution in its inherent jurisdiction;[431] (see section 2 clause (2): definition of "decree". However, the question must be one directly covered by the section, and not one incidentally connected with or collateral to the decision of any such question. Thus, a decision that an application under this section is time-barred, is a decision on a question collateral to the question of restitution and hence it is not a decree and not appealable as such.[432] The Lahore, Patna, Allahabad, Punjab and Kerala High Courts and the Oudh Court have, however, held that an order of restitution made under section 151 is not appealable.[433] It has been held in a number of decisions that the provisions of O XLI, rule 5 or 6, have no application to a decree or order for restitution, and that there can be no stay thereof.[434]

[s 144.39] Court-Fees

It has been held by the Allahabad, Rangoon and Calcutta High Courts that an appeal from an order made on an application under this section requires to be stamped ad valorem under the Court Fees Act, 1870, Sch I, Article 1, as an appeal from a decree. This proceeds on the view that an application under this rule is not an application for execution.[435] In view of the Supreme Court decision in Manibhai v Manibhai this view is no longer correct. Court fees payable on such appeal would be under Sch II, Article 11 of the Court Fees Act, 1870.

The Madras High Court has held that where the claim is one for restitution, no court fee will be payable but where it is in the nature of an independent claim for which a suit should have been laid, court fee would be payable.[436]

Uttar Pradesh—In section 144, for sub-section (1), the following shall be substituted:

> (1) Where and in so far as a decree or an order is varied or reversed in appeal, revision or otherwise, the court of first instance shall, on the application of any party entitled to any benefit by way of restitution or otherwise, cause such restitution to be made, as will, so far as may be, place the parties in the position which they would have occupied but for such decree or order or such part thereof as has been varied or reversed; and, for this purpose, the court may make any orders, including orders for the refund of costs and for the payment of interest, damages, compensation and mesne profits, which are properly consequential on such variation or reversal.
> (UP Act 24 of 1954, section 2 and Schedule item 5, entry 7, dated 30 November 1954.]

By this amendment, the Uttar Pradesh Legislature accepted the wider construction given to sub-section (1) by the Allahabad High Court. Now that sub-section 1 is altered by the Amendment Act, 1976, the UP Amendment has become redundant.

[s 145.1] State Amendment

Uttar Pradesh.—The following amendments were made by Uttar Pradesh Act 24 of 1954, section 2 and Schedule, Item 5, Entry 5, dated 30 November 1954.

For the existing Section 145, the following shall be substituted:—

437. Substituted by CPC (Amendment) Act 104 of 1976, section 49, for the words "has become liable as surety" (w.e.f. 1-2-1977).

438. Substituted by CPC (Amendment) Act, 1976 (104 of 1976), section 49, for certain words (w.e.f. 1-2-1977).

145. Where any person has become liable as surety or given any property as security—

(a) for the performance of any decree or any part thereof, or

(b) for the restitution of any property taken in execution of any decree, or

(c) for the payment of any money, or for the fulfilment of any condition imposed on any person, under an order of the Court in any suit or in any proceeding consequent thereon, the decree or order may be executed in the manner herein provided for the execution of decrees—

(i) if he has rendered himself personally liable, against him to that extent, and

(ii) if he has given any property as security, by sale of such property to the extent of the security; and such person shall, for the purposes of appeal, be deemed to be a party within the meaning of Section 47:

Provided that such notice as the Court in each case thinks sufficient has been given to the surety.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section a person entrusted by a Court with custody of any property attached in execution of any decree or order shall be deemed to have become liable as surety for the restitution of such property within the meaning of clause (b).

[s 145.2] Legislative Changes

Section 283 of the CPC 1882 to which this section corresponds, provided that whenever a person has, before the passing of a decree in an original suit, become liable as surety for the performance of the same or any part thereof, the decree may be executed against him to the extent to which he has rendered himself liable, in the same manner as a decree may be executed against a defendant. The words "decree in an original suit" led to a controversy whether the section applied to appellate decrees. Further, the section applied only to surety bonds for the performance of a decree and did not extend to surety bonds for the restitution of property, nor for payment of money under an order of the court. Section 145, as redrafted by the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC) extended the scope of the section by applying it, not only to surety bonds for the performance of a decree or any part thereof, but also to surety bonds for restitution of any property taken in execution of a decree and to surety bonds for the payment of any money or the fulfilment of any condition imposed under an order of the court in a suit or a proceeding consequent thereon.

Even though the section was wider in scope than the corresponding section 253 of the CPC, it did not apply to surety bonds under which the surety had given a charge upon his property. By inserting clause, (ii) the legislature has, in express terms, enabled the court to sell the property where such property has been furnished as a security instead of requiring a separate regular suit for that purpose. The amended section, by inserting, in its opening part, the words "given a guarantee" has now done away with the view expressed in some decisions that the provisions of sections 133–39 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, did not directly apply to the surety bonds which provide such guarantee.[439]

[s 145.3] Object of the Section

The section provides that where a person has become liable as surety for the performance of a decree (clause (a)] or for any of the purposes set out in clause (b) or clause (c), the party, for whose benefit, security has been given, may enforce such security by executing the decree or order against the surety, to the extent to which he has rendered himself personally liable, in the same manner as if the surety was a party to the decree or order and was directed by the decree or order to perform the obligation undertaken by him. The same would now be the position where such a person has, by his surety bond, given a guarantee for the performance of a decree or part of it or for restitution of property or for the payment of money or fulfilment of any condition imposed under an order of the court in a suit or a proceeding consequent thereon. Consequently, it is not necessary to institute a regular suit to enforce the security or guarantee as was held in some decisions under section 253 of the CPC. The object of the section is to provide a summary remedy in execution and to dispense with the necessity of a separate suit to the extent to which the surety has by his security or guarantee, rendered himself personally liable. The decree can be executed against a surety as though he were a party to the suit and was a principal-debtor.[440] His status, however, is not that of a person against whom a decree has been passed jointly with the judgment- debtor within the meaning of O XXI, rule 16.[441] But the view taken under the section, as it stood before the amendment of 1976, that the obligation which a surety incurs, is different from that, which arises under a contract of guarantee under the Indian Contract Act, 1872, which presupposes a tripartite agreement between the surety, the principal-debtor and the creditor[442] is, it is submitted, no longer good law. The reason is that the amended section now expressly provides that the summary remedy furnished by this section is available where the surety bond contains a guarantee. The insertion of the words "given a guarantee" in the opening part of the section dispenses with an express tripartite agreement between the principal-debtor, the surety and the judgment-creditor and extends the remedy under the section where the surety, by his surety bond, has given the guarantee for any of the purposes set out in clauses (a), (b), or (c). The judgment-debtor need not be a party to the bond and a prior agreement between him and the surety is not essential as it is the order of the court that attracts liability under this section.[443] Before, however, a surety can be made liable on the bond, there must be an order capable of execution against the judgment-debtor.[444]

It is clear that the only person against whom this section can be invoked, is the one who has placed himself in the position of a surety. Therefore, a person left in charge of an attached property by the Amin making the attachment is not a surety and if such person disobeys the directions of the court, as regards the property, he cannot be held liable in execution.[445] A suit can, no doubt, lie to enforce the liability.[446] A stranger to the suit against whom a prohibitory order restraining alienation of properties is made, does not become a surety and he cannot be proceeded against under this section for disobedience of the order.[447]

The section does not require that the surety should be named as a judgment-debtor in the decree or that the decree should contain a direction against the surety to pay the decretal amount.[448] The same would be the position where there is an order and not a decree directing payment of money or the fulfilment of some condition.

Where a surety bond is executed by several sureties, their liability is joint and several. If a creditor seeks to enforce the surety bond against only some of the joint sureties, the other sureties do not, on that account, get discharged, nor would release by the creditor of one of them discharge the other sureties. The liability of each of them is joint and several but not distinct or separate. Hence, if an appeal against an order under this section by the sureties abates as regards one of them by reason of his legal representatives not having been brought on record upon his death pending the appeal, the entire appeal would abate.[449]

These words have been inserted by the Amendment Act, 1976 to extend the applicability of the section to undertakings given, other than by furnishing security by means of surety bonds. A contract of guarantee as defined by section 126 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 is a contract to perform the promise, or discharge the liability, of a third person in case of his default. It implies the existence of a liability—actual or prospective—of a third person. It is not necessary that the guarantee should be in the form of a security bond, or in writing, or in favour of a court. Section 126 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 expressly states that such a contract or guarantee may be either oral or written. But there can be no contract of guarantee, unless there is a principal-debtor and the guarantor's liability is substantially dependent on the debtor's default. A promise to be primarily and independently liable is an indemnity and not a guarantee. Where a surety guarantees payment under a decree and the judgment-debtor makes a default in payment, execution under this section against the surety is available to the judgment-creditor.

In the case of a bank guarantee, there was a clear clause in the deed of bank guarantee that liability to repay amount would continue and remain in force till the party is discharged by the court. It was held by the Bombay High Court that the bank was duty bound to obtain permission of the court before encashing the said guarantee during the pendency of the proceeding. The bank cannot absolve its own liability because of its own negligence. Thus, it was ordered that Bank was bound to deposit the amount of bank guarantee in Court.[450]

[s 145.5] Security by Party

Section 145 does not apply where security is furnished or guarantee is given by a party to the suit.[451]

[s 145.6] Security for the Performance of "any" Decree

[s 145.6.1] Ex Parte Decree

A obtains an ex parte decree against B. The decree is set aside under O IX, rule 13 on C standing surety for the performance of any decree that may be passed against B on a re-hearing. The suit is re-heard and a decree is passed against B. A may enforce the security by executing the decree against C.[452] A separate suit is not necessary.

[s 145.6.2] Appellate Decree

The summary procedure contemplated by this section applies to suretyship for the performance of any decree, whether it be an original or an appellate decree. Under the old section, there was a conflict of decisions as to whether the summary remedy provided by that section applied at all, to suretyships for the performance of appellate decrees, it being held by the High Court of Calcutta [Calcutta HC] that it did not,[453] and by the other high courts that it did.[454] The section makes it clear that the summary procedure contemplated by this section applies to security given for the performance of appellate decrees also. The rules that provide for security for the performance of appellate decrees are rules 5 and 6 of O XLI. An illustration will make the point clear. A obtains a decree against B and applies for execution. B appeals from the decree and applies for stay of execution under O XLI, rule 5. Execution is stayed, on C standing surety for the due performance of any decree that may be passed against B in appeal. A decree is eventually passed by the appellate court against B. A may enforce the security against C by executing the appellate decree against him as if C was a party to the decree. According to the Calcutta decisions under the old section, A's only remedy was by way of suit against C.

[s 145.6.3] Decree Passed or to be Passed

The expression "any decree" is wide enough to cover a decree that has already been passed as well as a decree that may be passed after the person concerned has become liable as surety.[455]

[s 145.6.4] Decree on Transfer of Suit

If a surety bond is executed in a subordinate judge's court but the suit is transferred to a District Munsiff's Court as a result of enhancement of the pecuniary jurisdiction, the bond ensures for the benefit of the plaintiff, even after the transfer of the suit and the surety would be bound to pay if the plaintiff's claim is decreed.[456]

[s 145.7] Security or Guarantee for Restitution of Property in Execution of a Decree

A obtains a decree against B for possession of certain lands. B appeals from the decree. Pending the appeal, A applies for execution of the decree. The court allows execution, on C standing surety for the restitution of the lands to B in the event of the decree being reversed in appeal, or for payment to B, of the value of the property (O XLI, rule 6, Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, section 546). The decree is eventually reversed in appeal. B may enforce the security by executing the appellate decree against C. According to the Calcutta decisions under the old section, B could only enforce the security by a separate suit.[457] The court has inherent jurisdiction to enforce a security bond which does not fall within any of the sections or rules of the CPC.[458]

[s 145.8] Security or Guarantee for Payment of Money

The following are some of the sections and rules providing for security for the payment of money:

(i) Section 55, sub-section (4) (security on behalf of a judgment-debtor who is arrested in execution of a decree and who expresses his intention to apply to be declared an insolvent);

(ii) Order XXV, rule 1 (security for costs);

(iii) Order XXXVIII, rule 2 (security in cases of arrest before judgment);

(iv) Order XXXVIII, rule 5 (security in cases of attachment before judgment)"

(v) Order XLI, rule 10 (security for costs of respondent in first appeal);

(vi) Order XLV, rule 7 (security for costs of respondent in appeal to the Supreme Court).

[s 145.9] Security or Guarantee for Fulfillment of any Condition Imposed on any Person

Provisions under section 145 would enure to benefit of court as well as custodian to proceed against appellant in enforcement of undertaking given to the court.[459]

The summary remedy provided by section 253 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 (now replaced by Code of Civil Procedure, 1908) applied only where security given was for the performance of a decree and for no other purpose. Thus, where a defendant produced certain promissory notes in court, and the plaintiff objected to their return to the defendant, but they were returned to the defendant on C standing surety for their production when required, it was held that the plaintiff could not, on non-production of the notes, proceed against C by execution, the reason given, being that the security was not given for the performance of a decree, and that his only remedy was by way of suit against C.[460] Under the present section, the security may be enforced by execution against C. Therefore, when a sale in execution is adjourned on a security bond to produce the property attached, the bond may, on default, be enforced against the surety for the value of the property by proceedings in execution.[461]

The section applies only where the court passes an order or decree which is intended to be an order or decree enforceable in execution by one party to a suit or other proceeding against the other party.[462] Therefore, a bond passed by a surety under O XXXII, rule 6(2), cannot be enforced by summary process under this section; it can only be enforced by a suit.[463] But if a next friend of a minor is allowed by the court to withdraw money paid into court by a judgment-debtor, in satisfaction of a minor's decree, on condition that he shall purchase Government Promissory Notes and deposit the Notes in court there is a proceeding consequent on the suit until the notes are deposited. Therefore, a surety bond for the deposit of the notes can be summarily enforced under clause (c) of the section.[464]

Where the guardian of minors withdrew money belonging to them and in court, deposit after executing a bond which provided that he would pay them to the minors on their attaining majority and that, in default, the amount could be recovered from him personally and from his properties, it was held that section 145 and O XXXII, rule 6, were not mutually exclusive and that the bond could be enforced under this section.[465] The section does not apply to a surety on an administration bond under section 291 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925.[466]

A is committed to prison in execution of a decree obtained against him by B. A applies to be released from jail to enable him to make a petition in insolvency. A is released from prison on C giving security that A will appear before the executing court on the day fixed by the court. The insolvency petition fails, and A fails to appear in court. In such a case B, and not the government, is entitled to the security money.[467] The money is to be appropriated towards satisfaction of the decree; it is not to be given to the decree-holder as a solarium or further benefit over and above the decretal amount.[468]

[s 145.10] Deposit of Title Deeds

In an Andhra Pradesh case, the court directed the furnishing of "third party immovable property security" to the satisfaction of the court below. The petitioner furnished a third party immovable property security, and also offered to deposit title deeds and to create an equitable mortgage. It was held that if the party offers to give security by deposit of title deeds, then in the absence of any specific direction in that regard, it is left to the discretion of the court whether to accept such a security or not. Such a discretion is implicit in the words "to the satisfaction of the court below". Where a security is furnished by the deposit of title deeds, no registration is necessary.[469]

[s 145.11] Clauses (i), (ii) and (iii)

A surety:

(i) may render himself personally liable; or

(ii) he may only give a charge upon his property; or

(iii) he may undertake a personal liability and charge his property as further charge.

As the section stood before its amendment by the Act of 1976, it provided, in express terms, that the decree could be executed against the surety "to the extent to which he has rendered himself personally liable." Construing these words, Banerji, J in Amir v Mahadeo[470] observed:

> Under s 253 of Act 14 of 1882, there was a conflict of opinion in the different High Courts as to whether a mortgage made by a surety could be enforced under that section. It seems to me that in order to reconcile the divergence of opinion which arose under the old Code and to remove any ambiguity that might exist on the subject, the Legislature in > enacting s 14 of the present Code of Civil Procedure added the word- 'personally' to, the provisions of that section, thus clearly enacting that in execution of the decree it is the personal liability of the surety which could be enforced and not the liability of the property hypothecated by him. As pointed out by the learned Chief Justice, the enforcement of the mortgage created by the surety would require the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act as regards the array of parties and the form of the decree and other matters to be complied with.

In this view, the section, as it stood unamended, could not apply to the second case, that is, the property charged could not be brought to sale under this section, for the section applied only when the personal liability of the surety was sought to be enforced and could not be invoked for the enforcement of a charge.[471]

When a surety charged his property by way of security, such security could be given either:

(i) to the court itself; or

(ii) to an officer of the court; or

(iii) any other named individual.

Where the security was given to an officer of the court or to other named individual, the property could not be sold, except by a suit on the charge. Where the security was given to the court, the court not being a judicial person, could not sue. The only mode available for enforcing the liability in such a case was by the court making an order in the suit upon an application to which the surety had to be made a party that the property charged be sold unless before a day named the surety found the money. The Privy Council so held in Raghubeer Singh v Jai Indra Bahadur Singh.[472] In that case the plaintiff obtained a decree for possession against the defendant. The defendant appealed against the decree. On his application, the plaintiff was let into possession, in execution of the decree upon furnishing security. The security was furnished by S who entered into a bond whereby he hypothecated property. The bond was passed to the court. No obligee was named in the bond. The contention on behalf of the surety was that his liability under the bond could not be enforced except by a suit under O XXXIV, rule 14 (Transfer of Property Act, 1882, section 90). The contention, however, was rejected and it was held that the proper order to make was that the property charged be sold unless, before a day named, the surety found the money. The Privy Council observed:

> In the course of the judgment in India s 145 was referred to; but whatever might have been its effect if the sureties had been personally liable it has no application now that their Lordships have construed the instrument as giving only a charge upon property.

As to the contention that the liability could only be enforced by a suit on a mortgage, their Lordships said that for such a proceeding, there must be a mortgagor and a mortgagee. Since in the instant case there was no mortgagee named in the bond, and, further, the court, not being a juridical person, cannot assign the property to any person to enable him to file a suit on the mortgage. The Calcutta High Court took the view that in such a case a suit could be instituted by the creditor on the principle that a trust was created in his favour by the security bond.[473] This view, however, has been dissented from by the Bombay High Court.[474] Where the recitals in a bond did not show that it was executed in favour of any person, it was held that the words "to the Subordinate Judge" at the top did not alter its character and it could be enforced under this section.[475] It must be observed here that the procedure adopted by the Privy Council in Raghubar Singh's case cannot be followed in cases where the surety has, prior to the sale, transferred his equity of redemption in the property to a third person.[476] The Madras High Court has held that when the security was realised under the procedure recognised in Raghubar Singh's case, the surety was a party to the suit for the purposes of appeal.[477] The procedure was an exercise of the inherent jurisdiction of the court and the article of the Limitation Act, which applied was Article 182 (now Article 136 of the Act of 1963) either from the date of the bond or the day of default by the surety.[478]

In the third case also, where the security was given to the court, the property could be sold by an order of the kind made in Raghubar Singh's case. At the same time, the applicant could relinquish the charge and enforce the personal liability in the bond by attachment and sale of the property charged.[479] The Chief Court at Oudh took the view, however, that when a surety has, in a surety bond, undertaken personal liability and has also charged certain immovable property as security, it was the personal liability only and not the liability of the hypothecated property which could be enforced under this section.[480] On the other hand, some courts expressed the view that where the bond provided that the properties secured were liable in the first instance and that the obligor was to be liable for deficiency, the bond could be enforced under the inherent jurisdiction of the court.[481]

Instead of leaning on the inherent jurisdiction of the court and not under this section, the Amendment Act, 1976 has now introduced clauses (ii) and (iii) which empower the courts to execute the decree where the surety has furnished any property as security by sale of such property to the extent of the security and where the case falls under clause (i) and clause (ii) i.e. where the surety has rendered himself personally liable and as further security has furnished some property, to the extent specified in the security bond. It is submitted that since express power has now been conferred on the court to execute the decree against the surety by sale of the property upon which the charge is made, no questions relating to the provisions of O XXXIV or the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 can any more arise. Such a sale in execution can now be ordered under this section and not under the inherent power of the court. The sale would be directed in the manner provided for in the CPC for execution of decrees and the surety would be deemed to be a party within the meaning of section 47.

Where a security bond, charging his property, is given by the judgment-debtor himself, the property can be realised in execution under section 47.[482] A sued for a declaration that the property attached belonged to her in her own right and not as the legal representative of the judgment-debtor. The suit was dismissed and A, in appeal, obtained stay of execution on giving security for loss of interest to the decree-holder during the pendency of the appeal. But when the appeal was dismissed, it was held that the security could not be realised in execution on the ground that the order regarding furnishing of security was not an executable order but was declaratory in nature.[483]

[s 145.12] Notice to Surety

The notice required to be given to a surety under this section is a condition precedent to the validity of an order for execution against him. An attachment issued without such notice is illegal.[484] When a decree is sent by the court which passed the decree to another court for execution, the notice required by this section may be given by the latter court.[485] The notice to be given to the surety should not be general but specific as contemplated by Form No 13 in Appendix H.[486] This section does not lay down that the notice should be in writing. All that is necessary is that before the attachment actually takes place, the surety should have notice of the order directing execution of the decree against him, the object being that he may be able to take objections, if any, to the order. If the objection of want of notice is not raised before the executing court, it must be taken to have been waived.[487]

[s 145.13] Discharge of Surety

The liability of the surety depends upon the terms of the bond and unless expressly limited to the original court, extends to the court of appeal.[488] If the bond has reference to the ultimate issue of the suit, it matters not that the suit has at one time been dismissed for default and then restored.[489] Where the bond provided that the surety was to be liable for the entire amount of the decree that might be passed, it was held that the liability extended to the decree which might ultimately be passed in appeal;[490] however, where a judgment-debtor, who had been arrested in execution of a decree, was released on the surety furnishing security for his appearance during the execution proceeding then pending and owing to the default of the decree-holder to appear on the due date, the execution application was dismissed and the surety was also discharged, it was held that the liability of the surety was not automatically revived by the mere restoration of the execution application.[491] A surety who has made himself liable for the performance of a decree cannot resist enforcement of the bond on the ground that a consent decree is passed on a bona fide compromise;[492] nor on the ground that such compromise was made without his knowledge;[493] provided such a decree is not the result of any fraud or collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant;[494] nor on the ground that the judgment-debtor has consented to a decree for payment by instalments;[495] nor on the ground that the decretal amount is enhanced by the appellate court.[496] Settlement of the decree debt under the Debt Relief Act does not affect the liability of the surety.[497] But where under the surety bond, the surety agreed that if the decision was given against the defendant, he would pay whatever amount was found due, it was held that the surety was discharged if the suit was compromised.[498] There is nothing unreasonable or wrong in a surety expressly stipulating that he would be bound by his guarantee only if a decree is passed after contest.[499] A surety for the judgment- debtor executes a bond engaging that an arrested judgment-debtor will apply under section 55(4) to be declared insolvent is discharged when the judgment-debtor makes a bona fide application within the time specified to the court of insolvency, even though the application is rejected as not being in proper form.[500] But a surety who gave security upto Rs 1100 on a rule for stay of execution, was discharged when the rule was made absolute for Rs 5000.[501] Where, after security bond was given the decree-holder obtained an order for additional security, and that not having been furnished, the stay was cancelled, it was held that the surety was discharged.[502] The surety is not discharged by a payment which has not been certified under O XXI, rule 2 of the CPC.[503] An attachment before judgment was raised on A giving security. The suit was then decreed ex parte but the decree was set aside on B furnishing security. The suit was again decreed and the decree-holder applied under this section to enforce the bond against A under this section. It was held that the taking of security from B did not discharge A from his liability under his bond, which continued to be in force.[504] A security bond, given for appearance under O XXXVIII, rule 2, ensures only for the suit and not proceedings in execution of the decree.[505] One view was that an obligation which, a surety incurs under the bond which he gives to the court under this CPC, is excluded from the definition of a contract of guarantee as contained in the Indian Contract Act, 1872 and the provisions of sections 133–39 of that Act cannot be made applicable to the bond.[506] The other view held by the Madras High Court was that though in such cases those sections of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 would not, in terms, be applicable, the principles underlying them would be applicable where the surety bond had been executed in favour of the court.[507] This has also been the view held by the Mysore High Court.[508] The addition of the words "or given a guarantee" in the opening of the section as amended by the Amendment Act, 1976 indicates that the legislature intended to make sections 133–39 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 applicable. In the absence of anything to the contrary in the section the word "guarantee" added in the section must be taken to have the same meaning as that given in the Indian Contract Act, 1872. The form which the contract of suretyship, takes is immaterial; it may be either in favour of the court or of the decree-holder.[509] It matters not that the bond, is not in a form prescribed by any order or rule of the CPC.[510] It may be a letter by the surety to the decree-holder and need not even be addressed to the court.[511] On the death of a surety, his liability can be enforced against his legal representatives.[512] Where the decree-holder himself had compromised with the principal-debtor and had discharged himself from the liability to the performance of the decree, in law it must be a full satisfaction of the decree under section 47 and relevant rule in O XXI of the CPC. Full satisfaction recorded in that behalf relieves the guarantor or surety from the obligation. And the decree-holder cannot seek any further remedy against the surety. In case, the compromise was with the consent of the guarantor or surety, compromise with the principal judgement-debtor is for other liability, other than the extent of the liability undertaken by the guarantor or surety; in that event, the guarantor or surety is not relieved from his liability for due performance of the decree.[513]

Where the Secretary of a society had executed a surety bond and had undertaken on behalf of the defendant-Society to produce the vehicle attached in a case if the same was released to him, the liability of the Secretary/surety does not extinguish on subsequent compromise by the decree-holder with the principal debtor-society. It was held by the Kerala High Court that the liability of surety as disclosed in the surety bond is distinct and different from the liability created on the Society as per terms of the compromise. It was further held that a surety bond executed by an officer of the Society making himself liable personally, though executed for securing a benefit for the Society would not protect such officer of Society under section 11 of the Travancore-Cochin Literary, Scientific and charitable Societies Registration Act, 1955 and such liability would not cease on his ceasing to be an officer of the Society.[514]

With respect to enforcement of surety's liability an interesting case came up before the Jammu and Kashmir High Court. In a case of land acquisition, the land owner, feeling aggrieved by the assessed compensation, sought arbitration. The arbitrator, besides awarding compensation, also allowed solatium and interest. The award of the arbitrator was maintained by the high court and the Union of India moved the Supreme Court. The Apex Court maintained the award but set aside the award of solatium and interest. The respondent, Union of India sought restitution from the legal representatives of the deceased claimant. It was held by the high court that the legal representatives are liable only to the extent of property of the deceased inherited by them. Since the respondent in this case had not inherited any such property he is not liable as legal representative. However, the respondent had executed surety bond for 50% of the total compensation amount received by the deceased, he is liable to pay back 50% of solatium and interest.[515]

[s 145.14] Adjustment of Decree

If the surety makes an application to the executing court that an adjustment had taken place between the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor and that he is discharged as a consequence but the application is dismissed without going into merits on the ground of limitation, the surety can bring a suit for a declaration that, in view of the adjustment, he is discharged.[516]

[s 145.15] Section not a Bar to a Regular Suit Against Surety

Under section 253 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, it was held that the section gave an additional, and not an exclusive remedy, against a surety and that it did not prevent the decree-holder from bringing a regular suit on the surety bond to enforce the security.[517] The present section also does not bar a regular suit.[518] It simply enables a party, for whose benefit the security has been given, to enforce the surety bond against the surety, by way of execution, to the extent to which the surety has rendered himself personally liable, or where he has furnished any property as security to the extent of the security, or where he has done both to the extent aforesaid, but no more. If the party for whose benefit security has been given, proceeds against the surety in execution, the surety is to be deemed to be a party within the meaning of section 47. The reference in the section to section 47, does not import, into this section, the provision therein contained, which bars a separate suit. Under the section before its present amendment, it was held that a surety was deemed to be a party to the suit for the limited "purposes of appeal".[519] The deletion of the words "for the purposes of appeal" by the recent amendment does not mean, it is submitted, that the bar of a regular suit under section 47 applies. section 47 has been referred to, since the execution against the surety has to be in the manner provided in the CPC. Even after the amendment of the section, the surety is still deemed to be a party within the meaning of section 47. Under section 2(2) as it stood before the Amendment Act, 1976, the determination of any question within section 47 was deemed to be a decree. The deletion of the words "Section 47" from section 2(2) means that such a determination is not to be deemed to be a decree. As a corollary to this deletion, the Amendment Act, 1976 has repeated sub-section 2 of section 47 which empowered the court to treat a proceeding under that section as a suit. Since a decision under section 47 is no longer to be deemed to be a decree, the words "for the purposes of appeal" in this section, before its recent amendment became inconsistent with the amended definition of a decree and had to be deleted. The result is that though a surety in proceedings against him under this section is deemed to be a party within section 47, he has no right of appeal against any determination in proceedings under this section against him. This is so, because such determination is no longer a decree.

The remedy against a surety under this section is still not an exclusive remedy. Therefore, in a case where a security files objections against execution against him, if these objections were to be dismissed summarily, he would still have remedy by way of a suit to establish his claim.[520] A surety, for a deceased defendant, is not liable when a decree is passed against a person who has not been adjudged to be the legal representative. He may bring a suit to negative his liability.[521]

Where the surety bond is clear and unambiguous, there is no question of going to any antecedent evidence. Thus, where the surety has, by the terms of the bond, assumed liability for reimbursement for any loss caused by any default on the part of the receiver, from the date the receiver takes charge, the surety would be liable for damages adjudged against the receiver, even though the bond was executed after the actual loss.[522]

[s 145.16] Construction of Security Bond

The rule is that a security-bond must be strictly construed according to its terms, but where there is a doubt about its construction, the bond must be construed in the light of the order directing the security to be given.[523]

Where the bond provided that the surety would be liable if the judgment-debtor failed to deposit the decree amount, it could be enforced against the surety, only after an order for payment is made against the judgment-debtor and he commits default.[524] Where a surety had rendered himself liable for Rs 3000, he was held not liable to pay interest on that amount.[525] A obtained a decree against the assets of B in the hands of C and D. The latter filed an appeal and obtained stay on X, furnishing a security bond. The appeal was eventually dismissed. It was held that the liability of X under the bond was coextensive with that of C and D and unless an order was made against them under section 52(2) of the CPC, the surety could not be made personally liable.[526]

[s 145.17] Custodian of Movable Property

A custodian of moveable property who has been accepted as such by court, is a surety. He can, by executing, recover from the decree-holder the costs and expenses incurred by him in keeping the property. Although section 145 does not strictly apply, as for the purpose of enforcing his liability, he is to be considered to be a party to the suit, he is considered also to be so, when the question relates to enforcement of his rights.[527] A supardar, to whom properties attached before judgment are entrusted, is a person who becomes liable as a surety and his liability can be enforced under this section.[528]

[s 145.18] Appeal

As a result of the changes made in the definition of a decree in section 2(2) and in section 47 and this section, an order made hereunder is not a decree and is consequently not appealable (see the discussion above).

[s 145.19] Limitation

The article which would apply to an application under this section would be Article 136 of the Limitation Act, 1963 which replaced Article 182 of the Limitation Act, 1908. The period of limitation is now 12 years, from the date when the decree becomes enforceable or where the decree directs any payment of money, or the delivery of any property to be made at a certain date, or at recurring periods, when default in making the payment or delivery in respect of which execution is sought, takes place. Therefore, where a person has become liable as a surety, the period of limitation is 12 years from the date when the decree, either original or appellate, becomes enforceable against him under this section.

[s 145.20] Registration of Surety Bond

There is a conflict of judicial opinion on the question whether a bond charging or hypothecating immovable properties requires to be registered. Some decisions hold that as the bond derives its validity from the order of the court accepting it, it is a step in a judicial proceeding and does not require registration;[529] while others hold that the bond falls within section 17(1)(6) of the Registration Act, 1908, and is invalid unless it is registered.[530]

[s 145.21] Inherent Power of Court

Where a security-bond is executed as a condition precedent, though there was no order of the court, the bond can be made enforceable under inherent powers of the court. Where, in an execution case, at the time of attachment by Amin of court, a security bond was executed by A, undertaking subsequent delivery of attached property (viz crops), the bond can be enforced against A.[531]

Provided that such notice as the court in each case thinks sufficient has been given to the surety.

Explanation—For the purpose of this section a person entrusted by a Court with custody of any property attached in execution of any decree or order shall be deemed to have become liable as surety for the restitution of such property within the meaning of clause (b).

[s 146.1] History and Object of the Section

This section was introduced by the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC). In the absence of a similar provision in the CPC 1882, judicial opinion was divided on the question whether the legal representatives of a deceased defendant could apply to set aside an ex parte decree under O IX, rule 13.[532] The controversy has now been set at rest by this section. In Saila Bala Dassi v Nirmala Sundari Dassi,[533] the Supreme Court observed that this section was introduced in the CPC with the object of facilitating the exercise of rights by persons in whom they come to be vested by devolution or assignment and that, being a beneficent provision, it should be construed liberally and so as to advance justice, and not in a restricted or technical sense.

[s 146.2] Proceeding by or Against Representatives

[s 146.2.1] Appeal

The proceedings contemplated by this section include an appeal.[534] That is settled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Saila Bala Dassi v Nirmala Sundari Das.[535] There, an appeal filed by the judgment-debtor against an order directing execution of a mortgage decree was sought to be continued by a person who had purchased the mortgaged properties from the mortgagor after the suit had been decreed. It was held that he was entitled to prosecute the appeal not under O XXII but under section 146. Discussing the scope of the section, the court observed that whoever was entitled to be, but had not been brought on record under O XXII, rule 10 in a pending suit or proceeding, would be entitled to prefer an appeal against the decree or order passed therein, if his assignor could have filed such an appeal and that further the right to file an appeal must be held to carry, with it, the right to continue an appeal, which had been filed by the persons under whom the applicant claimed. On this principle, it was again held by the Supreme Court, that where, during the pendency of an appeal against a decree in ejectment, the property was sold in execution of a decree obtained on mortgages executed by the defendant pendente lite, and purchased by the mortgagee and transferred to the applicant, the latter was entitled to continue the appeal under this section.[536] Where a suit relating to land was dismissed and thereafter the plaintiff assigned his interest in the subject matter to A, it was held that the latter was not entitled to appeal against the dismissal.[537] The correctness of this decision is open to question. A suit relating to land was decreed ex parte. The defendant, then transferred the lands to X and Y, and thereafter appealed under O IX, rule 13, to set aside the ex parte decree. That application was dismissed. Against the order of dismissal, X and Y preferred an appeal. It was held that they were entitled to do so under this section.[538]

This section does not bar a person, who is neither a party nor the representative of a party to a suit or proceeding from filing an appeal against a decision which would adversely affect him, provided he obtains the leave of the court.[539]

[s 146.2.2] Execution Proceedings

This section enables the legal representative of a deceased decree-holder to be brought on the record to carry on a pending execution proceeding.[540] The contrary opinion expressed in some decisions,[541] that the legal representatives of a deceased decree-holder cannot continue the pending proceedings but must file a fresh petition for execution cannot be considered to be good law. The Nagpur High Court has further held that this section would enable an assignee of the decree to continue the execution proceedings started by his assignor.[542] An attaching decree-holder who has executed the attached decree, is a person, claiming under the original decree-holder, and if the attached decree is reversed on appeal, the judgment-debtor may get restitution against him.[543]

Eviction suit was filed by the agent of the real owner. Suit property was transferred by the owner to the agent's sons, during the pendency of the suit. After the death of the agent, transferees from the real owner were held to be entitled to execute the decree passed in favour of agent, since they have become owners by virtue of the assignment. Section 146 of the CPC was introduced with the object of facilitating the exercise of the rights by persons in whom the rights came to be vested by devolution or assignment and, being a beneficial provision, it should be construed liberally and so as to advance justice and not in a restricted or technical sense.[544] Where a trustee obtains an ejectment decree, the beneficiary cannot apply for execution unless there is an assignment in favour of the beneficiary.[545] Decree for injunction was obtained against sole judgment-debtor, restraining him from obstructing the plaintiff in erecting a fence on the boundary of his property. It was held that it can be executed against the legal representatives of the original judgment-debtor, on his death.[546]

A harmonious reading of O XXI, rule 16 Explanation with section 146 of the Code makes it abundantly clear that where any proceedings may be taken or application made by or against any person, then the proceedings may be taken or the application may be made by or any person claiming under him. Thus, in a rent control proceeding which had attained finality but during the execution proceedings the decree-holder transferred the property, it was held, it was held that though the decree-holder had lost title, the subsequent purchaser can continue the execution and the decree-holder can join hand with the purchaser.[547]

A receiver, acting under the authority of the court, is a representative of the real owner, and as such, he is entitled to commence or continue proceedings so as to bind the real owner, and his application in that behalf will fall under O XXII, if it is a suit and under section 146 if it is an execution proceeding.[548]

This section is wider in its amplitude than O XXI, rule 16, and enables persons who have succeeded to the interests of the decree-holder in whole or in part, to execute the decree.[549] Eviction order against tenant and one of his five sons was passed under section 7 of the Orissa House Rent Control Act, 1967. Tenant died during execution proceedings. His son was a party to the proceedings since its inception. He was a co-judgment-debtor, along with the tenant (father). On the death of the tenant, the question of bringing other legal representatives of the deceased tenant did not arise on the facts of this case. Judgment-debtor (son of deceased tenant) represented all other sons. section 146 was attracted since O XXII, rule 12 was not applicable.[550] Where the plaintiff assigned book debts on which he had filed a suit and the suit was then decreed, it was held by the Supreme Court that the assignee was entitled to execute the decree, not under O XXI, rule 16 because there was no assignment of the decree, but under this section because he had become entitled to the benefit of the decree under the decree-holder.[551] The law is thus settled that persons claiming in the right of the decree-holder can apply to execute the decree, though they have not obtained an assignment as provided in O XXI, rule 16.[552] The opinion, therefore, expressed in some decisions[553] that it is only those persons who can bring themselves within O XXI, rule 16 that can execute the decree, is not good law. Likewise, a decree can be executed not only against the judgment-debtor on record, but against all persons represented by him. It was accordingly held that a decree for injunction obtained against A, in a representative capacity under O I, rule 8 could be executed against all persons represented by him.[554]

It has been held in some cases that an assignee from the heirs of a deceased plaintiff, who had themselves not been brought on record, have no right to carry on execution proceedings initiated by the deceased, either under O XXII or under section 146.[555] But the preponderance of authority is in favour of the view that though they cannot continue the proceedings under O XXII, rule 3, or rule 10, as they are neither legal representatives nor assignees of a party to the suit or proceeding, they are entitled to carry on under this section.[556]

[s 146.3] Pre-emption

It is common knowledge that the right of pre-emption is generally conferred on a co-sharer in the property or on a person who claims some right over the property, eg, a right of way or on the grounds of vicinage, ie, on an owner of the adjoining property. This right may be founded in statute or custom or in the personal law by which the parties are governed. The sole object of conferring this right of property on a co-sharer, is to keep objectionable strangers away from the neighbourhood. This right is purely personal and cannot be transferred to a third party, for the obvious reason that such transferability would defeat the very purpose of its conferment.[557] A transferee of the pre-emptor's right in the land which has vested in him by virtue of O XX, rule 14 on compliance of the requirement of payment of the purchase money by the specified date, can maintain an application for execution under section 146, or O XXI, rule 16 of the CPC. The newly added explanation to rule 16 of O XXI of the CPC makes it clear that the rule shall not affect the provisions in section 146, nor shall it affect a transferee of rights in property, which is the subject matter of the suit, from applying for execution of the decree without there being a separate assignment of the decree.[558]

[s 146.4] Person Claiming

There cannot be any dispute with the proposition that the transferee had every right to file application under section 146, CPC.

In an execution petition of decree filed by the person claiming to be the transferee by assignment there was no transfer of decree by assignment in writing or by operation of law to applicant. The property in question was sold to him by heirs of deceased, applicant was thus purchaser in interest and not assignee of decree. He was therefore required to file application under section 146. Since his application under section 146 was barred by time, he has no right to move application under O XXI, rule 1, CPC.[559]

As interest in disputed land was that of holder (from B) of profit a prendre right to catch fish for only one year. A sued for permanent injunction to restrain C from disturbing his (A"s) right as licensee. It was held that on the expiry of license, the relief claimed by A could not be granted to B on the ground that A's interest devolved on B. A's suit was to protect his own interest. It was not identical with that of B.[560]

A, a party to a suit, transferred his interest in the subject matter to B, during pendency of suit. B, in turn, transferred his interest to C. It was held that:

(i) C, though not a direct transferee, can be brought on the record; and

(ii) C could be brought on record in the absence of the first transferee.[561]

[s 146.5] "Save as otherwise provided""

If a decree is passed against the Karta of a joint hindu family, the section does not enable a coparcener to appeal while the Karta is alive.[562] This section is expressly made, subject to the other provisions of CPC or of any law for the time being in force. Thus, the executing court cannot go behind a decree and by invoking the aid of this section, it cannot change a decree against a person into one against his legal representative with a view to apply section 73 of CPC.[563]

[s 146.6] Setting Aside Ex Parte Decree

See notes to O IX, rule 13, under the head: "Application by legal representative of deceased defendant". Other cases to which the section applies have been considered in their proper places.

[s 146.7] Appeal

An order under this section is not open to appeal but it can be revised,[564] subject, of course, to the restrictions now imposed on the right of revision under the amended section 115.

This section has been taken from O XVI, rule 21 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of England with some alterations.

[s 147.2] Any Person Under Disability

The section applies to consent given on behalf of persons under disability, such as minors and lunatics.[565]

[s 147.3] As to any Proceeding

These words do not refer to the conduct of a suit or appeal. A next friend or guardian ad litem, has undoubtedly the conduct of a suit or appeal in his hands; but if he does anything in the action beyond the mere conduct of it, eg, consents not to appeal, the person under disability is not bound by it, unless it is done with the express leave of the court.[566]

[s 147.4] Express Leave

The leave must be express. In this respect, the present section differs from the English rule.

HIGH COURT AMENDMENT

Calcutta.—Add the words "or by the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882", after the words "allowed by this Code" and before the words "the court may", Vide Cal. Gaz. Pt. I, dated April 20, 1967.

[s 148.2] Amendment in the Section

The words "not exceeding thirty days in total" have been inserted vide section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1999, w.e.f. 1-7- 2002.

Section 148 provides for enlargement or extension of time fixed or granted under the orders of a court. The power is discretionary and the court is entitled to consider the conduct of the party applying for extension. It must be remembered that the section only applies where the time fixed for doing of an act is prescribed or allowed by this Code. The following rules may be covered within the ambit of section 148:

(i) Order VI, rule 17 (amendment of pleadings).

(ii) Order VII, rule 11(b) (requiring plaintiff to correct valuation of suit).

(iii) Order VII, rule 11 (requiring plaintiff to supply requisite stamp paper, where the plaint is written upon a paper insufficiently stamped).

(iv) Order VIII, rule 9 (requiring written statement or additional written statement from a party).

(v) Order XXI, rule 17 (amendment of application for execution).

(vi) Order XXV, rule 2 (security for costs of suit).

(vii) Order XLI, rule 10 (security for costs of appeal).

In the opinion of the authors, the limitation to the discretion of the court in this behalf, to a total period of 30 days shall put undue fetters to the discretion of the courts, which is given for the purpose of securing the ends of Justice in case of necessity. There may be many cases where the time fixed by the court could not be adhered to for reasons beyond the control of the litigants or their counsels. It has to be seen that the ground for granting extension of time is to be identified by a court of law if the sine qua non is to exercise its discretionary power under section 148 of the CPC. It does not mean that after the expiry of the time already granted by the court, section 148 of the CPC will give an automatic right to the aggrieved parties to get the extension of time. This is not the tenor of the provision of law adopted by the statute. The court must be fully satisfied with the ground and only then the wider discretion vested with the court is to be exercised in granting the extension of time.

The Law Commission in its 163rd report has also opined that no such restriction should be placed in section 148. Situations may arise where the interests of justice may call for the exercise of power under section 148, even beyond the period proposed to be stipulated. Any such restriction of time may, in some cases, even lead to a failure of justice.

[s 148.3] Scope

Section 148 of the CPC empowers the court to enlarge the time allowed by the court or prescribed by the CPC. However, by the CPC (Amendment) Act, 1999 (Amendment Act, 1999), the said provision stood amended to the effect that the period can be extended by the court not exceeding 30 days in total. section 32 of the CPC (Amendment) Act, 1999, providing for repeal and saving, does not save anything so far as section 148 of the CPC is concerned. Therefore, being procedural law, it may be held that the court may have the power to extend the period but not beyond the period of 30 days in total from the date of expiry of the period.[568]

[s 148.4] Amendment to Section 148 Does Not Affect Inherent Power

The amendment by CPC (Amendment) Act of 1999 made in section 148 affects the power of the court to enlarge time that may have been fixed or granted by the court for the doing of any act prescribed or allowed by CPC. The amendment provides that the period shall not exceed 30 days in total. Before this amendment, there was no such restriction of time. Whether the court has no inherent power to extend the time beyond 30 days is the question. There is no doubt that the upper limit fixed in section 148 cannot take away the inherent power of the court to pass orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of process of court. The rigid operation of the section would lead to absurdity. Section 151 has, therefore, to be allowed to fully operate. Extension beyond maximum of 30 days, thus, can be permitted if the act could not be performed within 30 days for the reasons beyond the control of the party. However, this interpretation is not applicable to a case where time for doing an act has been prescribed under the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1963 which cannot be extended either under section 148 or section 151. But it applies to a case where the time is fixed or granted by the court for performance of an act prescribed or allowed by the court.[569]

[s 148.5] Does Enlargement of Time for Payment of Court Fee Fall in Section 148 or 149?

The enlargement of time sought for payment of court-fee cannot be granted under section 148 of the CPC. In fact, section 148 is not relevant in the present case where question is regarding enlargement/extension of time for payment of court-fee. This is because, there is specific provision, namely section 149 of the CPC dealing with power of court to permit payment of court-fee at any stage.[570]

[s 148.6] Section 148 and Section 149

A bare reading of section 148 of the CPC makes it clear that where any period is fixed or granted by the court for doing any act, the court can, in its discretion, enlarge that period from time to time, even though the period originally fixed or granted may have expired. Section 149 of the CPC provides that where the whole or any part of the fee prescribed has not been paid, the court can, in its discretion, at any stage, allow the person by whom such fee is payable to pay the whole or part of such court fee and upon such payment, the document in respect of which such fee is payable shall have the same force and effect as if such fee had been paid in the first instance. A reading of both these provisions together leaves no room for doubt that the court was not powerless to enlarge time for making up the deficiency in the payment of court fee even though the period originally fixed by the court had expired. The view that since the time originally fixed by the court had expired it had no power to enlarge time was not accepted by their Lordships of the Supreme Court,[571] and while reversing the judgment of the high court, their Lordships observed that section 148 of the CPC, in terms allows extension of time even though the original period had expired and section 149 is equally liberal.[572]

It is to be noted that section 148 allows extension or enlargement of time fixed or granted by the court for doing any act prescribed or allowed by this Code. A limit of 30 days has been introduced in the section by Amendment Act 46 of 1999 w.e.f. 1-7-2002 for such enlargement of time. On the other hand section 149 of CPC empowers the court to allow at any stage to make up the deficiency of court fees and it permits the court, upon fair use of discretion, to allow such person to pay the whole or part of the court fees. Thus, power under section 149 is wider than the one given under section 148 of the code.[573]

[s 148.7] Second Application—Maintainability

When an application filed under section 148 of the CPC for enlarging time granted by the court is dismissed, the petitioner is not left without remedy. On the other hand, it is obvious that dismissal of such an application in respect of which a petition for restoration cannot be filed, does not bar a fresh application for the relief of enlargement of time. It is obvious that such a second application could seek extension of time not only up to the date on which the first application was dismissed, but also in respect of subsequent period also. It may be mentioned that under the same principle, the dismissal of an execution petition in default does not bar a fresh petition if it is filed within the prescribed period of the limitation.[574]

[s 148.8] Functus Officio

The application of this section to a case depends on the question whether the matter has been finally disposed off by the court or the court is seized of the matter and has control over it. If the order is not final and the court retains its control over it and is seized of the matter, it has full power to make any just or necessary order therein, including in appropriate cases, the extension of the time under this section. On the other hand, if the effect of the order is that in the event of non-compliance, it operates automatically and without further intervention of the court, this section cannot be applied for the obvious reason that the court ceases to be seized of the matter and becomes functus officio.[575] In other words, it is only when the proceeding is still pending and not finally disposed of, that the court has jurisdiction to grant extension of time, under this section. So, where a final decree terminating the action has been passed, the court has no power to extend the period fixed therein.[576] Thus, when a decree has been passed directing a tenant under the Assam Non-Agricultural Urban Areas Tenancy Act to pay arrears, the court, passing the decree, has thereafter no power to grant extension of time for payment, first, because the court has become functus officio and is no longer seized of the matter and secondly, because there is no question of any act prescribed or allowed by the CPC as contemplated by this section.[577]

Conditional order was passed by the court, allowing a petition on payment of costs, with a direction that "otherwise, the petition will stand dismissed". Costs were not deposited on the specified date (or even on subsequent dates to which the case was adjourned). Case was not dismissed by the court, but was kept pending. It was held that the court had not become functus officio. It could grant extension of time for payment of costs.[578]

[s 148.9] Principles Underlying the Section

If a party seeks enlargement of time on the ground that for some valid reasons it could not perform the act which it was required to perform within the time granted by the court, it is for the party to move an application under section 148 of the CPC and the convenience of the court that the interest of justice would require extension of time whether prospectively or retrospectively under section 148 itself. It is not obligatory to move such an application in all the cases. Where the omission on the part of the party is trivial and the mistake committed by him is not of a serious nature and does not adversely affect the rights of the parties, the court may itself extend the time under section 148, so that the technical defects may be removed and the hearing of the case may proceed in accordance with law.[579]

[s 148.10] Act Prescribed or Allowed by This Code

The present section empowers the court to extend the time fixed by it even after the expiry of the period originally fixed.[580] The power is discretionary and the court is, therefore, entitled to consider the conduct of the party applying for extension.[581] It is a legislative recognition of the rule laid down in the Bombay case of Bhagwan Das v Haji Abu Ahmed,[582] and the cases on which that rule was based.[583] In the Bombay case, it was held that it was competent to the court to extend the time fixed under section 54 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882

(now O VII, rule 11) even after the expiry of the time originally granted. It must, however, be noted that the section applies only where time is fixed for the doing of an act prescribed or allowed by CPC. "Code" includes rules, and prescribed means "prescribed" by the rules (see section 2, clauses (1) and (16). See, for instance, the following rules:

(i) Order VI, rule 17 (amendment of pleadings);

(ii) Order VII, rule 11(b) (requiring plaintiff to correct valuation of suit);

(iii) Order VII, rule 11 (requiring plaintiff to supply requisite stamp paper, where the plaint is written upon paper insufficiently stamped);

(iv) Order VIII, rule 9 (requiring written statement or additional written statement from a party);

(v) Order XXI, rule 17 (amendment of application for execution);

(vi) Order XXV, rule 2 (security for costs of suit);

(vii) Order XLI, rule 10 (security for costs of appeal).

It has been held in LP Jain v Nandakumar,[584] that when the defendant applied under O IX, rule 13 for setting aside an ex parte decree, he was not doing any act prescribed or allowed by the CPC extended under this section. Where the plaintiff filed amended plaint after expiry of 14 days time granted by the trial court and the mistake committed by the plaintiff was not of serious nature and does not adversely affect the rights of the parties, then extension of time by court itself to file amended plaint would be proper.[585]

The Supreme Court was seized of a question that whether or not the court has the discretion to enlarge the time for doing any act prescribed by the Code or allowed by the Code.[586] It was held by referring to section 148 that when any period or time is granted by the court for doing any act, the court has the discretion from time to time to enlarge such period even if the time originally fixed or granted by the court has expired. Previously discretion was given to the court to enlarge the period fixed or granted by the court for any act prescribed or allowed by the Code. The CPC (Amendment) Act, 1999 puts a limit of thirty days on the enlargement of such period. The words "not exceeding thirty days in total" have been inserted with a view to curtail procedural delay caused by any party to the suit or proceeding. Enlargement of time, whether one-time or phased, cannot exceed thirty days. In the instant case, the high court had ordered on 3 May 2013 subject to the payment of cost of Rs 25,000/- to the respondents within a period of eight weeks from the date of the order. The appellant stated that the copy of the order dated 3 May 2010 was received in the office of its legal department on 12 May 2012 and the accounts department gave its approval for the payment of cost on 26 May 2010. The legal department thereafter prepared voucher/bill for the amount of Rs 25,000/- and the same was approved on 3 June 2013 and the accounts department issued the cheque on 15 June 2015. It was further averred that the applications were presented before the executing court to accept the cheque on 30 June 2010 and the said applications were dismissed inter alia holding that the time limit granted by the high court was over on 28 June 2010 and the executing court had no power to extend the time granted by the high court. The executing court was found correct in saying that it could not extend the time for depositing the cost as the same had been stipulated by the high court. The high court, however, had declined to extend the time, mainly on the ground that one SLP filed by the respondents was dismissed as withdrawn and that the respondents had lost their right to challenge the order passed by the high court now. The high court while declining to enlarge the time to deposit the cost did not take into consideration the sequence of dates and events stated by the appellant corporation in depositing the amount which the Supreme Court found incorrect and overturned the high court's decision.

On the question of extension of time for filing written statement in a suit, the views expressed by various high courts are not consistent. A Division Bench of the Karnataka High Court has held that a court trying a civil suit does not have any power to extend time for filing the written statement beyond what is stipulated in O VIII, rule 1 of the code, ie beyond 90 days from the date of service of summons.[587] TS Thakur, J (as he then was), observed in the above decision or follows:

> The amended provision of Order VIII, Rule 1 of the CPC effectively deals with the cause of delay in disposal of cases arising out of the unamended provision. That being so, any interpretation of Order VIII, Rule 1 of the CPC which may remove the legal barrier of a time frame for filing the written statement would result in the unamended provision re-emerging and as a consequence the mischief sought to be remedied reappearing.[588]

However, in a case, where the defendant filed written statement 8 days beyond the period of 90 days, the Jharkhand High Court accepted the plea of the defendant that he misunderstood the order of the Court adjourning the case as fixing time for filing written statement and granted extension of time on payment of cost.[589] After noticing the above-mentioned decision of the Karnataka High Court, Balasubramanyan, CJ (as he then was), dissented from the views expressed in the Karnataka decision and observed as follows:

> In a way, the decision of the Karnataka cannot be said to be not justified, taking note of the purpose with which amendment to Order VIII Rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure was made. But, at the same time, is it necessary to denude the Court dealing with a lis of even a limited power of granting some time to a defendant for filing a written statement in an appropriate case? No doubt, when the Parliament expressed an intention that the provision in that behalf must be followed, the Court has necessarily to proceed on that basis. But at the same time, when the power of the Court to extend some sort of a locus paenitentiae to a defendant is saved by section 148 of the Code of Civil Procedure, should the Court be deprived of that discretion? I think that on a balancing of all aspects and considering the harsh consequence that arises out of barring a defendant from filing a written statement on the ground that he has not filed it within 90 days of the receipt of summons the Court must be held to have that limited power if the defendant shows sufficient cause for extending the time beyond 90 days but within the limits of the proviso to Section 148 of the Code.[590]

The above view of the Jharkhand High Court was followed in a later decision of the same court wherein it was held that the period of 90 days from the date of receipt of summons for filing written statement can be extended by court under section 148 in exceptional circumstances for a period not exceeding 30 days. However, in this case the court held that since the defendant failed to file written statement in spite of sufficient opportunity, the refusal to accept written statement was proper.[591] In a suit against government for recovery of money for work done, the Karnataka High Court held that non-availability of documents to prepare written statement are circumstances beyond control of a party and as such grave injustice would be caused if time is not extend for filing written statement.[592]

[s 148.11] Discretion of Court

Even though section 148 confers a discretionary power, yet the power should be exercised where necessities of the case so demand.[593] A casual reading of section 148 of the CPC would clinch the fact that extending the time of the parties to a litigation by the court of law is purely discretionary one. It has to be seen that the ground for granting extension of time[594] is to be identified by a court of law if the sine qua non is to exercise its discretionary power under section 148 of the CPC. It does not mean that after the expiry of time granted already by the court, section 148 of the CPC will give an automatic right to the aggrieved parties to get the extension of time of that is not the tenor of the provision of law adopted by the statute. The court must get fully satisfied with the ground and then only wider discretion vested with the court is to be exercised in granting the extension of time. Of course, it is unlimited and one cannot deny the discretionary power vested with the court.[595] The refusal, by the court, to enlarge time for making a deposit in the court is proper, where the enlargement is sought on the ground of the sudden illness of the judgment-debtor and if the medical certificate, which was required to be filed on the next date of hearing, was not filed.[596] The power given to the court under section 148, is discretionary and is given for the purpose of securing the ends of justice in case of necessity. Thus, the court has the power to enlarge the time for submitting the certified copy, even if it has been filed late, after obtaining the same, irrespective of the fact that the appeal was admitted and the appellant was allowed to file the certified copy "as soon as it is available".[597] The delay in payment of deficit court fees can be condoned and time be enlarged for submitting the same under section 148 of the CPC.[598] Where the court fixes the time for doing a thing, the court always retains the power to extend the time for doing so. The principle of section 148 of the CPC must govern not whittling down the discretion conferred on the court.[599]

In 2005, in Welset Engineers v Vikas Auto Industries,[600] the challenge before the Supreme Court was that the Bombay High Court had held that that O XXXIX, rule 2(a) was a specific provision to meet the contingency of breach of injunction orders and when such remedies were available, the person complaining of the breach of the injunction order should not be allowed to take up the proceedings of contempt of court. It was held that as per section 122 of the Code, if there is any conflict between the provisions of the Code with the Rules framed by a high court, the latter shall prevail. In Quantum Securities,[601] an attempt was made to doubt the correctness of this order but it failed.

Under this section power can be exercised by court to extend time to deposit cost. Such extension can be granted even if the application is filed after the of the period initially fixed for payment or deposit of the amount.[602]

It has been held by the Punjab and Haryana High Court that permission for enlargement of time for paying court fees cannot be denied for want of formal application for the said purpose when specific plea was taken up by the appellant in memorandum of appeal seeking grant of time for depositing court fees. It was further held that the right to object to extension of time in making up the deficiency of court fee did not lay with the respondents but with the State as Court fee is in the nature of revenue.[603]

[s 148.12] Act Directed or Allowed by a Decree of Court

This section does not apply where time is allowed for doing an act by a decree in a suit.[604] In a Delhi case, it was held that although time was granted by the court under the decree, it was not an act prescribed or allowed by any "provision of the Code" or rules made thereunder. section 148 was not applicable and the court had no jurisdiction to extend the time fixed for the performance of an obligation under the compromise decree.[605] But, if the decree is a preliminary decree, the court keeping control over the action has full power to make any just and necessary orders therein including inappropriate cases, the extension of time. So, in a decree for specific performance of a contract of sale, the court may extend the time fixed in the decree for the payment of the price, because the decree is in the nature of a preliminary decree.[606] When, in affirming a decree for specific performance, the appellate court grants further time, that does not deprive the court of first instance of its own power to grant extension of time under this section so long as the suit had not been finally disposed of.[607] Where, however, an appeal against a preliminary decree is dismissed and the preliminary decree is confirmed, the time for payment allowed in the trial court's decree does not get automatically extended unless the appellate court has extended it, even though in the meantime the final decree has been passed.[608] The Tripura decision to the contrary requires reconsideration, in view of the Supreme Court's decision.[609] Where the decree for specific performance provides that in default of payment within a time stated the suit should stand dismissed, the court has no power to extend the time under this section.[610] In a Bombay case, a decree was passed for specific performance. Relevant clause in the decree provided that if the defendants paid certain amount by a certain date, the plaintiff would have the decree marked "fully satisfied". It was held that the time for payment could not be extended without the consent of the plaintiff.

If the clause concerned is in the nature of a penalty or a forfeiture, the court is always competent to give relief against it. The test is, whether, by allowing the decree-holder to enforce the default clause he would get more than what he deserved. If the court, in its conscience, considers that he would unjustly enrich himself by holding on to the default clause, it would interfere, be it a consent decree or otherwise.[611]

An order admitting a winding-up petition is a procedural and not a final order and the court has, in such a case, the power to extend time under rule 7 of the companies (court) rules even though it is a self operative order and the time fixed has already expired.[612] The form of a pre-emption decree is fixed by O XX, rule 14 and there is, therefore, no analogy between such a decree and a decree for specific performance of a contract of sale;[613] but as to pre-emption decrees, the cases are not consistent. It was held by the Allahabad High Court in Saranjan v Ram Bahal,[614] that a court has no power under this section to extend the time fixed by its decree under O XX, rule 14 for payment of purchase money in a suit for pre-emption. The Allahabad decision has been approved by the Madras High Court,[615] and the Oudh Chief Court.[616] The High Court of Patna has, however, held that the court has power, under this section, to extend the time fixed by a decree passed under O XX, rule 14.[617] But where time is fixed by a decree of the court, the section may be applied. In a case where an ex parte decree was set aside on condition that the defendant should pay a sum of money within a week, the Allahabad High Court held that the conditional order did not have the effect of a preliminary decree and that the lower court should have required the money to be deposited by a certain day and then passed an order setting aside the decree. In this view of the order, time was extended on defendant's default.[618]

An application for the withdrawal of a suit (with permission to bring a fresh suit) was granted on the condition of payment of costs. Such payment was not made a condition precedent, though a time was fixed. It was held that the time could be extended.[619] An appellate court passed a pre-emptory order, allowing the appellant two weeks" time to file copies of the paper book on "compulsory papers". Appellant failed to comply with the order. It was held that in the absence of the words "in default, the appeal shall stand dismissed without further reference to the Bench", the court retained control over the case and could extend the time under section 148.[620] A court directed issue of notice on the unserved respondents within stipulated time and ordered that on non- compliance with the order, the revision would stand automatically rejected. The order was not complied with; but the excuse for non-compliance (as given) was "inadvertence". It was held that neither section 148, nor section 151 could be invoked to restore the revision in such circumstances.[621] A decree for specific performance of an agreement to sell land was passed, subject to the condition that the plaintiff should deposit the sale price within the time fixed in the decree. It was held that the decree being conditional, the time could not be extended. Maruti Vishnu v Keshav[622] has not been followed, in view of later unreported ruling of a division bench.[623] A decree for the possession of property fixed a period of one month within which the decree-holder should deposit a certain amount in court. It did not provide that if he failed to do so, the suit would stand dismissed. Decree-holder did not deposit the amount within one month, but applied for extension of time under section 148, which was granted. It was held that the court had jurisdiction to do so under section 148.[624] Suit was decreed ex parte, directing decree holder to deposit particular amount within a month. The decree holder contended that he could not deposit the amount in court within the time stipulated in the decree as he was not in station since he had to accompany his mother for treatment at Madras, being the only son, and there is no wilful laches or negligence on this part in depositing the amount in time. The lower court found the above explanation offered by the decree holder for his failure to deposit the amount in time as directed in the decree acceptable and condoned the delay. The high court confirmed that the impugned order passed by the lower court as being a legal, just and proper order.[625] In a decree for eviction, there was non-specification of costs and interest in the judgment. At the same time, it granted liberty to the decree-holder to execute the decree on failure, to pay costs and interest within the stipulated time. In such a case, the court is justified in condoning the delay of the defendants in making the deposit. It is well-established principle of law that no one should suffer on account of default of the court.[626]

Where a decree for payment of admitted amount by instalments was passed, an application for re-scheduling of payment or extension of time under section 148 cannot be allowed by court as a matter of course. In a case where the court had already granted enough time and no ground was made out to ask for the court's indulgence for making further extension time, it was held that extension of time cannot be granted.[627]

In a pre-emption suit, time is specified in the decree for deposit of pre-emption money. The provision of O XX, rule 14 regarding compliance with directions of deposit in decree are mandatory because failure to comply with the said directions entails dismissal of the suit. Therefore, provision of section 148 of CPC cannot be used to negate the mandatory provisions of law. Consequently, time for deposit of pre-emption money as provided in the decree cannot be extended under section 148 of the Code.[628]

In auction sale in Execution, the provisions relating to deposit of purchase money in O XXI, rule 85 are mandatory. In case of failure to deposit full amount of sale price within 15 days of the auction, sale is to be treated as a nullity. Therefore, the court cannot extend time for payment of purchase money under section 148 of the code.[629]

However, act not directed by decree of court but performed out of consent of parties would not come within the ambit of section 148 of the Code for enlargement of time. Thus, where a decree itself was not an instalment decree nor any order permitting payment of decretal amount in instalments had been made by the court in the original suit, the executing court has no power to allow payment of decretal amount by instalments. Decree-holder, however, consented for receiving decretal amount by way of instalment but the judgment-debtor committed default. It was held that extension of time for payment by instalments cannot be granted.[630]

[s 148.13] Conditional Order by the Court in Which Time Cannot be Extended

If the effect of the order is that in the event of non-compliance, it operates automatically and without further intervention of the court, the section cannot be applied, either because the order operates as a decree or because there is no previous order currently on which the order extending time can operate. Thus, if the order is that security shall be given within a month "otherwise the petition shall stand dismissed",[631] or extra court fee shall be paid within a week "otherwise the suit shall stand dismissed",[632] or "the appeal shall stand dismissed",[633] or the decree shall be a nullity,[634] or the decretal amount be paid within ten days, otherwise the application shall stand dismissed,[635] or that the application to set aside an ex parte decree "will stand dismissed" if costs were not paid within a specified time,[636] or that if the balance purchase money was not paid within a given time, the "suit shall stand dismissed",[637] or that an amendment application should stand dismissed if costs are not paid within a particular date,[638] no extension can be granted. Similarly, where a decree is passed on condition that payment of a certain sum is made by a specified time, the suit would be decreed and that, in default, it would be dismissed, the court after expiry of that time loses control over the suit cannot extend the time.[639] Trial court said in its order, that if costs were not paid within a specified period, the suit shall "stand dismissed". The costs were not so paid. It was held that the suit stood dismissed. The parties entered into a compromise, wherein mutual obligation had to be performed by the plaintiff and the defendant. The plaintiff was required to deliver the machine in question to the defendant's representative within three months from the date of decree and, in case of his failure to do so, his suit was to stand dismissed. The time of three months was of the essence of contract, which was the basis of the compromise decree. The plaintiff failed to deliver the machine and made an application for extension of time. It was in these circumstances that the order was passed.[640] deposited on the specified date (or even on subsequent dates to which the case was adjourned), the case was not dismissed by the court, but was kept pending. It was held that the court had not become functus officio and could grant extension of time for the payment of costs.[641] In a Madras case, a conditional order was passed for the stay of execution of a decree on payment of a certain amount. The time fixed expired and delivery of immovable property was effected. Subsequently, the court ordered extension of the time limit for payment of the amount. It was held that order for delivery was valid. Section 148 does not render such an order illegal.[642]

It was held in Printing and Industrial Machinery v Swastika Press,[643] that the court had the power to extend time even when the order had provided that in default of compliance within a period specified, the petition or suit should stand dismissed and the order had worked itself out as a result of default. But the Madras High Court has dissented from this decision.[644] The high court has explained that the principle of the court losing seisin of the matter applies when the suit is finally disposed off by an order. But if the order does not so dispose off the matter, and the court still retains control of it, it will have the power to make an appropriate order extending the time. Thus, where restoration of a suit is allowed on condition of payment of costs within a particular period, in default of which the application for restoration was ordered to be dismissed and to be posted for final order, the time was enlarged even after the period had lapsed.[645] As the Madhya Pradesh High Court has observed, the court does not cease to have jurisdiction on the happening of the default. There are no words in section 148, to confine it to cases in which extension is sought before the period fixed by the court expires. The court does not cease to have jurisdiction until it makes an order finally disposing off the proceeding before it.[646] The Calcutta High Court has also held that where an order was made for receiving additional written statement on payment of costs within a specified date, the time could be extended, even though there was a provision in the order that in case of default, the petition should stand dismissed.[647] If, however, the order is that deficit court fee be paid within a fortnight "otherwise the plaintiffs will not be entitled to the decree and the suit will be dismissed";[648] or if the application be made before the expiry of the period prescribed, extension can be granted.[649] The Patna High Court has held that an executing court can extend the time where an application is made for enlarging time for payment of an instalment on the ground that information about the date of such payment reached the judgment-debtor only on the previous day.[650] But the Bombay High Court has expressed the view that an application for extension of time can be made not to the executing court but to the trial court.[651] In LP Jain v Nandakumar,[652] after order was made on an application under O IX, rule 13, that if the applicant paid certain amount within four weeks, the expense decree would be set aside, and in default the application should stand dismissed. An application for further time was filed on the last day. It was held that this was not maintainable, as the court had become functus officio after passing the order. But this decision cannot be held to be good law in view of the subsequent pronouncement of the Supreme Court in Mahanth Ram Das v Ganga Das.[653] There, an order was made in appeal that the plaintiff should pay additional court fees, both on the plaint and on this memorandum of appeal, within three months and that in default, the suit should stand dismissed. The plaintiff applied within time, for extension of time for payment, but the period had expired when the petition actually came up for hearing. The high court dismissed it on the ground that the order had worked itself out and that the court had no power to extend the time.[654] In reversing this decision, the Supreme Court held that section 148 applied and that the order, though made after the expiry of the period, would relate back to the date of petition, and so extension could be granted. The decision is not, it is submitted, an authority for the position that an application for extension could be made after the expiry of the period. It only decides that if an application is made within time, extension could be granted, even though at the time of the order, the period had expired. The Allahabad High Court has held that a court can grant extension of time even after the lapse of time originally granted, on the ground that it is not the application for grant for further time, whether made before or after the expiry of the time granted, which confers jurisdiction. The court possesses it under this section and the application merely invokes that jurisdiction.[655] But when an order stayed execution of a decree on condition that the appellant should make a payment of rent and assessment within a stated time, an extension was allowed as there was no express direction that execution should proceed in default of payment.[656] Again, when a court of appeal remanded a case under O XLI, rule 23 on condition that the appellant produced certain papers within a month, with a direction that in default "the appeal shall stand dismissed automatically upon a report made by the court below that the order of the court for filing papers has not been complied with". The Allahabad High Court pointed out that the expression "upon a report being made" contradicted the word "automatically", for the order of dismissal could only be passed upon a report being received from the lower court and held that the court had jurisdiction to extend time.[657] This is also the opinion of the Calcutta High Court.[658] The Patna High Court has held that where a court permits the plaintiff to withdraw suit under O XXIII, rule 1 with liberty to bring a fresh suit on payment of costs within a prescribed period, the court has power under this section to extend the time.[659] This decision was approved by the Madras High Court, which held that O XXIII, rule 1 did not require that costs awarded against a plaintiff who was given permission to withdraw a suit with liberty to file a fresh one, must be paid before the second suit was filed, that they might be paid. even after the second suit was filed and that even if time had been fixed in the order, it could be extended under this section.[660] While granting permission under rule 1(3) of O XXIII of the CPC to withdraw suit and to file a fresh suit it is open to a court to direct the plaintiff to pay the costs of the defendants. Even if the order for costs in a given case is construed as directing payment of costs as a condition precedent for filing a fresh suit, the defect, if any, may be cured by depositing, in court, or paying to the defendants concerned, the costs, within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court before which the second suit is filed. If the plaintiff fails to comply with the said direction, then it will be open to the court to reject the plaint, but if the amount of cost is paid within the time fixed or extended by the court, the suit should be deemed to have been instituted validly on the date on which it was presented.

This view is in consonance with justice and the spirit of section 148 of the CPC.[661] The Oudh Court, while holding that this section does not allow enlargement of time where the time is fixed by a decree in a suit, holds that if an appeal is referred from the decree, the appellate court may extend the time prescribed by the decree not under section 148, but under O XLI, rule 32 by varying the decree of the lower court in that behalf. It has, thus, been held that if a decree is passed for pre-emption on payment of a certain sum in court within a prescribed time, and an appeal is preferred from the decree, the appellate court has the power to extend the time for payment.[662] The Allahabad High Court has also held that time may be extended by the appellate court by varying the terms of the order under the provisions of O XLI, rule 32.[663] The section does not, in any case, empower a court to interfere with or modify its decree after an appeal has been filed against it.[664]

The Supreme Court has held that according to section 35B if costs are levied on the plaintiff for causing delay, payment of such costs on the next hearing date shall be a condition precedent to the further prosecution of the suit by the plaintiff. But the words "further prosecution of the suit" or "further prosecution of the defence," as the case may be, mean that such defaulting party is prohibited from further participation in the suit. It does not mean dismissal of the suit or defence to be struck off. In suitable cases the court has power to extend time for payment of costs with the aid of section 148 of the code.[665] Raveendran, J, speaking for the Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> We may also refer to an incidental issue. When section 35B states that payment of such costs on the date next following the date of the order shall be a condition precedent for further prosecution, it clearly indicates that when the costs are levied, it should be paid on the next date of hearing and if not paid, the consequences mentioned therein shall follow. But the said provision will not come in the way of the court, in its discretion extending the time for such payment, in exercise of its general power to extend time under section 148 of CPC. Having regard to the scheme and object of section 35B, it is needless to say that such extension can be only in exceptional circumstances and by subjecting the defaulting party to further terms.[666]

An application for extension of time fixed by the decree in a redemption suit for payment of the mortgage-debt does not fall under this section, but under O XXXIV, rule 8.[667]

[s 148.15] Non-Deposit

From the decisions on the subject, one could distinguish:

(i) the cases of non-deposit of the whole of the purchase money within the fixed time where there was no stay order granted from the appellate court from;

(ii) cases of non deposit of decretal amount consequent upon a stay order granted by the Appellate Court; and

(iii) non-deposit of small fraction amount.

In the first category of cases, O XX, rule 14(1) (which is mandatory), would apply. In the second category of above cases, it would be necessary to examine the nature and effect of the stay order on the deemed disposal of the suit and also to see whether a fresh period is fixed thereby. In the third category of cases, namely, non-deposit of only a relatively small fraction of the amount, whether or not caused by any action of the court, the court has discretion to extend the time, if it is satisfied that the mistake was bona fide and was not indicative of negligence or inaction.[668]

[s 148.16] Specific Performance

In a suit for specific performance of a contract, the compromise decree directed the defendant to execute registered sale deed in favour of plaintiff, on the plaintiff's paying the balance of sale consideration within a specified period. The amount was not deposited. Decree-holder applied for execution. It was held that the executing court was wrong in extending the time for depositing the amount, particularly when, at an earlier stage, the judgment-debtor had been given more than one extension of time before the decree was passed.[669] The power of extension of time for deposit of the consideration money has been reserved by section 28(1) of the Specific Relief Act, 1963 and under section 148 of the CPC only for the court which has passed the decree and not by any other court. For the redressal of his grievance, the plaintiff in the suit, under the law, has a right to approach that court, which passed the decree and that court has the right and jurisdiction to modify the decree by extending time.

A separate suit, seeking extension of time to deposit consideration money which was agreed, by and between the parties in the compromise decree would not be maintainable under section 28(1) of the Specific Relief Act, 1963 and section 148 of the CPC.[670]

Where the decree-holder deposits into court, what he believes to be the entire purchase money but due to inadvertent mistake, whether or not caused by any action of the court, what is deposited, falls short of the decretal amount by a small fraction thereof and the party within such time after the mistake is pointed out or resiled, as would not prove willful default or negligence on his part, pays the deficit amount into the court with its permission, the suit should not be taken to have stood dismissed under O XX, rule 14(1) of the CPC. In such cases, the court has the discretion under section 148 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to extend the time even though the time fixed has already expired, provided it is satisfied that the mistake is bona fide and is not indicative of negligence or inaction.

The court will extend the time when it finds that the mistake was the result of, or induced by, an action of the court applying the maxim actus curiae neminem gravabit—an act of the court shall prejudice no man. While it would be necessary to consider the facts of the case to determine whether the inadvertent mistake was due to any action of the court, it would be appropriate to find that the ultimate permission to deposit the challaned amount is that of the court.

There are also cases of non-deposit of the decretal-amount consequent upon a stay order granted by the appellate court. In such cases, it would be necessary to examine the nature and effect of the stay order on the deemed disposal of the suit and also to see whether a fresh period is fixed thereby. While mere filing of an appeal does not suspend a pre-emption decree, a stay order passed by an appellate court may suspend it, in the manner ordered therein.

However, in cases of non-deposit of the whole of the purchase money, within the fixed time where there was no stay order granted by the appellate court, the mandatory provisions of O XX, rule 14(1) of the CPC, would be strictly applicable.[671]

[s 148.17] Time Fixed by Contract

A Calcutta case holds that where the time fixed by contract is not of the essence of the contract but is penal, the court can extend the time and grant relief even without the consent of the other party.[672]

[s 148.18] Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920: Extension of Time for Applying for Discharge

Section 27(2) of the Provincial Act, 1920, allows the court to extend the period during which a debtor may apply for his discharge. section 43(1) of the same Act provides that if the debtor does not apply during the period specified, the order of adjudication shall be annulled. The Madras High Court has held that under this section, the court may extend the time fixed even after the expiry of the period but before the order of amendment has been made.[673] Section 5 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920 makes the CPC applicable, subject to the provisions of the Act and if section 43(1) is mandatory, it supersedes section 148 of the CPC. But the courts are agreed that section 43(1) is directory.[674]

[s 148.19] Period Fixed by Statute

The court has no power to extend a period fixed by statute and not fixed or granted by the court.[675] Therefore, the court has no power to extend the period fixed by O XXI, rule 85 of the CPC;[676] nor to extend the period prescribed by the law of limitation;[677] nor the period of one month fixed by section 55(4) of the CPC.[678] It is only reasonable to hold that the provisions of section 4A of Kerala Court Fees and Suit Valuation Act, 1959 may not have the effect of excluding the operation of sections 148 and 149 of the CPC even if the provision in the proviso is held to be mandatory. Harmonious interpretation of the above provision alone will be justifiable and acceptable when we keep in mind the principle of interpretation that no provision of an enactment should be interpreted and understood in such a manner as to render. in other provision, in the same or another enactment totally ineffective or inoperative unless there is express indication to that effect.[679]

[s 148.20] Consent Order

Where the time for doing an act has been fixed by a consent order, it cannot be enlarged except by consent.[680] Similarly, where the executing court has extended the time for confirmation of sale even after dismissing the application under O XXI, rule 90 with the consent of parties, it cannot, thereafter, further extend the time except with the consent of the parties.[681]

[s 148.21] Compromise Decree

Where under a compromise decree a certain time is fixed for the performance of an obligation under the decree, the court has no power to vary the decree.[682] But it has been held that where the compromise decree does not provide that in default of payment, the rights of the party in default should cease, the court has jurisdiction to extend the time.[683] Time was fixed under a compromise decree for the performance of obligations under the decree. Time was the essence of the contract. Court has no jurisdiction to extend it by invoking section 148. section 148 applies only where the time is fixed for the doing of an act prescribed or allowed by the CPC, including the rules. But by invoking section 148, the court cannot extend the time fixed for the performance of an obligation under the compromise decree.[684] A suit was filed for specific performance of an agreement to reconvey property. Compromise decree stipulated payment within five weeks and the suit was to be decreed on such payment. Plaintiff applied for extension of the time laid down in the decree. It was held that the court had power to extend the time, even without the consent of the other party, "as in such a case, the time so stipulated is not of the essence of the contract and is a penal clause and such time becomes part of the court's order and the court is empowered to relieve the party concerned of the rigours of such penal clause in appropriate cases."[685] Time for depositing amount of consideration was stipulated by the parties themselves in the compromise. Order of the court in terms of the compromise was passed; question arose whether the court can grant extension of time for deposit, when the time for deposit was not stipulated earlier by any order of the court. It was held that the trial court had the jurisdiction to extend the time for depositing the consideration amount, if such extension was required to further the ends of justice or to relieve against a forfeiture clause.[686] Where the contract between the parties has merged in the order of the court, the courts' freedom to act to further the ends of justice would not stand curtailed. Although the court would not rewrite a contract between the parties, but it would relieve against a forfeiture clause. By virtue of the courts' order in terms of the compromise, the time for deposit stipulated by the parties became the time allowed by the court and this gave the court the jurisdiction to extend time. But the time would be granted in rare cases to prevent manifest injustice and it would not be extended ordinarily, nor for the mere asking.[687]

A power under section 148 for enlargement of time can be exercised only in a case where a period is fixed or granted by the court for doing of any act prescribed by the court. In a compromise decree such as the one on hand, the stipulation that the judgment debtor is required to make the payment of the money within a specified period is a stipulation by agreement between the parties and it is not a period fixed by the court. Therefore, section 148 of the CPC has no application to such a situation.[688]

In a recovery certificate proceedings under the Recovery of Debts Due to Banks and Financial Institutions Act, 1993, the Bank agree for one-time settlement and the parties settled their claim before Lok Adalat. The Debt Recovery Tribunal passed detailed order recording the Award of the Lok Adalat. The borrower, however, failed to repay the amount as per Award passed by the Lok Adalat inspite of sufficient time as also extended time. It was only after the Bank proceeded recovery certificate the borrower started filing applications, after much delay. It was held that the conduct of the borrower clearly establishes gross negligence and therefore, the extension of time granted by the Debt Recovery Appellate Tribunal was not justified.[689]

In a Himachal Pradesh case, the compromise between the parties was, in fact, an agreement of sale and the object of the clause providing for payment of sale consideration within the stipulated period was simply to secure prompt payment, under threat of the respondent losing his mortgage rights, or, as the case may be, tenancy rights. This was a penal clause and could be relieved against, provided the respondent could show that he had made no wilful default in making the payment and further showed that he had offered to discharge the obligation within a reasonable period.[690] Court is not competent, under section 148, to extend the time, where there is a conditional decree. section 148 applies to procedural errors and not to conditional decrees. In the above case, the compromise decree was for payment of a sum of Rs 15,000 in three equal instalments by the respondent, by specified dates. The decree further provided as under:

> In case the respondent fails to pay either of said instalments, the appeal shall stand accepted and the suit of the plaintiff decreed. However, if the respondent fails to pay all the instalments as stated above, the appeal shall stand dismissed.

It was held that the time for payment of instalment could not be extended. The decree was a conditional decree distinguished.[691]

It was held, in Bhupendranath v PK Biswas,[692] that when the terms of a consent order were not carried out, owing to lawyer's default, the court has the power to grant relief.

[s 148.22] Court to Which Application Should be Made for Extension of Time

Where a decree is passed against a defendant requiring him to execute a kabuliat in favour of the plaintiff within two months, and an appeal is preferred from the decree, the only court that has power to extend the time, assuming the case is one under this section, is the appellate court, and not the court which passed the decree.[693] The court executing a decree has no jurisdiction to extend the time granted by the decree.[694] The meaning of the word "court" as used in section 148 is the court which passed the order and fixed the date for particular act and not any other court, much less the subordinate court.[695]

[s 148.23] Appeal

No appeal lies from an order under this section. The order is not a decree, nor is it one of the appealable orders mentioned in section 104.[696] An order of trial judge under section 148, extending the time for deposit under O XX, rule 14 can be interfered with by the high court in revision, only if the trial judge: (i) had no jurisdiction to make the order, which it has made; and (ii) acted in breach of any provision of law or committed any error which was material and may have affected the decision of the case. The high court cannot interfere, merely because it differed with the conclusions of the trial judge on questions of fact or law.[697]

[s 148.24] Award of Lok Adalat—Application of Section 148

Section 21(2) of the Legal Services Authorities Act, 1987 provides that an award made by a Lok Adalat is final and binding on the parties. Thus, in a suit for recovery of money based on promissory note, award was passed by the Lok Adalat at time for payment was not fixed by court but parties at their own volition fixed a date for payment. In such a case section 148 has no application and court has no power to extend time fixed in the award.[698]

699. Inserted by Act 104 of 1976, section 50 (w.e.f. 1-2-1977).

This section is salutary. Without it, parties sometimes obtained ex parte interim orders without any intimation to the opposite parties causing inconvenience and even detriment to them. The object of the section is two fold—firstly to provide an opportunity to such opposite parties to be heard before an ex parte order is made and show cause why it should not be passed, and secondly to avoid multiplicity of proceedings for, without such a provision, a person not a party to the application would have to file a proceeding to get rid of an order on the application if it affects him adversely. Sub-section (1) enables a person claiming the right to appear at the hearing of an application for an interim order to lodge a caveat. Sub-section (2) requires such a caveator to serve a notice of his caveat on the person by whom an application for an interim order has been or is expected to be made. Sub-section (3) requires the court, before such an order is made, to serve notice of it to the caveator and sub-section (4) requires the applicant to serve on the caveator a copy of his application, together with any papers or documents filed or intended to be filed in support of his application. Such a caveat will remain in force for 90 days from the date of its filing, unless the application referred to in sub-section (1) has been made before the expiry of the said period.

The application, referred to in sub-section (1) is a substantive application. Any person likely to be affected by an order that may be passed can file the caveat. He need not be a necessary party to the application. No particular form for the caveat is prescribed and therefore it can be in the form of a petition. The caveator must specify that nature of the application that is or is likely to be filed and his right to appear and oppose it at the hearing.[700]

[s 148A.1] Filing of Caveat

Requirement of specifying name of party likely to initiate proceedings under section 148A(2) is only directory in nature and the caveat petition cannot be rejected on that ground alone.

Section 148A of the CPC has to be understood as a right given to a person to lodge a caveat where an application is expected to be made or has been made in a suit or a proceedings instituted or a proceedings instituted or about to be instituted in a suit. Therefore, in cases, where it is not possible to identify the person or persons who are likely to institute a suit or a proceedings, and make an application in such a proceeding, still a caveat petition can be lodged and if such caveat petition is lodged, such a petition is required to be registered by the court. Merely because sub-section (2) of section 148A provides for service of notice of such a caveat petition on a person, who is expected to institute a suit or a proceedings and the requirement of the said sub-section cannot be complied with, cannot be a ground to refuse to reject the caveat petition. Sub-section (2) of section 148A of the CPC is required to be complied with when it is capable of being complied with. In cases where the person who is likely to institute a suit or proceedings cannot be ascertained with certainty, the question of complying with the requirement of sub-section (2) of section 148A does not arise. The substantive right provided to lodge the caveat cannot be taken away on the ground that the provisions of sub-section (2) of section 148A cannot be complied with. The provisions of sub-section (2) of section 148. must be understood as directory in nature. Wherever the requirement of the said provision is incapable of compliance, it will be within the discretion of the court, if valid grounds are made out for non-compliance of the said provision, to dispense with the compliance of sub-section (2) of section 148A of the CPC and direct the office to register the caveat. However, when a caveat petition is lodged, the caveator should specify, with certainty, the subject matter of the dispute, in a suit or proceedings likely to be instituted. If that is specified, it is open to the court before which the caveat is lodged in its discretion, to dispense with the requirement of sub-section (2) of section 148A, if an application under section 151 of the CPC is filed seeking dispensation of such requirement.[701] Once a caveat is filed, it is a condition precedent for passing an interim order to serve a notice of the application on the caveator who is going to be affected by the interim order. Unless that condition precedent is satisfied, it is impossible for the court to pass an interim order affecting the caveator, according to the Karnataka High Court.[702] In an Andhra Pradesh case, notice of lodgment was served on the plaintiffs. It was held that it must be taken that it is the duty of the court under section 148A, to give sufficiently reasonable and definite time to the caveators to appear and also to oppose the interlocutory application intended to be moved by the plaintiffs" applicants. The court should give a specified date for hearing of the interlocutory application. The furnishing of copies of documents by the plaintiffs to the caveators informing them of the date of their moving their interlocutory application, cannot be taken as acts constituting compliance with the specific duty assigned to the court under section (3). The court, therefore, had erred in passing the impugned order of injunction against the caveators without giving them a notice of the date of hearing. But at the same time, order passed without notifying the caveator is not void.[703] It is the duty of the court under section 148A to give sufficiently reasonable and definite time to the caveators to appear and also to oppose the interlocutory application intended to be moved by the plaintiffs-applicants; and the court should give a specified date for hearing of the interlocutory application. The furnishing of copies of documents by the plaintiffs to the caveators, and informing them of the date of their moving their interlocutory application, cannot be taken as acts constituting compliance with the specific duty assigned to the court under section 148A(3). By failing to act in compliance with the requirements of section 148A(3), the court errs in passing the impugned order of injunction against the caveator without giving them a notice of the date of hearing.[704] A Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court (overruling a contrary ruling of a single judge) has held that section 148A applies to appeals also.[705] The provisions of section 148A do not apply to writ proceedings, by reason of section 141 of the Code as amended in 1976. To such proceedings, the high court rules regarding writs would continue to apply.[706] section 148A cannot be construed to mean that where the CPC itself contemplates that in levying execution no notice is required to be given, such a notice is to be enforced by the lodging of a caveat under section 148A. section 148A should not be interpreted to contemplate the enforcement of a notice, where notice is otherwise ruled out by the other provisions of the CPC.[707]

In a testamentary suit for grant of probate, a caveat was filed by the person opposing the grant of probate and affidavit in support of caveat was filed. It was held by the Bombay High Court that the principles laid down is O VIII, rule 9 of the Code would apply in the case of tendering additional affidavit and leave of Court is necessary for its acceptance. Hence, it was held that additional affidavit tendered without leave of the Court in support of the caveat cannot be taken on record.[708]

However, the high court further held in the case that grant of probate is a judgment in rem and the court is required to consider whether the will set up by the propounder in the last Will of the deceased and was made out of his free Will in accordance with law. In doing so, the court cannot shut out, by technical rules of procedure, the real defence of a person having a caveatable interest. Such a person having a caveatable interest must be allowed a reasonable opportunity to show that the Will was not the last Will of the deceased validly made in accordance with law. He cannot be denied the opportunity on the ground that initially he had not pleaded so in his earlier affidavit.[709]

A careful reading of rules 28 and 30 of the Original Side Rules of Calcutta High Court makes it abundantly clear that before the proceedings are numbered as a suit by orders of a Judge for being tried as a suit as per provisions of the CPC, the court may take up as a preliminary issue, whether the caveator has a caveatable interest,[710] if such an application is filed before the court by the petitioner. Clearly the preliminary issues are triable before the proceedings are treated as a full-fledged suit under order of the Judge concerned. Whereas suit is required to be tried as per provisions of the Code, the procedure for trial of preliminary issue has been left to the discretion of the court. Rule 30 does not require the court to come out with specific findings in respect of preliminary issue because the language used in rule 30 requires the court to discharge the caveat where, upon the trial of such issue. The preliminary issue does not relate to the validity or legality of the "will" sought to be probated but only to the issue whether the caveator has an interest for which he can maintain the caveat.[711]

The section is an enabling provision. It empowers the court to allow a party to make up the deficiency of court fees payable on plaints, memoranda of appeal, applications for review of judgment, etc, even after the expiration of the period of limitation prescribed for the filing of these documents. The section enables a defective document to be retrospectively validated if the insufficiency of the stamp is subsequently made up with the leave of the court.[712] The power, however, to make up the deficiency of court fees is subject to the discretion of the court and is not claimable as of right by a party.[713] To permit payment of deficit court fees for recovering enhanced compensation after a lapse of almost six years by the court under its inherent jurisdiction would encourage the practice of not paying the court fees in the hope that as and when the valuation is determined in appeal, the jurisdiction of the court can be invoked under section 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC) and the benefit of enhanced compensation can be reaped by making good the deficit court fees.[714] Reading section 107(2) and section 149 of the CPC and keeping fairness of procedure in view an opportunity should have given by the court to the appellant to make good the balance court fees within a time to be indicated, and if there was a failure to comply with the direction of the court, the memorandum of appeal could have been dismissed.[715] section 149 is a discretionary provision given to the court, this discretionary power has to be exercised keeping in view the right of the respondent/decree-holder and public interest in a given case. When the extension and exemption of the court fees is a discretionary power of the court, bona fide of the ground should be established beyond all reasonable doubt.[716] The discretion conferred by this section is to be normally exercised in favour of the litigant except in cases of contumacy, mala fides or grounds of a similar nature.[717] An appellate court ought not to interfere with the exercise of such discretion, unless it is shown that such exercise was in violation of any recognised principle or had caused gross injustice to the other side. However, the mere fact that the opposite party was deprived of his right to plead the bar of limitation on account of time having been extinguished for paying the deficit court fees, does not warrant the conclusion that gross injustice has occurred.[718] An order under this section can be made suo motu.[719] Deficiency in court fee was found as paid in high court on plaint and on memo of appeal. No objection could be taken to maintainability of the proceeding.[720] The fact of non-receipt of the amount by an advocate required for the court fee cannot ordinarily be a "good cause" for extension of time, because, in such a case, non-receipt is not a "cause", it is really an effect. Similarly, when state asks for time to pay the deficit court fee, a simple statement that the amount required has not been received from the concerned authority is not sufficient at all to invoke the discretionary power conferred by section 149 of the CPC. Adequate reason must be assigned to the court to show that the appeal is being filed with deficit court fee because of circumstances beyond the control of the concerned department. If negligence lies at the root of the same, the court may well refuse to invoke its discretionary power.[721] In an Orissa case, there was late payment of court fee. Appeal by the state was filed much prior to the expiry of the period of limitation. Application was made to extend the time to pay the court fee (of Rs 603) on the ground that the amount had not been received from the department and it was not possible to file the necessary challan in the Treasury for purchasing court fee stamp. It was held that the grounds were not sufficient to allow the application. However, since court fees had been paid on 29 September 1986, (when appeal could have been filed), time was extended till that date.[722] The court under sections 148 and 149 of the CPC is empowered to enlarge the time for depositing balance of consideration in decree in suit for specific performance.[723] When a higher court has fixed a time without any direction to the trial court to extend the time in deserving cases, then the power under section 149 or section 151 cannot be exercised by the trial court. The extension can be granted, only by—

(i) the court fixing the time; or

(ii) any court to which the court fixing the time is subordinate.[724]

Section 149 grants power to a court to accept the payment of court fee at a later point of time if the appeal papers had been filed within the due date. In the instant case, the appeals were presented without payment of proper court fee and the required court fee was duly paid at the time of refiling, therefore it was held by the Supreme Court that it should be construed that such payment of court fee was deemed to have been paid on the date on which the appeals were originally presented by virtue of the implication of section 149.[725]

Where due to bona fide mistake and through inadvertence, court fee had not been paid and there was no positive mala fides, it was held that discretion should be exercised in favour of defendants by extending time to pay deficit Court fee on counter-claim on payment of cost.[726]

Section 4 of the Court Fees Act, 1870 enacts that no document shall be received in any proceeding unless proper court fee, as provided in the schedules to the Act, had been paid thereon. Under this section, a plaint, memorandum of appeal, etc, which is not stamped or is insufficiently stamped will be non-est. The rigour of this section is mitigated by the present section under which the court can, in such cases, grant time for the payment of requisite court fee and if that is paid, the presentation will be valid. Thus, the section is in the nature of a proviso to section 4 of the Court Fees Act, 1870[727] As the Supreme Court states, section 4 of the Court Fees Act, 1870 is not the final word on the subject and the court must consider the provisions of both the Act and the CPC to harmonise the two sets of provisions which can only be done by treating this section as a proviso to section 4 of the Court Fees Act, 1870.[728]

The power vested under section 149 should be exercised only to mitigate the rigours of section 4 of the Court Fee Act. The power is not to enable the plaintiff to ask for any number of adjournments or extensions for payment of deficit court fee. For exercising power under this section the Court is bound to record the reasons for doing so. Thus, in a case where a plaint was filed with deficit court-fee and the plaint had to be returned 13 times over a period of 15 months, it was held that the court cannot be said to have exercised powers under section 149 judicially and for meeting the ends of justice.[729]

In Tajender Singh Ghambhir v Gurpreet Singh,[730] the Supreme Court has held that deficiency in court fee in respect of the plaint can be made good during the appellate proceedings as well. In this case, the appellant – plaintiff filed a suit and paid adequate court fee in respect thereof. Later on, the plaint was amended and on amended valuation there was deficiency in court fee. The trial court, however, did not pass any order requiring the plaintiff to make up such deficiency. In the first appeal, the issue of the deficit court fee was raised by the respondent and the first appellate court rejected the contention stating that since the trial court did not prescribe any time limit in connection with the court fee and no objection was raised by the defendants in that regard, an opportunity should be granted to the plaintiff to make for the deficiency in the interest of justice. The high court reversed the decision of the trial court, relying on section 6 of the Court Fees Act, 1870. The Supreme Court held that in the absence of any order by the trial court directing the plaintiff to pay the deficient court fee within a particular time, sections 6 (2) and (3) of the Court Fees Act, 1870 could not be invoked against the plaintiff. It also observed that the high court had failed to consider clause (ii) of section 12 of the Court Fees Act, 1870, which empowers an appellate court to direct the party to make up deficit court fee in the plaint at the appellate stage.

In a case where there was a delay of 9 months in deposit of court fees and no reason was furnished for the delay except that the appellant was a poor person, it was held that since no details of his financial position and source of earning have been furnished and no detail of his properties have been given, the court in its discretion cannot condone such huge delay.[731]

[s 149.5] Section Applies Only to Court Fee Payable at the Time of Institution of Suit

A careful reading of section 149 shows that it would apply only in respect of the court fee payable at the time of institution of the suit. If the court fee due on the plaint when instituted, is not paid wholly or partly by the person instituting the suit, the court in its discretion, may allow him to pay the court fee or deficit court fee within the period fixed by it. section 149 has no application where the court fee, due on the plaint as per the valuation of the suit, is fully paid, but subsequently it is found that a larger amount is due to the plaintiff. For example, if the plaintiff values the suit at Rs 2,00,000 and the court fee payable is Rs 20,000 and the plaintiff pays a court fee of Rs 10,000, on his request time for payment of balance of Rs 10,000 can be extended by the court at its discretion under section 149 of the CPC. But where the claim was Rs 2,00,000 and full court fee on Rs 2,00,000 was paid at the time of institution of the suit, and during evidence it transpires that the amount due to plaintiff is actually Rs 5,00,000 and not Rs 2,00,000, the question of permitting the plaintiff to pay deficit court fee at that stage by calling in aid of section 149, does not arise, as no court fee becomes payable at that stage. Plaintiff can increase the claim only by seeking amendment of the plaint and paying additional court fee on the amended claim. In regard to such amended claim also, section 149 may be pressed into service. But then amendment would depend on limitation and may not be permitted after the period of limitation. Where there is no deficit in court fee at the time of institution and when there is no amendment to plaint increasing the suit claim, there is no occasion for pressing section 149 into service in regard to court fee payable on plaints.[732]

[s 149.6] Condonation of Delay in Presenting Plaint Condones Delay in Filing Court Fee Also

Where plaintiff failed to make up such deficiency within time granted by court and filed application seeking condonation of delay in presenting plaint, which was allowed by trial court, in view of reasons stated by plaintiffs counsel in his affidavit. It was held, said order of trial court allowing application in question should be deemed to have condoned delay in payment of deficit court fee as well.[733]

It has been held that section 149 is in the form of a discretionary power of courts to allow a party to make good the deficiency of court fee payable on the pleadings. It also empowers courts to retrospectively validate insufficiency of stamp duties, etc. In the instant case, the appellant filed an application for extension of time for remitting the balance court fee due to financial difficulties which was rejected by the trial court. The Supreme Court held that courts must ensure bona fide of such discretionary power. It was observed that concealment of material fact, while filing application for extension of date for payment of court fee can be a ground for dismissal. However, in the instant case as no opportunity was given by the trial court for payment of court fee, hence the decision was set aside.[734]

[s 149.7] Pauper Applications

There is unanimity amongst the high courts that courts can, under this section, grant time to pay court fees in cases where the application to sue in forma pauperis is rejected. But there is a divergence of opinion as to the consequences where an application for forma pauperis is dismissed and no order is passed at that time to pay the court fees on the application filed as a plaint. One view is that an application to sue in forma pauperis is a composite document, namely:

(i) an application for permission; and

(ii) an unstamped plaint, that when the application for permission is rejected, there is still on the file of the court the unstamped plaint, that an order can be made under this section, giving time for payment of court fee and extending it, and that when court fee is paid in accordance with the order, it will take effect from the date of the original presentation.[735]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court also has taken the view that an applicant whose appeal against rejection of pauper application was dismissed without granting time to pay the court fees must apply under this section and not under section 151.[736] On the other hand, it has been held that while the court can, when rejecting an application for permission, give time to the plaintiff or appellant to pay the requisite court fees, where it has not passed such an order, and the application has been rejected, it does not have power, subsequently, to pass such an order, as there is no proceeding pending to which this section can apply, and that, if in fact court fee is paid, the plaint must be taken to be a new plaint, presented on the day when court fee is paid.[737] Further, it has been held that for the court to grant time for payment of court fees under section 149, when rejecting an application to sue as pauper, there must be a prayer to that effect.[738] This section has been applied by the Patna High Court, where the applicant paid court fees pending the decision on his application to sue in forma pauperis the observations made in Chunna Mal v Bhagawati Kishore,[739] being disapproved.[740] Before formal disposal of his application to sue as a pauper, the plaintiff offered to pay court fee, treating the application as a plaint. Court agreed to enlarge the period. It was held that if the application contains all the particulars necessary for a plaint, there can be no objection to such an order.[741] When a legal representative of a person, who was allowed to file the suit in forma pauperis, desires to continue such a suit on the death of such person, the court can call upon such legal representative to pay up the court fees unless he proves that he too is a pauper and on his failing to pay such court fees, the court can reject the plaint.[742]

The High Court of Allahabad is of the view that if at the time of dismissing the application for pauperism the court can grant time to pay the court fees on the unstamped plaint, it can also grant a further extension of time. It is immaterial that at the time of giving such further extension the proceedings under O XXXIII, rule 7 has come to an end.[743] Keeping in view O XLIV and O XXXIII of the CPC, it is clear that the legislature intended that the person applying to the court seeking leave to suit or to prosecute an appeal should present the application by himself. Where the concerned application was presented by the advocate, the same cannot be treated or taken as presented by an authorised agent. Thus, by mandate of law, the application seeking leave to file the appeal as an indigent person, was rejected and the appellant was directed to deposit the court fees.[744]

[s 149.8] Plaint

(As to the case where a plaint is written upon paper insufficiently stamped, see notes O VII, rule 11 under the head "Clause (c)".) Payment of deficiency in court fees relates back to the date of the lodgement of the plaint.[745]

[s 149.9] Appeals and Applications for Review of Judgment

As to these, it was provided by section 582A of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 as follows:

> If a memorandum of appeal or application for a review of judgment has been presented within the proper period of limitation, but is written upon paper insufficiently stamped and the insufficiency of the stamp was caused by a mistake on the part of the appellant or applicant as to the amount of the requisite stamps, the memorandum of appeal or application shall have the same effect and be as valid as if it has been properly stamped: Provided that such appeal or application shall be rejected unless the appellant or applicant supplies the requisite stamp within a reasonable time after the discovery of the mistake to be fixed by the court.

The above section was introduced into the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 by Act 6 of 1882 to supersede a full bench ruling of the Allahabad High Court. That ruling was to the effect that if a memorandum of appeal is not, when tendered, properly stamped, it is not at that time a memorandum of appeal and the subsequent affixing of the proper stamp cannot have a retrospective effect so as to validate the original presentation unless it has been done by order of the court, and that such an order can only be made where the defective memorandum has been received through a mistake on the part of the court or its officers, and not where the insufficiency of the stamp was due to a mistake on the part of the appellant.[746]

Section 582A applied only to appeals and applications for a review. The present section is general in its terms, and applies to all documents chargeable with court fees under the court fees Act such as plaints, memoranda of appeal or of cross-objections, applications for review of judgment, written statements pleading a set-off, or counterclaim.

The section is not limited to a mistake as to the amount of the requisite stamps and has considerably enlarged the power of the court. The court has a discretion to allow deficiency of court fee to be made good even where such deficiency is not due to mistake; and the discretion of the court under this section may be exercised after the period of limitation has expired and the appeal will then stand good as from the date when it was presented.[747] The Supreme Court has held that the high court can, in the exercise of its discretion under this section, permit the applicant to amend the memorandum of appeal and pay additional court fees and that it is not open to the respondent to attack the order on the ground that it takes away his valuable right to plead limitation as the question of court fees is one between the state and the litigant.[748] In the case of appeals, the High Court of Bombay has held that the court has no discretion and that section 107 makes O VII, rule 11 applicable, and that even if a memorandum of appeal is presented deliberately understamped on the last day of limitation, the court is bound to give the appellant time to make good the deficiency.[749] The Madras High Court has dissented as to the applicability of O VII, rule 11 to appeals.[750] All the other high courts treat memorandum of appeal on the same footing as other documents chargeable with court fee and consider the power to make good the deficiency to be subject to the discretion of the court. The Patna High Court has held that time should be given when the amount of court fee is a matter of doubt or if the party has made an honest attempt to comply with the law, but that time should not be extended if a litigant has deliberately and to suit his own convenience, paid an insufficient court fee. The mistake must be bona fide.[751] Thus, the fact that the Board of Revenue could not make up their mind whether to file an appeal or not cannot justify their lodging the appeal with deficit court fees and later on paying the deficit after considerable delay.[752] But an erroneous advice by the legal adviser coupled with failure of the registrar of the high court to raise objection as to the insufficiency of court fees has been treated as a bona fide mistake.[753] In other words, the section should not be construed in such a way as to nullify the express provisions of section 4 or section 6 of the Court Fees Act, 1870.[754] In Mahabir Ram v Kapil Deo,[755] it has been held by the Patna High Court on a review of its previous authorities that O VII, rule 11 is, by virtue of section 107, applicable to appeals and that consequently, an order rejecting a memorandum of appeal for insufficient court fee, without giving the applicant an opportunity to make good the deficiency, is bad. The Lahore High Court also disapproved the Bombay view and refused to extend time when the insufficiency of the court fee was due to the negligence of the appellant or his pleader.[756] In a judgment, the Bombay High Court has held that the discretion under this section has to be exercised judicially and not automatically for the asking and that negligence of the party or his legal adviser or his clerk can be no good ground for the exercise of this discretion.[757] The Allahabad and Calcutta High Courts have held that when an insufficiently stamped memorandum of appeal is accepted by inadvertence, time may be given to the appellant to supply the deficiency; but that if the court is aware ab initio of the insufficiency of the stamp, it ought to return the memorandum of appeal to the appellant in order that he may, if the case admits, represent it duly stamped and apply for an extension of time under section 5 of the Limitation Act.[758] The Oudh Court held that the appellate court has discretion under this section to allow, the appellant, reasonable time, within which to make up the deficiency in court fee before dealing with the appeal under O VII, rule 11.[759] In Amar Singh v Chaturbhuj,[760] the Rajasthan High Court accepted the view that O VII, rule 11 has no application to appeals and held that even so when deficient court fee was paid after limitation and accepted, this section applied and the presentation became valid. In Tilokchand v Lalchand,[761] it was held that when an appeal memorandum was presented with insufficient court fee, the appellate court should permit the plaintiff to make good the deficiency, and that its powers in this behalf were the same as those of the trial court under section 107. It is true that under O XLI, rule 3, the appellate court is not bound to allow the appellant an opportunity to make up the deficiency in court fee. But O XLI, rule 3, in no way, whittles down the exercise of discretion of the appellate court under section 149, whereunder, an opportunity can be granted to the appellants to make up the deficiency in court fee.[762] (See also the cases noted below[763] on the application of section 149 to appeals). The Calcutta and Rangoon High Courts have also held that inability to pay the court fee on the day of presentation of the memorandum of appeal is not a ground for the exercise of the discretion under this section.[764] But this rule is subject to exception in special cases.[765] It has been held that the benefit of this section will be available even when a plaint or memorandum of appeal is filed without any court fee.[766]

In a case under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 making a claim for enhanced compensation in appeal, the appellant had initially paid lesser court fee and thereby restricted the value of appeal. Subsequently he sought to amend the memo of appeal claiming more compensation after the compensation was enhanced in other appeals of other co-owners. It was held that the appellant having failed to amend the memo of appeal before the decision in other appeals, he cannot be permitted to amend the memo of appeal subsequently and make up deficiency in court fee.[767]

[s 149.10] Execution Application

This section applies to an executing court also. Hence, where the court fee is payable in the decree itself but no time has been fixed for its payment, the executing court can allow time under this section.[768]

[s 149.11] Revision

It has been held by the High Court of Allahabad that an order refusing to give time to a party to make up the deficiency in court fee is not capable of revision, as such an order does not amount to a decision of a "case" within the meaning of section 115 of the CPC.[769] This decision has now to be read in the light of the new Explanation added in section 115.[770]

[s 149.12] At Any Stage

These words authorise the court to permit payment of court fee, even after the period of limitation had expired.[771] The words "at any stage" in section 149 contemplate that the deficiency can be ordered to be made good even after the period of limitation for filing appeal or the suit has expired. The discretion can be exercised even in the case of a plaint without any court fee. When the court allows the plaintiff or the appellant, time to pay deficit court fee in exercise of its discretion, the other party cannot attack the order on the ground that it takes away his right to plead the bar of limitation, nor can he claim to have derived a vested right by the non-payment of the court fee. Under the latter part of section 149, the defective plaint or appeal memorandum is validated with retrospective effect if the deficit court fee is subsequently made up. The power to permit the party to pay the deficit court fee is not in any way affected by any bar of limitation.[772] The words "at any stage", occurring in section 149, do not contemplate that a party could ask for permission to pay the deficiency of court fee even after the disposal of the appeal. section 149 applies only to a pending case, where the relief asked for is not properly valued and court fee payable under the provisions of the Court Fees Act, 1870 has not been properly calculated and paid. Though it may be open to a court, when the case is pending before it, to permit an amendment of the claim by increasing or varying it and pay the court fees or if there is any mistake in the payment of the court fee, to permit payment of the deficient court fee, it is not open to a party to ask the court to permit an amendment of the claim after the case has been finally disposed of by that court. The appellate court also cannot do it, after it had finally disposed off the matter.[773] But when the plaint or memorandum of appeal has been rejected, there is no power in the court, thereafter, to pass an order for payment of court fee and if it is paid, the plaint will be treated as a new one.[774] A rule of the Calcutta High Court requires an additional court to be paid on a written statement which contains a counter-claim. Such additional court fee was allowed to be paid under this section during the hearing of the suit: Ahmad Kasim v Khatun Bibi.[775] Likewise, it has been held that where a written statement was treated as counter-claim, an order for payment of court fee could be passed after decree: Ghulam v Ghulam Ahmed.[776]

[s 149.13] Law for the Time Being in Force

That means the law in force when the document in the instant case, memorandum of appeal, was filed and not when the court fee was actually paid thereon.[777]

SYNOPSIS

[s 150.1] Save as Otherwise Provided..... 1632
[s 150.2] Scope of the Section..... 1632

[s 150.1] Save as Otherwise Provided

Order IX, rule 13, provides that where an ex parte decree is passed against a defendant, he may apply to the court by which the decree was passed for an order to set it aside. Suppose now, that an ex parte decree is passed by court P for possession of certain immovable properties and subsequently part of its territorial jurisdiction including the locality in which the properties are situated, is transferred to court A. Has court A power under this section to entertain an application to set aside the decree under O IX, rule 13? It has been held by the High Court of Madras that it has; O IX, rule 13, does not say that the court that passed the decree is the only court that can set it aside.[778]

[s 150.2] Scope of the Section

There have been conflicting decisions by the High Court of Madras as to the scope of the section. In two cases, it was held that the section is not confined to the transfer of specific business from one court to another, but also included cases in which a new court is given part of the territorial jurisdiction of an old court and is empowered to try the business arising within it.[779] But in the case of Subramania v Swaminatha,[780] decided in 1928, where territorial jurisdiction was transferred after the decree had been passed, the Madras High Court held that the court to which jurisdiction had been transferred, had no power to execute the decree under section 150, as that section is limited to cases where specific business is transferred. This case was approved by a full bench in Ramier v Muthu.[781] Also an execution case decided in 1932 and the court distinguished notifications which effect a change of jurisdiction in the future from those which effect a transfer of past business; and held that section 150 only applied to the latter. On the other hand Subramania v Swaminatha was dissented from by a single judge of the Madras High Court in the following case.[782]

A money suit was filed in court X and was transferred for trial to court Y. The plaintiff obtained a decree in court Y, and then court Y was abolished and its business transferred to court Z. Where was plaintiff to apply for the execution of his decree? Under the definition in section 37(b), court X was the court which passed the decree. Should the plaintiff apply to court X, or could he apply to court Z and was court Z empowered by section 150 to entertain the application? The judge held that he could apply to court Z and that section 37 should not be read, so as to deprive the decree-holder of the facility provided by section 150. Where an ex parte decree was passed by court A and then it was set aside and the suit restored, and then the court was abolished and a new court was established with jurisdiction over the territory in question, it was held that the new court was entitled, under this section, to entertain an application for restitution.[783] Where, however, the court is not abolished but its jurisdiction over the area is transferred by a notification to another court, it has been held that this section has no application and that the old court continues to retain its jurisdiction over the matters pending before it for all purposes,[784] and that the new court has no jurisdiction over these matters, unless they are expressly transferred.[785] (See notes to section 37 under head "court of first instance").

In a Calcutta case,[786] a preliminary decree on a mortgage for nearly Rs 2000 was passed by a munsif who had jurisdiction upto Rs 2000. The munsif was transferred and as his successor did not have the jurisdiction to that amount, the final decree was passed by the subordinate judge. The succeeding munsif was then empowered to try suits up to Rs 2000; and as the suit was taken to have been transferred to him, he was held to have jurisdiction under section 150 to entertain an application for execution.

Under section 13(2) of the Bengal and Assam Civil Courts Act, 1887 business may be assigned to different munsifs having jurisdiction within the same local area. The Calcutta High Court has held that such an assignment of business is not a transfer within the meaning of this section.[787]

[s 151.1] Inherent Powers of the Court: Their Nature and Objects

The Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (CPC) is not exhaustive,[788] the simple reason being that the legislature is incapable of contemplating all the possible circumstances, which may arise, in future litigation, and consequently, for providing the procedure for them.[789] The principle is well–established that when the CPC is silent regarding a procedural aspect, the inherent power of the court can come to its aid to act ex debito justitiae for doing real and substantial justice between the parties.[790] The court has, therefore, in many cases, where the circumstances so require, acted upon the assumption of the possession of an inherent power to act ex debito justitiae, and to do real and substantial justice for the administration, for which alone, it exists.[791] However, the power, under this section, relates to matters of procedure. If the ordinary rules of procedure result in injustice, and there is no other remedy, they can be broken in order to achieve the ends of justice.[792] The law cannot make express provisions against all inconveniences such that their dispositions express all the cases that may possibly be covered. It is, therefore, the duty of a judge to apply them, not only to what appears to be regulated by their express provisions, but also to all the cases to which they can be justifiably applied, and which appear to be comprehended, either within the express provisions of the law or within the consequences that may be gathered from it.[793] It is well settled that the provisions of the Code are not exhaustive, for the simple reason that the legislature is incapable of contemplating all the possible circumstances which may arise in future litigation and consequently for providing the procedure for them.[794]

The section, however, does not confer any powers, but only indicates that there is a power to make such orders as may be necessary for achieving the ends of justice, and also to prevent an abuse of the process of the court.[795] The court is not powerless to grant relief when the ends of justice and equity so demand, because the powers vested in the court are of a wide scope and ambit.[796] "The inherent power," as observed by the Supreme Court in Raj Bahadur Ras Raja v Seth Hiralal,[797] "has not been conferred on the court; it is a power inherent in the court by virtue of its duty to do justice between the parties before it". Lord Cairns in Roger v Comptoir D" Escompts De Paris[798] has stated:

> One of the first and highest duties of all, Courts is to take care that the act of the court does no injury to any of the suitors and when the expression 'Act of the court' is used it does not mean merely the act of the primary court, or of any intermediate court of appeal, but the act of the court as a whole from the lowest court which entertains jurisdiction over the matters up to the highest court which finally disposes of the Case.

Discretion vested in the court is dependant upon various circumstances, which the court has to consider.[799] Discretionary power under section 151 of Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, can be exercised also on an application filed by the party.[800]

It could also be exercised in order to stall the dilatory tactics adopted in the process of hearing a suit, and to do real and substantial justice to the parties to the suit.[801]

[s 151.2] Amendment to Section 148 Does not Affect Inherent Power

See notes under the same heading in section 148.

[s 151.3] Inherent Powers to Amend Decrees and Order

See notes under the same heading in section 152.

[s 151.4] Dismissal of Appeal Under Section 151—Article 122 Limitation Act, 1963 is Applicable

The appeal was ordered to be dismissed on the ground that the persons interested to prosecute the appeal had not moved within time. The dismissal for non-prosecution of the appeal by persons interested in the matter could only be under section 151 of the CPC and not under any other provision of O XLI of the CPC. If an appeal is dismissed under section 151 of the CPC, Article 122 of the Limitation Act would have no application because when a court makes an order under section 151, it is implicit that such a court has the power to entertain an application to set aside its order made under section 151. The power exercised under section 151 is ex debito justitiae. An application invoking the inherent power of the court under section 151 is not one which a party is required to make under any provisions of the CPC for setting in motion the machinery of the court. Thus, Article 122 of the Limitation Act has no application to such an application.

If that be the correct position, an application for restoration of the appeal would be not by a party to the proceedings and will not fall within the scope of Article 122 but under Article 137 of the Limitation Act.[802] Legal opinion can"t be provided in an application under section 151 CPC.[803]

[s 151.5] This Section and O XXXIX, Rules 1 and 2

It is settled principles of law that discretion conferred under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 of the CPC in granting or refusing temporary injunction is discretionary and like other cases of discretion is vested in courts which is to be exercised in accordance with reasons and sound judicial principles. The sound and judicial principles which govern the exercise of discretion conferred under O XXXIX rules 1 and 2, of the CPC upon trial courts are to the effect that a person who seeks a temporary injunction must satisfy the court, first that there is a serious question to be tried in suit to dispel cloud of doubt relating to his entitlement and there is probability of plaintiff being entitled to the relief sought by him. Secondly, the court's interference is necessary to protect him from threatened species of injuries enumerated under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2, which the court considers irreparable before his legal right, can be established on trial. Lastly, the comparative inconvenience which is likely to ensue from withholding temporary injunction would be greater than that which is likely to arise from granting it. Prima facie case is not to be confused with title of the plaintiff which is to be established on evidence but it would be sufficient if substantial question at first sight needs investigation and decision whereas irreparable injury does not mean that there must be no physical possibility of compensating the injuries but it means only that injuries cannot be compensated in terms of money. In ascertaining the balance of convenience, the courts are to weigh and compare the substantial mischief that is likely to be done to the plaintiff, if injunction is refused. It is held that while courts are considering balance of convenience, the courts are also required to keep in mind the public convenience as well. It is well to remember that aforesaid three ingredients are to be proved on affidavits as envisaged under O XXXIX, rule 1. The power given to courts to act on affidavits is not subject to the provisions of O XIX, rules 1 and 2.[804]

It is further to be imbibed that all of the three conditions precedent must co-exist for granting temporary injunction under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2. If any of them is missing, then temporary injunction applied for is to be rejected. It would be expedient to mention here that in the peculiar facts and circumstances of a case, in rarest of rare cases, if interest of justice so demands that property in dispute deserves to be preserved in its present condition till clouds of doubt are dispelled by deciding the suit on merit, in such cases temporary injunction can also be granted under section 151, which provides that nothing in the CPC shall be deemed to limit or otherwise affect the inherent power of the court to make orders necessary in the ends of justice. The inherent power has not been conferred upon the court but it is inherent by virtue of its duties to do justice between the parties. Therefore, in those cases where granting of temporary injunction is found to be imperative in the interest of justice even if any of the conditions precedent mentioned hereinabove is missing, the court can grant temporary injunction in exercise of its power under section 151. It is held that even if an application for temporary injunction under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 is rejected, even then the plaintiff can move fresh application under section 151 with a distinction that in case temporary injunction is granted under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2, then miscellaneous appeal is maintainable under O XLIII, rule 1 of the CPC, but if an injunction is granted under section 151 then no miscellaneous appeal would be maintainable, only revision would be entertainable under section 115 of the CPC.[805]

The courts it has been held, have inherent jurisdiction to issue temporary injunction in circumstances, which are not covered by the provisions of O XXXIX. However, inherent jurisdiction can be exercised by the court only, which it considers necessary for the ends of justice.[806]

Where in a suit for recovery of money and for declaration as secured creditor, an application for restraining the defendant from alienating the property was filed. It was held by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court that injunction cannot be granted merely because the plaintiff has sought permanent injunction, when it was not the case of the plaintiff that the defendant secured any of its properties for the alleged transaction out of which the money had become due. It was further held that section 151 of the code cannot also be invoked in absence of any fraudulent intention on the part of the defendant.[807] However, a Division Bench of the Chhattisgarh High Court that held section 151 can be invoked in rare cases where a litigant is not in a position to take recourse to any other remedy. In a case where the plaintiff was unable to institute a suit against the Municipal Corporation for want of notice as required under section 401 of the Madhya Pradesh Municipal Corporation Act, 1956 (as applicable to Chhattisgarh), it was held that in extreme urgency a litigant can file a substantive petition under section 151 to seek the relief.[808]

However, the Madras High Court has held that grant of police aid for execution/ implementation of the order of temporary injunction simultaneously by with the order granting temporary injunction without recording any reason therefor is not proper. It has been observed that the case at that point of time is in the initial stages. Since the entire materials are not before the court and the defendants have not entered appearance, the Court is not apprised of the full situation. In the circumstances the high court issued guidelines for grant of police aid in such cases.[809]

In a suit for perpetual injunction, where the court decreed the suit with respect to lesser area than that claimed by plaintiff, it was held that the plaintiff was not required to withdraw the earlier suit under O XXIII, rule 1(3) read with section 151 in order to file a comprehensive suit for the whole area. He has every right to file separate suit for the remaining area while continuing to have the earlier decree in force.[810]

Reiterating the principle laid down by the Supreme Court in an earlier decision in Manohar Lal Chopra's case[811] held that section 151 of the code confers power upon the court to grant injunction if the matter is not covered by rules 1 and 2 of O XXXIX of the Code. Thus, in a suit for partition, where the parties were in possession of separate flats as per mutual agreement but there was no demarcated possession according to respective shares of the parties, the plaintiff, co-owner, cannot during the pendency of the suit dispossess the defendant by putting pad-lock. Therefore, the order restoring the parties back to the same position by directing the removal of pad-lock did not call for any intervention.[812]

An owner of a property has an unrestricted right of alienation of his own property whichever way he likes and such right cannot be curtailed unless the law provides for putting any such restriction on the rights of the owner. Therefore, if the circumstances enumerated in O XXXVIII and O XXXIX do not exist, the court in exercise of inherent power cannot pass any order the effect of which would be to interfere with the substantive rights of an owner. Thus, in a case, where the plaintiff prayed for an order of injunction restraining the owner-defendant from transferring or alienating his own property over which the plaintiff had no right or for attaching the property, a Division Bench of Calcutta High Court held that such a prayer cannot be granted as it will have overriding effect over the substantive right of the owner over the said property.[813]

It was held by the Kerala High Court that no contempt proceedings would lie in respect of disobedience of an order of temporary injunction passed by a subordinate Court. Order XXXIX, rule 2-A of the CPC provides appropriate and adequate remedy. However, it was held that inherent powers under section 151 of the code can also be invoked, but contempt petition can be filed only in exceptional cases.[814]

If the applicant did not seek injunction under section 151 but filed that petition under O III, rule 1 only even without quoting section 151, CPC, that fact, by itself, may not be a ground for dismissing the petition for injunction if the applicant is otherwise entitled to the relief of injunction under section 151, because not quoting the correct provision of law is not a ground to refuse the relief if the party is entitled to such relief under some other provision which is not quoted.[815]

The jurisdiction of a civil court being plenary in nature, if it is seized of a suit, provisions contained in section 151 and O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 are also attracted. It cannot be said that even though the civil court has the jurisdiction to entertain a suit and decide the question raised therein, it cannot entertain any application for any interim relief or entertain any other application for any other purpose. Powers under section 151 being inherent are applicable and can be invoked and exercisable by a civil court with respect to the subject matter of the suit and similarly power under O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2 of the CPC also being applicable can be invoked, applied and exercised with respect to the subject matter of the suit.[816]

The basic object of the jurisdiction under O IX, rule 1(a) of the CPC or under section 151 of the CPC is to clothe the civil court with the power to perform its duty to do justice between the parties before it.[817]

Where during hearing of a case arising out of an appeal, a specific undertaking had been given by the respondent that he has no intention of selling the property since it is needed for necessity and livelihood of the defendant-respondent. Though the court held that it has jurisdiction under section 151 of the CPC for granting an order of injunction in favour of the plaintiff-appellant, in view of the undertaking given by the defendant-respondent in high court that he has no intention of selling the property, any order of injunction is not necessary.[818]

It is well–settled that when an application for maintenance is submitted in partition suit by the plaintiff, in view of the fact that the property is in possession of the defendant and the plaintiff is entitled to have maintenance out of the joint family property, such application is entertained and decided in view of the provisions of section 151 and not under O XXXIX or any other provision. Therefore, as against such order, the miscellaneous appeal is misconceived since O XLII is not applicable to such orders.[819]

[s 151.6] Duty of Court

It is clear that if there is no specific provision which prohibits the grant of relief sought in an application filed under section 151 of the CPC, the courts have all the necessary powers under section 151 to make a suitable order to prevent the abuse of the process of court. Therefore, the court exercising the power under section 151 first has to consider whether exercise of such power is expressly prohibited by any other provisions of the CPC and if there is no such prohibition then the court will consider whether such power should be exercised or not on the basis of facts mentioned in the application.[820]

The mere mention of provision on the heading of the application will not render the application liable for rejection. On the contrary the prayer made in the application if found to be sound and covered under some other provision of the Code, it will not be treated as one made under section 151 CPC. Such application should be considered in the light of its otherwise merits by the court.[821]

A Division Bench of the Delhi High Court has held that in a proceeding for grant of letter of administration/probate, the court under its inherent powers is not without jurisdiction to delete or expunge material which is scandalous, defamatory or libellous. It was observed that in case of deletion of the offending matter from the will, neither the will is altered nor the distribution of properties is modified to any extent. When the court grants letters of Administration or Probate, the original will is not affected. It is only the letter of Administration or the Probate, which are documents in rem, that will not carry the deleted matter which has been obliterated from the will.[822]

Where a suit for temporary and mandatory injunction was filed and the plaintiff-tenant was in possession on the date of initiation of the suit, but was dispossessed during the pendency of the suit, it was held that the court can invoke inherent powers to pass order of restoration of possession. It was observed that exercise of inherent powers in such cases not only do substantial justice but also restore the confidence of the public in courts.[823] It has been categorically held by the Supreme Court that the delay in filing the application for restoration of possession under section 151 cannot be the reason for declining relief.[824]

Where the counsel engaged by the defendant did not appear before the court on the day fixed for hearing nor represented to the court about his absence, the court decided to proceed ex parte and examined the witnesses present in court and heard arguments and reserved its judgment to be pronounced later in the day. Before the pronouncement of judgment the counsel for the defendant appeared and prayed for recall of the ex parte order, but the prayer was rejected and ex parte decree was passed. The Supreme Court held that in the interest of justice the ex parte decree was liable to be set aside.[825]

> It is true that in view of the law laid down by this Court in Arjun Singh (Supra)[826] the learned District Judge could not have entertained an application under Order IX Rule 7 C.P.C. We have also no hesitation in observing that counsel of the defendant were not careful enough to inform the learned District Judge about their pre-occupation before the High Court which prevented them from being present in his Court when the case was called for hearing. But the passing of an ex parte decree in a case of this nature is too harsh a consequence to be upheld. The defendant cannot be made to suffer an ex parte decree particularly when he was not at fault, having duly instructed his counsel to appear before the Court of the learned District Judge.

> We are not delving into the technicalities of the legal question argued before us because we are of the view that in the facts of this case the interest of justice demands that the ex parte decree be set aside. We appreciate that the learned District Judge could not entertain an application under Order IX Rule 7 C.P.C., and even the application under Order IX Rule 13 was dismissed as not pressed. But nothing prevented the High Court from setting aside the ex parte decree in the appeal preferred against it.[827]

However, the Rajasthan High Court, following the decision of the Supreme Court in Arjun Singh's case.[828] held that where the Court fixed the suit for ex parte hearing and after completing the hearing adjourned the same for pronouncement of judgment, O IX, rule 7 would have no application and the ex parte order cannot be set aside by invoking O IX, rule 7 or section 151 of the Code.[829]

Where a judicial officer dismissed a suit when the order of dismissal was passed due to non-arrangement of case file as required by rules. The appellate court made adverse remarks against the judicial officer in the appellate order with a direction to place it in the service record of the concerned officer. It was held by the Supreme Court that the remarks were uncalled for and liable to be expunged.[830] P Sathasivam, J speaking for the Bench observed as follows:

> 11. We are not undermining the ultimate decision of the High Court in remitting the matter to the trial Court for fresh disposal. However, we are constrained to observe that the higher Courts every day come across orders of the lower courts which are not justified either in law or in fact and modify them or set them aside. Our legal system acknowledges the fallibility of the Judges, hence it provides for appeals and revisions. A Judge tries to discharge his duties to the best of his capacity, however, sometimes is likely to err. It has to be noted that the lower judicial officers mostly work under a charged atmosphere and are constantly under psychological pressure. They do not have the benefits which are available in the higher courts. In those circumstances, remarks/observations and strictures are to be avoided particularly if the officer has no occasion to put forth his reasonings.[831]

The primary duty of a court is to see that truth is arrived at. A party to a civil litigation is not entitled to constitutional protections under Article 20 of the Constitution of India. Thus, the civil court although may not have any specific provisions in the CPC and the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, has an inherent power in terms of section 151 of the CPC to pass all orders for doing complete justice to the parties to the suit.[832]

[s 151.7] Limits for Exercise of Power

The court has ample power under section 151 of the CPC to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice. But the power must be exercised with caution and due diligence with the object to prevent miscarriage of justice or to prevent the abuse of the process of court. The limits within which this power is to be exercised has been very vividly summed up by the Hon'ble Supreme Court in the case of Nawabganj Sugar Mills Co Ltd v UOI.[833] In paragraph 6 of the judgment, Krishna Iyer, J approvingly quoted a passage from Benjamin Cardozo's The Nature of the Judicial Process[834] which is as under:

> The judge, even when he is free, is still not wholly free. He is not to innovate at pleasure. He is not a knight-errant roaming at will in pursuit of his own ideal of beauty or of goodness. He is to draw his inspiration from consecrated principles. He is not to yield to spasmodic sentiment, to vague and unregulated benevolence. He is to exercise a discretion informed by tradition, methodized by analogy, disciplined by system, and subordinated to the primordial necessity of order in social life. Wide enough in all conscience is the field of discretion that remains.[835]

In Bagai,[836] the respondent initially filed a suit against the appellant for recovery of certain dues along with the interest accrued thereon. Arguments in the suit were concluded and the matter was adjourned for judgment. In the meantime, the respondent moved two applications; one under O VII, rule 14 read with section 151 and the other under O XVIII, rule 17 read with section 151 seeking permission to recall PW-1 for proving certain documents by leading his additional evidence. The trial court dismissed both the applications against which a revision petition was filed. The high court allowed the revision petition and set aside the order of the trial court. The Supreme Court considered the ratio in Vadiraj[837] and a subsequent decision in KK Velusamy[838] and conclusively allowed the appeal against the order of the High Court and set aside the same and restored the order of the trial court. In KKVelusamy,[839] even after considering the principles laid down in Vadiraj[840] and taking note of section 151 of the CPC, the Supreme Court concluded that in the interests of justice and to prevent abuse of the process of the court, the trial court is free to consider whether it was necessary to reopen the evidence and if so, in what manner and to what extent. Further, it was observed that the evidence should be permitted in exercise of its power under section 151 of the Code. In Bagai,[841] the Supreme Court held that at a belated stage and that too after reserving the matter for pronouncement of judgment, the plaintiff cannot be permitted to file such applications to fill the lacunae in his pleadings and evidence led by him. The court observed:

> After change of various provisions by way of amendment in the CPC, it is desirable that the recording of evidence should be continuous and followed by arguments and decision thereon within a reasonable time. This court has repeatedly held that courts should constantly endeavour to follow such a time schedule. If the same is not followed, the purpose of amending several provisions in the Code would get defeated. In fact, applications for adjournments, reopening and recalling are interim measures, could be as far as possible avoided and only in compelling and acceptable reasons, those applications are to be considered. We are satisfied that the plaintiff has filed those two applications before the trial court in order to overcome the lacunae in the plaint, pleadings and evidence. It is not the case of the plaintiff that it was not given adequate opportunity. In fact, the materials placed show that the plaintiff has filed both the applications after more than sufficient opportunity had been granted to it to prove its case. During the entire trial, those documents have remained in exclusive possession of the plaintiff, still plaintiff has not placed those bills on record. It further shows that final arguments were heard on number of times and judgment was reserved and only thereafter, in order to improve its case, the plaintiff came forward with such an application to avoid the final judgment against it. Such course is not permissible even with the aid of Section 151 CPC.

[s 151.8] Truth

The court must be held to have the requisite power even under section 151 of the CPC to issue direction either suo motu or otherwise which, according to the court, would lead to the truth.[842]

The wife had filed for divorce on the ground of impotency. To ascertain the truth, a medical examination of the husband was necessary. Therefore, the court invoking its inherent powers can direct for the medical examination of the husband. It will not infringe the fundamental right of the husband under Articles 21 or 20(3) of the Constitution.[843]

[s 151.9] Due Diligence

Though there is no limitation for applying under this section, the party invoking inherent jurisdiction, has to be diligent and also should not be guilty of laches.[844]

[s 151.10] Suppression or Concealment

If the discretion is exercised by suppression or concealment, the same must be withdrawn and the benefit recalled.[845]

[s 151.11] Stay of Suit

To get the order of stay of a suit on the ground of abuse of process, the applicant must show that plaintiff would not succeed but that he could not possibly succeed on the basis of the pleadings and in the circumstances of the case. In other words, the defendant would be required to show a very strong case in his favour. The power would be exercised by the court if defendant could show to the court that the action impugned is frivolous, vexatious or is taken simply to harass the defendant or where there is no cause of action in law or in equity. The power of the court restraining the proceedings are to be exercised sparingly or only in exceptional cases. The stay of proceedings is a serious interruption in the right, that a party has to proceed with the trial to get it to its legitimate end according to substantive merit of his case. The court to exercise the power to stay the proceedings has to keep in mind that a positive case has been made out by the defendant whereby the court can reach to the conclusion that proceedings, however, indicate an abuse of the process of court.[846]

Where an application was filed under the Allahabad High Court Rules (1952) read with section 151 of the Code for recall of an ex parte interim order of stay, it was held by the Allahabad High Court that it was neither proper nor permissible under the Rules of the Court when other procedure for getting the said ex parte interim order vacated is provided.[847]

In a civil suit damages were claimed by the plaintiff for the loss suffered by the plaintiff due to publication of some allegedly defamatory news. A criminal case was also pending in respect of the said alleged defamation, where the same set of facts were relied upon. However, the facts in the criminal case were simple and no complicated question of fact or law was involved. It was held by the Orissa High Court that no prejudice is likely to be caused if both cases are proceeded with simultaneously. The refusal to stay civil suit till the disposal of the criminal case was held to be proper.[848]

[s 151.12] Settled Matters

The inherent powers cannot be used to reopen the settled matters. These powers cannot be resorted to when there are specific provisions in the Act to deal with the situation. It would be an abuse to allow the reopening of the settled matter after nearly four decades in the purported exercise of inherent powers.[849]

The petitioners filed an application under O XXI rule 90 of the CPC to set aside the auction sale. The application was rejected and therefore the application to set aside the sale under section 151 was not maintainable. The Supreme Court in Nainsingh v Koonwarjee,[850] emphasised that the court is not to exercise inherent power if the order can be challenged under the provisions of the CPC. The application of the petitioners in the facts and circumstances of the case under section 151 was not maintainable.[851]

Where order allowing amendment of plaint was absolutely clean and unambiguous, the court has no inherent power to review its decision duly pronounced.[852]

A government officer of Haryana filed successive writ petitions under Article 226 of the Constitution regarding his retiral benefits on voluntary retirement and both of them were dismissed and the order attained finality. Thereafter, he files a miscellaneous application under section 151 of the Code which was entertained by the high court and allowed. On appeal by the state, the Supreme Court held that when orders have been passed and they have attained finality, the matter cannot be reopened by filing miscellaneous petition.[853] LS Patna, J, speaking for the Bench, observed or follows:

> It is well-settled that the relief granted by the courts must be seen to be logical and tenable within the framework of the law and should not incur and justify the criticism that the jurisdiction of the courts tend to degenerate into misplaced sympathy, generosity and private benevolence. It is essential to maintain the integrity of the legal reasoning and the legitimacy of the conclusions. The possession of powers under section 151, CPC, by the Court, itself is not sufficient, it has to be exercised in accordance with law. The orders of the Courts must emanate logically from legal findings and the judicial results must be seen to be principled and supportable on those findings.[854]

The Bench in the above case quoted a passage from its earlier decision in Brahm Dutt Sharma's case,[855] where in it has been stated as under:

> 10. The High Court's order is not sustainable for yet another reason. Respondents' writ petition challenging the order of dismissal had been finally disposed of on August 10, 1984, thereafter nothing remained pending before the High Court. No miscellaneous application could be filed in the writ petition to revive proceedings in respect of subsequent events after two years. If the respondent was aggrieved by the notice dated January 29, 1986 he could have filed a separate petition under Art. 226 of the Constitution challenging the validity of the notice as it provided a separate cause of action to him. The respondent was not entitled to assail validity of the notice before the High Court by means of a miscellaneous application in the writ petition which had already been decided. The High Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application as no proceedings were pending before it. The High Court committed error in entertaining the respondent's application which was founded on a separated cause of action. When proceedings stand terminated by final disposal of writ petition it is not open to the Court to reopen the proceedings by means of a miscellaneous application in respect of a matter which provided a fresh cause of action. If this principle is not followed there would be confusion and chaos and the finality of proceedings would cease to have any meaning.

[s 151.13] Consolidation of Suits

The Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 does not specifically speak of consolidation of suits but the same can be done under the inherent powers of the court flowing from section 151 of the CPC. Unless specifically prohibited, the civil court has inherent power to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the court. Consolidation of suits is ordered for meeting the ends of justice as it saves the parties from multiplicity of proceedings, delay and expenses. Complete or even substantial and sufficient similarity of the issues arising for decision in two suits enables the two suits being consolidated for trial and decision. The parties are relieved of the need of adducing the same or similar documentary and oral evidence twice over in the two suits at two different trials. The evidence having been recorded, common arguments need be addressed followed by one common judgment. However, as the suits are two, the court may, based on the common judgment, draw two different decrees or one common decree to be placed on the record of the two suits.[856]

However, where none of the circumstances enumerated by the Supreme Court in the Chitivalasa Jute Mills case (supra) appear, the Court cannot exercise its inherent powers to order consolidation of suits. Thus, where four different suits were filed for recovery of money, but there was no substantial similarity between parties, the issues involved were between different parties, cause of action arose on different dates and even burden of proof was on different persons, it was held by the Rajasthan High Court that the rejection of the prayer for consolidation was proper.[857]

Where parties in two suits on which consolidation was sought are different, documents on basis of which cases are fought are of different dates, in both cases, plaintiff's evidence had been recorded separately, the application was filed when defendants had to start recording evidence in their respective case, consolidating them would result in misjoinder of parties and evidence, further, application being at late stage, consolidation was denied.[862]

[s 151.14] Not to be Exercised When Prohibited or Excluded by the Code or Other Statutes

It is well-settled that when a power is to be exercised by a civil court under an express provision, the inherent power cannot be taken recourse to.

An application under section 5 of the Limitation Act, 1963 is not maintainable in a proceeding arising under O XXI of the CPC. Application of the said provision has, thus, expressly been excluded in a proceeding under O XXI of the CPC. In that view, even an application under section 5 of the Limitation Act was not maintainable. A fortiori for the said purpose, inherent power of the court cannot be invoked.[863]

A court has no inherent powers to do that which is prohibited by the Code. Thus, a court has no power, after the judgment is signed, to alter or to add to it, as, doing so, would be in direct contravention of the provisions of O XX, rule 3.[864] Further, this section does not invest in the court, jurisdiction over matters which are excluded from its cognizance. Thus, a court cannot, under this section, entertain a suit relating purely to a question of caste, such a suit not being of a civil nature[865] (see section 9 above); or entertain a rent suit which by special law, can be tried only by a revenue court.[866] When a purchaser through a court auction fails to make the deposit in accordance with O XXI, rule 85, the court cannot, in the exercise of its inherent powers, give him relief against forfeiture of the deposit, as provided in O XXI, rule 86[867] or extend time of 15 days prescribed under O XXI, rule 85 regarding deposit of amount of auction money.[868] Where an auction sale has been confirmed under O XXI, rule 92, the court thereafter has no inherent powers to set it aside on the ground of fraud, since O XXI, rule 90 contains a special provision with reference to it.[869] The court also cannot ignore the provisions of the law of limitation by appealing to this section.[870] With reference to section 14 of the Limitation Act, the Privy Council said:

> In their Lordships' opinion it is impossible to hold that in a matter which is governed by the Act an Act which in some respects gives the court a statutory discretion there can be implied in the court outside the limits of the Act a general discretion to dispense with its provisions.[871]

The court cannot, by the exercise of its inherent powers extend the period of limitation on any grounds of equity and justice.[872] Where an appeal was filed without impleading the necessary parties, it was held that the inherent powers, under this section could not be invoked in order to revive the appeal against them.[873] The court cannot, in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, set aside an ex parte decree, where the case does not satisfy the requirements of O IX, rule 13.[874] Where, however, the application under O IX, rule 13, is dismissed in default the order dismissing the application must be treated as one under section 151, and when restoration of such an application is sought, the same could be allowed under the same provision.[875] The court also cannot in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, set aside an ex parte decree, after the expiry of the period of limitation.[876] If the plaint is rejected, and the plaintiff does not take steps, within the limitation period, to set aside the order by an appeal, the court has no right to do the same under section 151 and deprive the defendant of a valuable right.[877] The court also will not sanction a procedure, which is not authorised by the Code, the law of Arbitration, or the Oaths Act, 1969.[878]

It has been held that an application under O IX, rule 13 cannot be filed by a person who was not initially a party to the proceedings and inherent powers under section 151 can be exercised by the court to redress grievances for which no remedy is provided under the CPC. In the event that an order has been obtained from the court by playing fraud upon it, appellate court can recall the said order on the application of the person aggrieved. Where fraud has been committed upon a party, it has the right to get the said judgment or order set aside, by filing an independent suit.[879] The court stated that section 151 is not a substantive provision that confers the right to get any relief of any kind, but is a mere procedural provision which enables a party to have the proceedings of a pending suit conducted in manner that is consistent with justice and equity. The Supreme Court has laid down following circumstances where power under section 151 can be used:-

(i) Inherent powers cannot be used to re-open settled matters. The inherent powers of the court must, to that extent, be regarded as abrogated by the legislature. A provision barring the exercise of inherent power need not be express, it may even be implied.

(ii) Inherent power cannot be used to restrain the execution of decree at the instance of one who was not a party to suit.

(iii) The consolidation of suit can be done in exercise of the inherent power since the same has not been provided for under any of provisions of the Code. It can be done in exercise of the powers under section 151 of the Code, where a common question of fact and law arise therein, and the same must also not be a case of misjoinder of parties. The non-consolidation of two or more suits is likely to lead to a multiplicity of suits being filed, leaving the door open for conflicting decisions on the same issue, which may be common to the two or more suits that are sought to be consolidated. Non-consolidation may, therefore prejudice a party, or result in the failure of justice.

(iv) In exceptional circumstances, the court may exercise its inherent powers, apart from order 9 of the Code to set aside an ex parte decree. An ex parte decree passed due to the non-appearance of the counsel of a party, owing to the fact that the party was not a fault, can be set aside in an appeal preferred against it. So is the case, where the absence of a defendant is caused on account of mistake of the court. An application under section 151 will be maintainable, in the event that an ex parte order has been obtained by fraud upon the court or by collusion. The provisions of order 9 may not be attracted, and in such a case the court may either restore the case, or set aside the ex parte order in the exercise of its inherent powers. There may be an order of dismissal of a suit for default of appearance of the plaintiff, who was in fact dead at the time that the order was passed. Thus, where a court employs a procedure to do something that it never intended to do, and there is miscarriage of justice or an abuse of the process of court, the injustice so done must be remedied, in accordance with the principle of actus curiae neminem gravabit, an act of the court shall prejudice no person.

(v) Inherent powers maybe exercised ex debito justitiae in those cases, where there is no express provision in Code. The said powers cannot be exercised in contravention of, or in conflict with, or upon ignoring express and specific provisions of the law. In view of the several decisions of the Supreme Court reiterating it, the law on this issue stands crystallised to the effect that the inherent powers enshrined under section 151 can be exercised only where no remedy has been provided for in any other provision of the Code. In the event that a party has obtained a decree or order by playing a fraud upon the court, or where an order has been passed by a mistake of the court, the court may be justified in rectifying such mistake, either by recalling the said order, or by passing any other appropriate order. However, inherent powers cannot be used in conflict of any other existing provision, or in case a remedy has been provided for by any other provision of Code.[880]

(vi) In the event that a fraud has been played upon a party, the same may not be a case where inherent powers can be exercised.

It was further held as follows:

(i) An application under order 9 rule 13 of the Code cannot be filed by a person who was not initially a party to the proceedings.

(ii) Inherent powers under section 151 can be exercised by the court to redress only such a grievance, for which no remedy is provided for under the Code.

(iii) In the event that an order has been obtained from the court by playing fraud upon it, it is always open to the court to recall the said order on the application of the person aggrieved, and such power can also be exercised by the appellate court.

(iv) Where the fraud has been committed upon party, the court cannot investigate such a factual issue, and in such an eventuality, a party has the right to get the said judgment or order set aside, by filing an independent suit.

(v) A person aggrieved may maintain an application before the land acquisition collector for reference under section 18 or 30 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, but cannot make an application for impleadment or apportionment before the reference court.

There is no provision under the Hindu Adoption and Maintenance Act, 1956 for granting interim maintenance. Till such time the parties cannot be asked to starve. Although there is no appropriate provision for seeking interim maintenance, there is no prohibition in the statute for grant of such interim maintenance. Therefore, section 151 can be invoked for claiming interim maintenance pending adjudication of the claim in the main proceeding.[881]

The petitioners had challenged an order passed by the trial court granting an extension of time for payment of deposit of court fees by invoking inherent powers under section 151 CPC. The Hon'ble Bombay HC held appeal is most appropriate remedy against the order rejecting the plaint however, held that when there is no challenge to the demanded court fees, an application simplicitor seeking extension of time to pay such court fees can be filed under section 151 CPC.[882]

Under rule 1 of O VIII, the time to file written statement has been limited to thirty days from the date of service of summons though it can be extended by the Court for reasons to be recorded in writing, but not beyond ninety days. The Himachal Pradesh High Court has held that such period cannot be extended further by the court even under its inherent powers under section 151 or under section 148 of the Code.[883]

A remand of the entire case to the trial court for the purposes of taking additional evidence and then disposing it off according to law, would not be valid, it being in contravention of the specific provisions of O XIV, rules 27 and 28.[884] Similarly, a court cannot, in the exercise of the powers under this section, compel a person to undergo a medical examination,[885] nor can it compel an arbitrator to enter into a reference, such an order not being envisaged by section 28 of the Arbitration Act.[886] Further, the court cannot exercise inherent suo motu powers in any proceedings under Arbitration and Conciliation Act, 1996, which is not permitted to be interfered with by the court,[887] nor can it grant an injunction restraining execution of a decree which provides for the demolition of a portion of a wall, as, such demolition is neither "damage" nor "waste" within the meaning of O XXXIX, rules 1 and 2.[888] But, the mere fact that the application of the defendants was filed under section 151 would not come in the way of the court granting an injunction under O XXXIX, rule 1(a).[889] The provisions in the Rent Act and O XV, rule 5 of the Code, for striking off the defence cannot be defeated by invoking the inherent powers of the court. This is so because, the special provision must override the general provision.[890] Similarly, where the Representation of the People Act prohibits condonation in filing of a petition, the same cannot be cured by exercising the inherent powers in the interests of justice.[891]

by section 151 but that jurisdiction cannot be exercised so as to nullify the provisions of the CPC. Where the CPC deals expressly with a particular matter, the provision should normally be regarded as exhaustive.[893]

Section 151 of the CPC gives inherent power to the court to make such order as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the court, however same is required to be exercised by the court, normally, when there is no other statutory remedy available to the parties to redress their grievance or to prevent abuse of the process of the court. Whenever there is a statutory provision remedy provided under the CPC or statute, parties to the litigation are required to exhaust those remedies and in such situation, the court is not expected to exercise inherent powers.[894]

An application was filed by the judgment-debtor for setting aside auction sale in execution of a decree. The said application was filed under section 151 of the Code on the ground of want of notice and mis-description of the property. It was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that the stand of the judgment-debtor that he came to know about the execution proceedings only when the warrant of delivery was issued does not appear to be bona fide. Moreover, allowing him to raise such objection by invoking section 47 or 151 would amount to circumventing the regular provision of O XXI, rule 90 of the Code.[895]

In a suit for specific performance of agreement to sell land, one of the defendants died during the pendency of the suit and his legal heirs, who were minors, were brought on the record. Against the decree passed in favour of the plaintiff, the minor heirs, who had attained majority did not choose to file an appeal to assert their right nor did they choose to file cross objection in the appellate court. That being so, the decree cannot be challenged by the said legal heirs through a petition under section 151 of the Code in the appellate court.[896]

In a case under the UP Imposition of Ceiling on Land Holdings Act, 1961, where the order under the Act had not been challenged in appeal provided under section 12 of the said Act, the Supreme Court held that inherent power cannot be exercised for the benefit of the litigant who has remedy under the relevant statute. Thus, application filed under section 151 long after the period provided for filing appeal under the Act was held as not maintainable.[897] Dr Pasayat, J, speaking for the Bench in the above case, explained the principles underlying the exercise of inherent powers in the following words:

> in matters with which the CPC does not deal with, the Court will exercise its inherent power to do justice between the parties which is warranted under the circumstances and which the necessities of the case require. If there are specific provisions of the CPC dealing with the particular topic and they expressly or by necessary implication exhaust the scope of the powers of the court or the jurisdiction that may be exercised in relation to a matter, the inherent powers of the Court cannot be invoked in order to cut across the powers conferred by the CPC. The inherent powers of the Court are not to be used for the benefit of a litigant who has remedy under the CPC. Similar is the position vis-à-vis other statutes. The object of section 151, CPC is to supplement and not to replace the remedies provided for in the CPC. Section 151, CPC will not be available when there is alternative and the same is accepted to be a well-settled ratio of law.[898]

For transfer of civil cases, inherent powers of the court under section 151 of the Code cannot be invoked.[899] Explaining the law in this regard, CK Thakker, J, speaking for the Bench, observed as follows:

> It is settled law that inherent powers may be exercised ex debito justitiae in those cases, where there is no express provision in the code. The said power cannot be exercised in contravention or in conflict of or ignoring express and specific provision of law. Since the law relating to transfer is contained in Sections 22 to 25 of the Code, and they are exhaustive in nature, section 151 has no application.[900]

Inherent jurisdiction must be exercised, subject to the rule that, if the Code does contain specific provisions, which could meet the necessities of the case in question, such provisions should be followed, and the inherent jurisdiction must not be invoked.[901] Such provisions need not be express, they may be implied, or even implicit, from the very nature of the provisions made for the contingencies to which they relate.[902] Accordingly, where certain orders are passed in the suit, and the suit is thereafter disposed off, an application under this section, challenging those orders as being without jurisdiction, and for the restoration of the suit, is incompetent, there being a specific remedy under the Code, by way of an appeal or a review.[903] It is only when there is no clear provision in the Code, that inherent jurisdiction can be invoked.[904] In such a case, the court may devise a procedure, which would be permissible under the law, for achieving the ends of justice.[905]

In Ram Chand & Sons Sugar Mills Pvt Ltd v Kanhayalal Bhargav,[906] the Supreme Court in this connection, observed that, the inherent power of the court "is in addition to and complimentary to the powers expressly conferred under the CPC; but that power will not be exercised if its exercise is inconsistent with, or comes into conflict with any of the powers expressly or by necessary implication conferred by the other provisions of the Code. If there are express provisions exhaustively covering a particular topic, they give rise to a necessary implication that no power shall be exercised in respect of the said topic otherwise than in the manner prescribed by the said provisions. Whatever limitations are imposed by construction on the provisions of section 151 of the Code, they do not control the undoubted power of the court to make a suitable order to prevent the abuse of the process of the court." Thus, inherent powers of the court, would not include a power of revision under section 115 of the Code, even in cases to which that section is not applicable.[907] Similarly, in view of the express provision in O XXXVII, rule 4, for setting aside a decree passed under that Order, an application to do so, under this section, would be untenable.[908] Also, this section cannot be resorted to in order to avoid the application of O I, rule 10, when an application under that rule has been rejected.[909] If relief can properly be obtained in a separate suit, there is no justification for invoking section 151,[910] and the court will not by virtue of its inherent jurisdiction, amend a consent decree on the ground of fraud,[911] unless the fraud is a fraud upon the court;[912] or set aside a consent decree on the ground of coercion, there being a suitable remedy by way of a suit.[913] A court cannot make use of the special provisions of this section, where the applicant has his remedy provided elsewhere in the Code, and has neglected to avail of the same.[914] However, there is a reported case, in which, an order dismissing a suit under O XI, rule 21, was set aside by the court, in its inherent jurisdiction, on the ground that an appeal would be a more costly or a non-efficacious remedy.[915]

The inherent powers cannot be used to reopen the settled matters. These powers cannot be resorted to when there are specific provisions in the Act to deal with the situation.[916]

While considering the scope of the powers of the court under this section one has to bear in mind the decision of the Supreme Court,[917] wherein it was held that:

> Under the inherent power of Courts recognised by Section 151, Code of Civil Procedure 1908, a Court has no power to do that which is prohibited by the Code. Inherent jurisdiction of the Court must be exercised subject to the rule that if the Code does not contain specific provisions which would meet the necessities of the case, such provisions should be followed and inherent jurisdiction should not be invoked. Further, the power under s 151 of the Code cannot be exercised as an appellate power.

Therefore, once it is clear that the civil court cannot deal with the matter pertaining to the execution of the decrees passed in the partition suits in relation to the estate which are subjected to revenue to the government, it is evident that the matters pertaining to the execution of such decrees cannot be dealt with under the exercise of inherent powers under section 151.[918]

[s 151.16] To be Exercised Only for the Ends of Justice

No order should be made, under this section, unless it is necessary for achieving the ends of justice, or to prevent abuse of the process of the court.[919] Even though the order is without jurisdiction, the powers under section 115, CPC may not be exercised. The powers under section 115 are intended to be exercised with a view to subserve and not to defeat the ends of justice. Where the order of the court below is in the interest of justice, the high court can refuse to interfere under section 115, even if the court below has no jurisdiction to pass such an order. The interference in revision is discretionary and should be exercised only in the interest of justice and not in a case where interference is against the interest of justice.[920] The Patna High Court restored, under this section, a suit which, through the mistake of the court, was dismissed on the failure of both the parties to appear. The high court held that, the fact that the dismissal could be revised or reviewed under O XLVII, should not come in the way of exercising power under this section.[921] Likewise, interference on the ground of safeguarding the interests of the minor, as envisaged by section 31 of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890 was held necessary, where the court had granted permission to the guardian to sell the minor's properties, without giving notice to the minor's other relations, or fixing the approximate price, or directing the sale to be by way of public auction.[922]

The Supreme Court has held, that where the high court has refused to answer a reference under section 66(1) of the Income Tax Act, 1922 (Now repealed by the Income Tax Act, 1961) on a default to appear by the assessee, the High Court does not become functus officio on passing such an order, and can restore the reference and hear it again on merits, if the assessee shows sufficient cause for his default. There is no provision in the Act preventing the high court from recalling its earlier order and hearing the reference again on merits. Such a course is necessary in order to prevent gross injustice.[923] The mere fact that there is no other remedy, would not attract the application of this section.[924]

The first case in which this section was considered by the Privy Council was Sabitri v Savi.[925] In that case, the High Court of Calcutta dismissed an appeal under O XLI, rule 10, which provides that, upon a failure to comply with an order for the security for costs, the court shall dismiss the appeal. On an appeal to the judicial committee, it was contended that the court had inherent powers under this section, to give the appellant an opportunity to make an application for leave to continue to appeal in forma pauperis. Referring to this contention, their Lordships stated:

> A further point is taken, that s 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, preserves the inherent powers of the court to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice, and to this general saving section appeal is made to take the present case out of the operation of the orders and rules, if they are applicable to Letters Patent appeals. How far a mere general saving clause gives power in effect to refuse to apply an appropriate rule, made in the exercise of other powers of the court and having statutory force, is another question, but for present purposes it is enough to say that in the terms of the section the inherent powers saved are such as are used to secure the ends of justice.

In the end, their Lordships came to the conclusion, on the basis of the material before them, that justice did not require that the appellant should be assisted in prosecuting the appeal before the high court, and they also confirmed the order of the high court. The Bombay High Court has stated that the section should be applied with great caution, and that a court cannot, under this section, restore an application under O XXI, rule 89, which had been dismissed for default of appearance.[926] However, where the ends of justice require it, the court has inherent powers to make such orders, as it may deem proper. Accordingly, the Mysore High Court granted an interim injunction, in the interests of justice, though the case did not strictly fall under O XXXIX.[927] The inherent powers of the court under section 151, CPC have been saved, and nothing prevents the court from receiving the documents in exercise of its inherent power, in the absence of any express prohibition to that effect in the CPC.[928]

In a case where the husband doubted the paternity of the child which was born after seven months of marriage, it was held by the Madhya Pradesh High Court that matrimonial ties are based on fundamental rights of trust and healthy regard for each other. As such DNA test of the child would lay to rest unnecessary doubt created in the mind of the husband.[929] While arriving at the above conclusion, the high court has quoted with approval a passage from the decision of the Supreme Court in Banarsi Dass v Teeku Dutta,[930] which is as follows:

> We may remember that Section 112 of the Evidence Act was enacted at a time when the modern scientific advancements with deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) as well as ribonucleic acid (RNA) test were not even in contemplation of the legislature. The result of a genuine DNA test is said to be scientifically accurate. But even that is not enough to escape from the conclusiveness of Section 112 of the Evidence Act e.g. if a husband and wife were living together during the time of conception but the DNA test revealed that the child was not born to the husband, the conclusiveness in law would remain irrebuttable. This may look hard from the point of view of the husband who would be compelled to bear the fatherhood of a child of which he may be innocent. But even in such a case the law leans in favour of the innocent child from being bastardised if his mother and her spouse were living together during the time of conception. Hence the question regarding the degree of proof of non-access for rebutting the conclusiveness must be answered in the light of what is meant by access or non-access as delineated above.

In a suit relating to alleged encroachment of cremation ground by defendant, the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff had closed, but he wanted to recall a witness for marking documents which were not traceable earlier. It was held that the documents were public documents and were of vital importance. Therefore, permission to recall witness and get the documents marked should be granted under O XXVIII, rule 17 read with section 151 of the Code.[931]

In a suit for delivery of immoveable property, the suit was dismissed by the trial court and the high court. However, the Supreme Court allowed the appeal reversing the judgment and decree of the trial court and the high court. In the meantime the judgment-debtors had taken over the possession. When an execution petition was filed by the decree-holder, it was objected to by the judgment-debtor on the ground that instead of execution petition, an application under section 144 of the Code should have been filed. It was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that a conjoint reading of sections 51, 144, 151 and O XXI, rule 35 of CPC and Article 142 of the Constitution of India makes it abundantly clear that the decree of a court can be enforced by filing appropriate application under any of those provisions and in a way, it is the option of the person who succeeded in the litigation.[932]

Application for dispensing with the filing of certified copy of judgment and decree can be allowed only where the law permits such dispensation or in the interest of justice, provided there is urgency involved in the matter. Thus, where the appeal was presented with an application for condonation of delay, that too, an inordinate delay of 1189 days, it was held not to be a fit case where the prayer to dispense with the requirement can be allowed in exercise of inherent powers.[933]

There is no express bar in filing an application for withdrawal of the withdrawal application. Accordingly, an application for withdrawal of the withdrawal application would be maintainable.[934]

Therefore, withdrawal of application to withdraw suit in terms of O XXIII rule 1 of CPC can be permitted by the court under its inherent powers. However, such power is only to be used with a view to secure the ends of justice. In a case, the application for withdrawal of suit was supported by joint statements of the plaintiff and his counsel and an affidavit of the plaintiff in which the plaintiff had deposed that his signature on the plaint was forged. Subsequently, an application for withdrawal of the earlier application was filed on the ground that the application and joint statements were wrongly submitted by counsel. It was observed that the subsequent application exposes the counsel to a probe in his professional conduct and the plaintiff to legal action. It was held by Supreme Court that the order allowing subsequent application and the order rejecting revision against it was unjustified. Speaking for the court, J Chelameshwar, J opined as under:[935]

> 22. As rightly contended by the learned counsel for the appellant, the issue is not whether the trial court has the power to permit the withdrawal of the applications filed earlier to the withdrawal of the suit but whether such power was exercised in accordance with law and for the purpose for which it is meant. The mere existence of a power does not justify the exercise of the power. In the context of the powers of the judicial bodies, all powers are required to be exercised with a view to secure ends of justice.
> 23. In neither of the abovementioned two cases this Court had an occasion to examine whether the inherent power of the civil court under Section 151 CPC was properly exercised. In the first case, the suit had been withdrawn by the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs subsequently sought to go back upon the withdrawal and reopen the suits on the ground that they were induced to withdraw the suit on a misrepresentation made by the defendants. In the second case, the plaintiff "changed his mind" after filing the application for withdrawal of the suit and sought to withdraw the said application even before a formal order permitting the withdrawal was passed by the Court. The argument in both the cases was that the trial court lacked the jurisdiction to permit the course of action undertaken by the plaintiffs. This Court only laid down the principle that Section 151 CPC recognises the existence of ample power in the civil court to permit the plaintiffs to pursue the course of action undertaken by them.

The court would also interfere, in the interests of justice, with an order, particularly an ex parte order, which has been issued through its mistake,[936] even suo motu.[937] However, the court would not grant a relief under its inherent jurisdiction, if the same relief can be granted by another court, under an express provision of the Code.[938] When the trial court is satisfied, that the parties are not willing to proceed with the case, and want to delay the proceedings at any cost, then only it should exercise the discretion of not granting the adjournment.[939] The court may also close the evidence of the party, in the exercise of its discretion, where the party has been negligent in producing the evidence.[940]

Where a marriage under Hindu Marriage Act, 1955 was declared a nullity, the wife claimed return of gold and silver ornaments given to her by her parents at the time of marriage. The application claiming the said stridhan was filed under section 27 of the Act read with O VII, rule 7 and section 151 of the CPC. It was held that the application can be allowed under the inherent jurisdiction of the court in view of section 27 of the Act. It was further held that the Act adopts the Code so far as it is applicable in matrimonial proceedings under the Act.[941]

It has been held that, although the Code contains no express provisions on the matters hereinafter mentioned, the court has inherent powers—

(1) to consolidate suits and appeals,[942] including appeals to His Majesty in council;[943] even without the consent of the parties;[944]

(2) to postpone hearing of suits pending decision, of selected action;[945]

(3) to stay cross-suits on the ground of convenience;[946]

(4) to order joint trial of suits;[947]

(5) to ascertain whether the proper parties are before it;[948]

(6) to inquire whether a plaintiff is entitled to sue as an adult;[949]

[s 151.19] Prevent Abuse of Process of the Court

In the Law Lexicon[1139] the words "abuse of process of court, are define as follows:

> Abuse of process of court, is the malicious and improper use of some regular legal proceedings to obtain an unfair advantage over an opponent. Nothing short of obvious fraud on the part of a debtor would render him liable to have his petition for insolvency dismissed on the ground of "abuse of process of court", Tin Va v Subya.[1140] The term is generally used in connection with action for using some process of the court maliciously to the injury of another person, Per Abdur Rahim J in Thathunaik v Condu Reddi.[1141] Abuse of process of court generally applies to proceeding wanting in bona fides and is frivolous, vexatious or oppressive. Making use of the process of court as a devise to help the jurisdiction of a civil court is an abuse of the process of the court. Narappa Reddy v Chandramouli,[1142] Contempt of Courts Act, 1952, s 3.

It is only in case where the proceedings are fraud, vexatious or want of bona-fide, malicious and improper, then it comes within the meaning of abuse of the process of the court.[1143]

A court has the inherent jurisdiction to stay any suit, which results in an abuse of the process of the court.[1144] (See notes to O XVI, rule 1, "Whether witness summons can be refused," and the undermentioned case.[1145])

Where the court is bound to grant an application, and has no discretion to refuse it, it has no power to dismiss it on "so treacherous a ground of decision, as an "abuse of the process of the court".[1146] Also, where a decree of the first appellate court has become final, by its not having been interfered with in the second appeal, an application for stay of its execution, cannot be granted on the ground, either of abuse of the process of court or in the interests of justice, merely because a review application against such a decree is pending.[1147]

In a decree for partition and separate possession, the decree-holder was also directed to file separate application for mesne profits. However, the decree-holder during the pendency of the appeal against the decree filed a separate suit for various reliefs and also moved an application for interim injunction for protection of his possession. It was held that filing of subsequent suit was an abuse of the process of law. If the decree-holder was in possession, he should have prayed for injunction in partition suit and could have filed an application in appeal to continue the interim relief.[1148]

Where a suit was only for declaration and perpetual injunction and no relief of possession was either claimed in the plaint or inserted through amendment, it was held that grant of additional reliefs of possession and mesne profits in the decree beyond the pleadings by invoking the provisions of section 151 of the Code was improper.[1149]

Where a special leave petition was filed by the State of Kerala, out of the way to help the landlord, who also happened to be the mother of the municipal corporator, and where no interest of the government was involved, the apex court imposed costs of Rs 10,000/- on the State of Kerala. This amount was to be collected from the salaries of all the persons responsible for taking the decision of filing a special leave petition, as they were responsible for the abuse of the process of the court.

An appeal, and a second appeal, have been held, by the Madras High Court to lie from an order made under section 151, in execution, or for restitution (see section 144 heading "Appeal");[1150] whereas, the Lahore and Patna High Courts have held that no appeal lies from an order made by a court in its inherent jurisdiction.[1151] An order mentioned in rule 3 of the Assam High Court (Jurisdiction over the district council courts) Order 1954, includes an order made under this section. Hence, an appeal against such an order can be to the high court.[1152] (As to whether an appeal lies from an order made under section 151 remanding an appeal, refer to note "Appeal from remand under the inherent power" under O XLI, rule 23). An order made in execution, though made under section 151, is no longer a decree, in view of the amendment of section 2(2), and hence, no appeal would henceforth lie.

It is well settled that when an application for maintenance is submitted in partition suit by the plaintiff, in view of the fact that the property is in possession of the defendant and the plaintiff is entitled to have maintenance out of the joint family property, such application is entertained and decided in view of the provisions of section 151 and not under O XXXIX or any other provision. Therefore, as against such order, the miscellaneous appeal is misconceived since O XLII is not applicable to such orders. Thus, the miscellaneous appeal as against the order of maintenance was not tenable in law.[1153]

[s 151.21] Review

The review/recall petition against the consent decree would not lie. If the evidence on record discloses that one party has played fraud on the other party, in such event the only remedy left over to the party against whom the fraud is played to file a separate suit for setting aside the decree obtained by fraud. But, if it is proved that one of the party has played fraud on the court, then only the review petition is maintainable under section 151, CPC.[1154]

Where order allowing amendment of plaint was absolutely clean and unambiguous, the court has no inherent power to review its decision duly pronounced.[1155]

[s 151.22] Revision

After carefully examining the various provisions of the CPC which provides or contemplates filing of an appeal, Supreme Court found no such provisions available to the appellant to file an appeal against the order made by the trial court on an application filed under section 151. Therefore, revision petition against the said order is maintainable.[1156] Order rejecting application under O XXVI, rule 9, read with section 151 for appointment of approved valuer to fix valuation of plaint and machinery is not revisable, in view of the provisions of section 115 and considering the fact that the impugned order rejecting the application has not disposed off the suit or proceeding.[1157]

There is neither any merit nor any scope for interference by high court, particularly when the very application under O XXI, rule 29 read with section 151, CPC was not tenable. There is no justification to interfere with the impugned order in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction under section 115.[1158]

The order even if not regular may not be interfered within revision if it is made irregularly or even improperly unless grave injustice or hardship would result from a failure to do so. Where the interference is likely to work, not in the interest of justice but rather against it, the high court will not interfere in its revisional jurisdiction.[1159]

[s 152.1] Amendment of Decrees or Orders

This section has been taken from O XXVIII, rule 11 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of England.

There are only two cases in which the court can amend or vary a decree or order after it is drawn up and signed, namely:

(i) under its inherent powers, when the decree or order does not correctly state what the court actually decided and intended; and

(ii) under this section, where there has been a clerical or arithmetical mistake, or an error arising from an accidental slip or omission.

The Supreme Court has reiterated that an application for modification or clarification of a final order passed by the Supreme Court is not contemplated by the provisions of the Supreme Court Rules, 1966[1160] which specifically provides the remedy of review and also lays down the procedure governing the consideration of a review application by the court.[1161]

Where the registrar of the Supreme Court had declined to register the application seeking modification/clarification of the judgment passed in Collector v Cine Exhibitors[1162] stating that it would amount to seeking review of the Judgment and order passed, an appeal was filed before the Supreme Court. It was held by the Supreme Court that the practice of overcoming the provision for review under O XL of the Rules by filing an application for re-hearing/ modification/ clarification has to be deprecated. It was further held that a party cannot be permitted to circumvent or by-pass the circulation procedure and indirectly obtain a hearing in the open court and "what cannot be done directly, cannot be permitted to be done indirectly".[1163]

Section 206 of the Code of 1882 made no reference to errors in judgments and under that section, it was held that if the decree was in conformity with the judgment, the court has no power to vary or amend the decree,[1164] even if the judgment was erroneous in law.[1165] But this section allows clerical or arithmetical mistakes in judgments to be corrected. The question then arises whether, if the decree agrees with the judgment, but the error has arisen at an earlier stage of the transaction in a deed in which the property has been incorrectly described, can the mistake be corrected under this section? In some cases, it has been held that the section applies.[1166] In other cases, it has been held that the section does not apply.[1167] In one case, it was said that the applicant might apply for amendment of the plaint, before the decree had been executed and then apply for amendment of the judgment and decree to correspond with the amended plaint.[1168] In some cases, the amendment was allowed under the inherent power to make corrections necessary for the ends of justice.[1169] In a case where there was a misdescription of the name of the defendant in the plaint, judgment and decree, it was held that the decree could be corrected under O I, rule 10(2), read with section 151.[1170] Where, in a suit based on a deed, the description of the properties in the plaint followed, that in the deed and the decree was in accordance with the plaint and an application for amendment was made on the allegation that there had been a mistake in the description of the property agreed to be dealt with, it was held that the court could order an amendment, if there was an accidental slip or mistake but not if there was a dispute as to the identity of the property.[1171] This is so, because power under this section is not confined to correct only mistakes in the drafting of decrees. It extends even to correct mistakes or errors in the plaint and even in a document, on the strength of which the plaint was prepared and filed.[1172] It has also been held that where there is a mistake, it is sufficient to amend the decree without amending the pleadings or documents to which the mistake is traceable.[1173] A consent decree can ordinarily be corrected with consent of the parties thereto, if the correction is a substantial one. However, if the correction is of a clerical error committed by a mutual mistake of the parties in preparing their compromise petition there is no reason why such correction cannot be made under this section.[1174]

The Punjab and Haryana High Court has held that correction in judgment can also be made if the error has occurred due to mistake in pleadings. However, for rectifying the mistake in the judgment it is not necessary to first amend the pleadings.[1175]

The power of rectification of clerical, arithmetical errors, or accidental slips, does not empower the court to have a second thought over the matter, and to find that a better order or decree could, or should, be passed. There should not be a reconsideration of the merits of the matter to come to a conclusion that it would have been better, and in the fitness of things, to have passed an order, is as sought to be passed on rectification. On a second thought, the court may find that it may have committed a mistake in passing an order in certain terms, but every such mistake does not permit its rectification in the exercise of the court's inherent powers, as contained under section 152 of the CPC. It is to be confined to something that was initially intended, but was left out or added, against such intention.[1176]

A revision petition was filed against the order of the learned Munsiff dismissing the execution on the ground that it was perverse and misconceived. The Hon'ble High Court of Jammu and Kashmir held that wherein it was held that the Executing Court can correct the decree under section 152 CPC so as to make the decree executable. It was further observed that a decree of a competent court should not, as far as practicable, be allowed to be defeated on accord of accidental slip or emotions. Since the decree became final because the Judgment Debtor did not challenge it, the Executing Court had a duty to correct the decree under section 152 of CPC so that it didn't give rise to any disputes.[1177]

[s 152.2] Basis—Two Principles

Section 152 is based on two principles, namely, that the act of the court should not prejudice any party and that the courts have the duty to see that records are true and present the correct state of affairs. An arithmetical mistake is a mistake in calculation, while a clerical mistake is a mistake of writing or typing error from an accidental slip or omission or an error due to careless mistake or omission, made unintentionally and unknowingly also. A matter, requiring elaborate arguments or evidence on question of facts or law, for its discovery, cannot be categorised as an error arising out of accidental slip or omission in order to bring it within the scope of section 152. Where the court considered a legal provision and came to a wrong conclusion, consciously thinking that conclusion to be correct and passed a wrong decree, it is evidently not an error arising from any accidental slip or omission, but a mistake consciously committed therefore, cannot be corrected under section 152. The only remedy open to the party aggrieved, in such a case would be to appeal.[1178]

The basis of the provision under section 152 of the CPC is founded on the maxim actus curiae neminem gravabit, i.e., an act of court shall prejudice no man. The maxim "is founded upon justice and good sense, and affords a safe and certain guide for the administration of the law", said Cresswell J in Freeman v Tranah[1179] An unintentional mistake of the court which may prejudice the cause of any party must and alone could be rectified. In Master Construction Co Pvt Ltd v State of Orissa[1180] it was observed that the arithmetical mistake is a mistake of calculation, a clerical mistake is a mistake in writing or typing whereas an error arising out of or occurring from accidental slip or omission is an error due to careless mistake on the part of the court liable to be corrected. To illustrate this point it was said that in a case where the order contains something which is not mentioned in the decree, it would be a case of unintentional omission or mistake as the mistake or omission is attributable to the court which may say something or omit to say something which it did not intend to say or omit. No new arguments or re-arguments on merits can be entertained to facilitate such rectification of mistakes. The provision cannot be invoked to modify, alter or add to the terms of the original order or decree so as to, in effect, pass an effective judicial order after the judgment in the case.[1181]

The maxim of equity, namely, actus curiae neminem gravabit (an act of court shall prejudice no man), shall be applicable. This maxim is founded upon justice and good sense which serves a safe and certain guide for the administration of law. The other maxim is, lex non cogit ad impossibilia (the law does not compel a man to do what he cannot possibly perform). The law itself and its administration is understood to disclaim as it does in its general aphorisms, all intention of compelling impossibilities, and the administration of law must adopt that general exception in the consideration of particular cases. The applicability of the aforesaid maxims has been approved by the Supreme Court in Raj Kumar Dey v Tarapada Dey,[1182] Gursharan Singh v New Delhi Municipal Committee[1183] and Mohammod Gazi v State of Madhya Pradesh.[1184]

Section 152 of the CPC is based on a laudable principle that an act of the court shall prejudice no party and that the courts have a duty to see that their records are true and represent the correct state of affairs. It is well settled that the power of the court under section 152 of the CPC is not restricted to correction of errors in decree drawn up by ministerial staff only, rather it can be exercised even to correct the judgments pronounced and signed by the court.[1185]

[s 152.3] Procedural Laws

It cannot be overlooked that the procedural laws are primarily meant to do justice between the parties. If there are mistakes which are capable of being rectified and they answer the description of the mistakes under section 152 of the CPC, the court should invariably rectify the mistakes and do justice between the parties.[1186]

[s 152.4] No Second Thought or Reconsideration

As a matter of fact such inherent powers would generally be available to all courts and authorities irrespective of the fact whether the provisions contained under section 152 may or may not strictly apply to any particular proceeding. In a matter where it is clear that something which the court intended to do but the same was accidentally slipped or any mistake creeps in due to clerical or arithmetical mistake, it would only advance the ends of justice to enable the court to rectify such mistake. But before exercise of such power the court must be legally satisfied and arrive at a valid finding that the order or the decree contains or omits something which was intended to be otherwise, that is to say while passing the decree the court must have in its mind that the order or the decree should be passed in a particular manner but that intention is not translated into the decree or order due to clerical, arithmetical error or accidental slip. The facts and circumstances may provide clue to the fact as to what was intended by the court but unintentionally the same does mention in the order or the judgment or something which was intended to be there stands added to it. The power of rectification of clerical, arithmetical errors or accidental slip does not empower the court to have a second thought over the matter and to find that a better order or decree could or should be passed. There should not be reconsideration of merits of the matter to come to a conclusion that it would have been better and in the fitness of things to have passed an order as sought to be passed on rectification. On a second thought, the court may find that it may have committed a mistake in passing an order in certain terms but every such mistake does not permit its rectification in exercise of the court's inherent powers as contained under section 152. It is to be confined to something initially intended but left out or added against such intention.[1187]

In a case under the UP Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, the Supreme Court held that the principles applicable to section 152 of the CPC are clearly applicable to section 6(6) of the UP Act of 1947 which provides for correction of any clerical or arithmetical error. The provision cannot be invoked to modify, alter or add to terms of original order or decree so as to, in effect, pass an effective judicial order after judgment in the case. Therefore, the Labour Court was not justified in modifying the award as was originally made.[1188]

Explaining the ambit of section 152, Arijit Pasayat, J speaking for the Bench in the above case, observed as follows:

> The exercise of this power contemplates the correction of mistakes by the Court of its own ministerial actions and does not contemplate of passing effective judicial orders after the judgment, decree or order. The settled position of law is that after the passing of the judgment, decree or order, the same becomes final subject to any further avenues of remedies provided in respect of the same and the very Court or the tribunal cannot, on mere change of view, is not entitled to vary the terms of the judgments, decrees and orders earlier passed except by means of review, if statutorily provided specifically therefor any subject to the conditions or limitations provided therein. The powers under section 152 of the Code are neither to be equated with the power of nor can be said to be akin to review or even said to clothe the Court concerned under the guise of invoking after the result of the judgment earlier rendered, in its entirely or any portion or part of it. The correcting contemplated are of correcting only accidental omissions or mistakes and not all omissions and mistakes which might have been committed by the Court while passing the judgment, decree or order. The omission sought to be correct which goes to the merits of the case is beyond the scope of Section 152 ...[1189]

The Supreme Court has held that the powers under section 152 cannot be equated with the power of review and cannot be said to be akin to review. section 152 can be invoked for the limited purpose of correcting clerical errors or arithmetical mistakes in judgments or accidental omissions. To decide whether the court acted within the purview of section 152, one has to check what were the pleadings of the parties, what was the decree passed, and what corrections were made in it.[1190]

[s 152.5] Amendment of court proceedings

If the party has pleaded that stand taken by the party before the court was wrongly recorded in the judgment, the only course open to the appellant was to move the high court in line with what has been said in State of Maharashtra v Ramdas Shrinivas Nayak[1191] In Bhavnagar University v Palitana Sugar Mill Pvt Ltd,[1192] the view in the aforesaid case was reiterated by observing that statements of fact as to what transpired at the hearing, recorded in the judgment of the court, are conclusive of the facts so stated and no one can contradict such statements by affidavit or other evidence. If a party thinks that the happenings in the court have been wrongly recorded in a judgment, it is incumbent upon the party, while the matter is still fresh in the minds of the judges, to call the attention of the very judges who have made the record. That is the only way to have the record corrected. If no such step is taken, the matter must necessarily end there. It is not open to the appellant to contend before Supreme Court to the contrary.[1193]

[s 152.6] Amendment in the Order to Express Meaning of the Court

A reading of the judgment of the high court shows that in its opinion the plaintiffs were found entitled to succeed in the suit. There is an accidental slip or omission in manifesting the intention of the court by couching the reliefs to which the plaintiffs were entitled in the event of their succeeding in the suit. section 152 enables the court to vary its judgment so as to give effect to its meaning and intention. Power of the court to amend its orders so as to carry out the intention and express the meaning of the court at the time when the order was made was upheld by Bowen, LJ in re Swire; Mellor v Swire,[1194] subject to the only limitation that the amendment can be made without injustice or on terms which preclude injustice, Lindley, LJ observed that if the order of the court, though drawn up, did not express the order as intended to be made then "there is no such magic in passing and entering an order as to deprive the court of jurisdiction to make its own records true, and if an order as passed and entered does not express the real order of the court, it would, as it appears to me, be shocking to say that the party aggrieved cannot come here to have the record set right, but must go to the House of Lords by way of appeal".

In such a situation, the order of the trial court drawing up the decree was set aside by the Supreme Court and the parties were allowed liberty of moving the high court under section 152 seeking appropriate rectification in the judgment of the high court so as to clearly specify the extent and manner of reliefs to which in the opinion of the high court, the successful party was found entitled consistently with the intention expressed in the judgment. Once the operative part of the judgment is rectified there would be no difficulty in drawing up a decree by the high court itself in conformity with the operative part of the judgment.[1195]

[s 152.7] Inherent Power to Amend Decrees and Orders

Every court has an inherent power to vary or amend its own decree or order so as to carry out its own meaning. In so doing, it does nothing but exercise a power to correct a mistake of its ministerial officer by whom the decree or order was drawn up;[1196] it only insists that the decree drawn up in the office of the court should correctly express the judgment given by the court.[1197] The basis of this power is the principle that no party should suffer any detriment on account of a mistake or an error committed by the adjudicating authority.[1198] "It would be perfectly shocking if the court could not rectify an error which is really the error of its own minister";[1199] Lord Penzance said in Lawrie v Lees.[1200] Furthermore, it was observed:

> I cannot doubt that under the original powers of the court independent of any order that is made under the Judicature Act, every court has the power to vary its own orders which are drawn up mechanically in the registry or in the office of the court, to vary them in such a way as to carry out its own meaning, and where language has been used which is doubtful, to make it plain. I think that power is inherent in every court.

In Hatton v Harris[1201] Lord Watson said:

> When an error of that kind has been committed, it is always within the competence of the court, if nothing has intervened which would render it inexpedient or inequitable to do so, to correct the record in order to bring it into harmony with the order which the Judge obviously meant to pronounce.

A decree has been defined in section 2 as the formal expression of an adjudication which completely determines the rights of the parties with regard to the matters in controversy in a suit. Order XX, rule 6 provides that a decree shall be in conformity with the judgment. Where a decree is at variance with the judgment, the court has power to set right the decree and to bring it into conformity with the judgment.[1202] If judgment and decree shows some typographical errors and these are not legal errors which can modify judgment so as to require review of judgment and decree the court has inherent power under sections 151 and 152 to correct such errors or mistakes which crept in through inadvertence and which were only clerical in nature.[1203] This is so even where the decree has been executed and satisfied, provided, of course, neither an innocent third party has acquired any right under the erroneous decree nor any principle of equity is offended. Where the decree is fully satisfied the court may be functus officio as regards execution but not as regards the power of correction.[1204]

(i) A sues B for Rs 5000 and interest. The judgment is for Rs 4000 without more. The decree is drawn up in accordance with the judgment. A, then applies to amend the decree by adding an order for payment of interest. The application must be refused, for, the decree is not at variance with the judgment. If A is aggrieved by the decree, the proper course for him is to apply for a review of judgment or to appeal from the decree.[1205]

(ii) A and B enter into an agreement for partition of certain properties. B fails to convey to A, the properties of A's share. A sues B for specific performance of the agreement and a decree is passed declaring only that "A is entitled to specific performance of the agreement." The usual form is to declare that "the agreement ought to be specifically performed, and the court does order and decree that the same be specifically performed (ie, both, by A and B)." The decree may be amended so as to put it in the usual form. Karim Mahomed v Rajooma. In a case, the amendment was necessary, for the decree as drawn up did not contain any direction to A to convey to B the properties of B's share, but declared only that A was entitled to specific performance.[1206]

(iii) A sues B and C for Rs 5000. The judgment awards Rs 5000 to A "as prayed" (ie, as against B and C). The decree is drawn up so as to render the amount payable by B alone. The decree may be amended and brought into conformity with the judgment.[1207]

[s 152.8] Application for Amendment not a Continuation of the Suit

An amendment petition is not a continuation of the suit or proceedings in which it is made but an independent proceeding governed by the law then in force.[1208]

[s 152.9] Accidental Omission

This section enables the court to correct errors arising from an accidental omission.[1209] Thus, where directions as to costs were inadvertently omitted,[1210] or where the directions as to mesne profits were accidentally omitted,[1211] the decree was set right by adding the directions. Where an omission to provide for costs is due to an accidental slip, it has been held that the only remedy open to the party is to move for amendment and not appeal.[1212] Further, no court can grant a relief which is not claimed and the act of a court shall prejudice no man, hence, where the decree grants more amount than claimed in the suit, the same can be rectified by an application under section 152.[1213] Similarly, where the date from which payment ordered to be made were to run was inadvertently omitted; the decree was perfected by adding the date.[1214] Where a mortgage decree did not specify the mortgaged properties, the omission could be rectified under this section.[1215] Likewise, an omission to calculate the actual area of land of which the decree directed possession or its erroneous calculation can be rectified under this section.[1216] So also, an omission in a decree for redemption to provide for interest from the date fixed for redemption.[1217] There was omission by the trial judge to fix the time for depositing money under a pre-emption decree. Application for rectification was made, but rejected. It was held that the trial court was wrong in not exercising its undoubted jurisdiction under section 152 of the CPC. In this case, both the appeals filed were still pending in the court of the Additional District Judge. It was directed that the first appellate court shall fix a date for depositing the pre-emption amount by the petitioner and necessary rectification shall also be made in the decree awarded by the trial court in this respect.[1218] Where a decree for specific performance omitted to give a direction for possession being given of the properties, it was held that this omission can be made good under this section.[1219] When the decree did not contain the order contemplated by O XX, rule 12, clause 1(i), it could be inserted by an amendment under this section.[1220] When the defendant company went into liquidation, pending the suit, but consequential amendments had not been carried out in the decrees, it was held that that could be done on an application under this section.[1221] But where the objection was that the court omitted to consider the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution, it was held that it did not fall within this section.[1222]

Sections 151–53 do not authorise the correction of a judgment, alleged to be wrong on the merits. The proper remedy in such cases is appeal.[1223] In a Patna case, one plaintiff died during the pendency of the suit. Application for substitution of heir was made and noticed by the court. However, through inadvertence, no formal order was passed. It was held that the mistake in the decree (under the old name) could be corrected under sections 151 and 152.[1224] There was omission by the trial judge to fix the time for depositing money under a pre-emption decree. Application for rectification was made, but rejected. It was held that the trial court was wrong in not exercising its undoubted jurisdiction under section 152 of the CPC. In this case, both the appeals filed were still pending in the court of the Additional District Judge. It was directed that the first appellate court shall fix a date for depositing the pre-emption amount by the petitioner and necessary rectification shall also be made in the decree awarded by the trial court. in this respect.[1225]

The power under section 152 is confined only to the kind of mistakes, errors, slips or omissions mentioned therein. If the decree or order is sought to be varied in any other manner, it can be done only by review under O XLVII or appeal.[1226]

[s 152.10] Accidental Slip

The court has power under this section to correct accidental slips.[1227] The expression "accidental" means, any happening by chance or unexpectedly taking place, not according to the usual course of things, unintentional, something unforeseen and unexpected and casual. Further an effect is said to be accidental when the act by which it is caused is not done with intention of causing it and when its occurrence, as a consequence of such act, is not so probable that a person of ordinary prudence ought, under the circumstances in which it is done, to take reasonable precautions against it. Therefore, the expression "accidental" cannot be equated to the expression "negligence" or "willful negligence" on the part of a party.[1228] The test to determine whether the slip or omission is accidental or not, can be gathered from the intention of the judge in preparing the judgment or order. If on a cursory reading of the judgment, one find that the grant of a specific relief is writ large, the omission thereof in the decree sheet would obviously be an accidental omission falling within the four corners of section 152.[1229] An error in the sense of mistaken identity of a property and not a mere misdescription thereof, is not an accidental slip and cannot be corrected under this section.[1230] The test is "Does the decree as drafted represent the intentions of the Judge?"[1231] The word "accidental" qualifies omission also, so that the section can only be resorted to rectify omissions which are accidental.[1232] Where the trial judge omitted to fix the time for depositing the money, and an application is made for rectification, he cannot reject the application on the ground of want of jurisdiction.[1233] This section cannot be used to correct an omission which is intentional, however, erroneous. Thus, where the court failed to give a direction in terms of section 36, clause 2(e) of the Bengal Money Lenders Act, 1946, and it could not be said that it was not conscious of the consequences of the omission; the decree could not be amended under this section.[1234] Where a title suit and an appeal therefrom were dismissed with costs and costs were determined on the valuation of the suit, given by the plaintiff himself, the court refused to exercise its power of correction as the mistake was not an accidental slip or omission.[1235] But every mistake made by a court cannot be assumed to be on account of accidental slip.[1236] The court can exercise the power even in cases where the mistake could be corrected in appeal for the object of the section is to provide a speedy and inexpensive relief,[1237] and when a court erroneously dismissed an execution application as time barred, omitting to notice that the last day of presentation was a Sunday, the court had power to readmit the application.[1238] A bona fide error as to the amount of interest due to the defendant may be corrected under this section.[1239] In a case where the pre-emption decree through an accidental slip set out the pre-emption amount as Rs 16,770 instead of Rs 16,730 and execution thereof was dismissed on the ground that full pre-emption amount was not paid, the court held that the remedy of the plaintiff was by way of an application under this section and not an appeal against dismissal of execution.[1240] Where a decree passed by a single judge of the high court contained a patent error of including interest on future salary and that error was not pointed out by counsel to the Division Bench in appeal, the high court held that such an error could be corrected later on, under this section and not in review.[1241] Similarly, an error as to pleader's fee can be amended under this section.[1242] But where the judgment had fixed the pleader's fee and that was incorporated in the decree, the court cannot, thereafter, amend it on the ground that the amount fixed is wrong.[1243] An omission to provide for mesne profits in a decree in a title suit is not an error which can be corrected under this section.[1244] And so also, an error as to the period for which an injunction is to continue.[1245] It is not an accidental slip or error, merely because two of the three guarantors are exonerated from the suit liability while the third one, who remained ex parte was not.[1246] Where, in a suit for redemption, the plaintiff asked for possession n of item 2 but the decree mentioned by mistake item 1, it could be corrected under this section.[1247] Where, as a result of a clerical or arithmetic mistake in the plaint, the same mistake has crept in the decree, such mistake can be rectified even after a final decree has been passed.[1248] Misdescription of a property in a decree where its identity is not in dispute can be corrected under this section.[1249]

Suit was filed for injunction against the defendants in representative capacity, for restraining them from trespassing upon the management of a private temple belonging to the plaintiff. Judgment and decree did not specify that it was against the defendants in their representative capacity (owing to a clerical mistake). Amendment of the decree was sought, without seeking amendment of the judgment. It was held that even if the judgment did not specify that the suit was decreed against the defendants in a representative capacity, the effect of O I, rule 8(6) would be, that it was binding on all persons for whose benefit the suit was defended. The omission arising from clerical mistake could be corrected under section 152. Further, the pendency of appeal would not, in any way, disentitle the trial court to amend the decree to make it in conformity with the judgment.[1250]

[s 152.11] May

As to this word, the High Court of Calcutta said:

> The word "may" in the section does not make it discretionary with the court to order the correction but merely enlarges the power of the court by providing that such correction can be done at any time, or, in other words, the section simply emphasises that no lapse of time would disentitle the court to make the correction.[1251]

According to the Gauhati High Court, if the court finds an error of the type mentioned in section 152, it is the imperative duty of the court to correct the error forthwith.[1252] The correct view, it is submitted, is the one taken by the High Court of Allahabad, and the Chief Court of Oudh, namely, that under this section, "there is no right in any party, to have a clerical or arithmetical mistake corrected. The matter is left to the discretion of the court and the discretion has to be exercised in view of the peculiar facts of each case".[1253] Even if all the conditions laid down in this section are satisfied, the court may not order correction in some cases.[1254] In later cases, the Calcutta High Court has adopted this view, for, it refused to allow an amendment when the applicant had been guilty of laches and delay.[1255] Again, Rankin, CJ said that in dealing with applications for amendment, courts should bear in mind that under Article 182 of the Limitation Act, [now Article 136 of the Act of 1963], the amendment has the consequence of extending time for execution.[1256]

[s 152.12] At Any Time

There is no dispute as to the fact that there is no prescribed period of limitation for filing an application under section 152.[1257]

A decree may be amended under this section at any time, although the time for appealing from the decree has expired.[1258] There is no limitation for an application to amend the decree.[1259] Under the corresponding English rule, an error in a decree was in one case amended after 39 years,[1260] and in other cases after 19 years[1261] and 10 years.[1262] In a Bombay case, an application was made to the high court to rectify a decree in the exercise of its inherent powers, 10 years after the date of the decree, and the application was allowed.[1263] In a Patna case, the decree was rectified under this section even after execution[1264] and even after sale had been confirmed and sale certificate issued and satisfaction of the decree entered.[1265] But no amendment should be allowed by the court either under this section or in the exercise of its inherent powers, if it is inexpedient or inequitable to do so, as where third parties have acquired rights under the erroneous decree without the knowledge of the circumstances which would tend to show that the decree was erroneous[1266] or when it would be inequitable and unfair to one of the parties.[1267] Further, laches may, in the particular circumstances of a case, disentitle a party to relief under this section.[1268]

Application for rectifying a mistake in a judgment delivered 13 years ago would not be entertained, particularly where the file had been destroyed. The alleged mistake in this case related to reproduction of the statement of the applicant in the judgment.[1269]

However, section 152 does not fix any time limit for incorporating amendment in the judgment and decree. Clerical and arithmetical error in the judgment and decree can be corrected even during the pendency of appeal.[1270]

[s 152.13] Amendment and its Effect on Limitation

If limitation is under the residuary Article 181 [now Article 137 of the Act of 1963], the amendment of the decree does not furnish a fresh starting point for limitation.[1271] If Article

182 [now Article 136 of 1963 Act] applies, clause 4 of that article enacts that limitation for execution runs from the date of the amendment. The amendment of the decree does not, however, extend the time for appealing, though in such a case recourse might be had to section 5 of the Limitation Act.[1272] The Madhya Pradesh High Court has, however, said that if the correction is a substantial one, the right of appeal against the amended decree would be from the date of such amendment, and has added that in any case the appellant can invoke section 5 of the Limitation Act.[1273] Entry under Land Ceiling Act showed wrong land survey number and was corrected subsequently. Original order was not replaced or superseded, nor the same was materially altered. It was held that limitation commenced from the date of original order and not when clerical error was rectified.[1274]

[s 152.14] Parties to the Application

A person, not a party to the proceedings and to the decree, cannot apply for amendment under this section.[1275] An application by a party to a partition suit for amending the decree which had been passed therein by inclusion of new items of properties in the possession of persons not parties to the suit, is not maintainable under this section.[1276]

[s 152.15] By which Court Amendment Could be Made

Even if the jurisdiction of the trial court, to make such correction under section 152, is available after the decree is affirmed by the appellate court by reason of section 153-A, it is confined only to the scope and ambit within the confines of section 152.[1277]

The court to amend a decree is the court that passed it. Where an appeal is preferred from a decree of a court of first instance the appellate court may—

(a) dismiss the appeal under O XLI, rule 11(1), without issuing any notice to the respondents; or it may

(b) confirm, reverse or vary the decree of the court of first instance [O XLI, rule 32].

In case (a), it has been held by the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras, Allahabad and Rangoon, that it is the appellate court alone that can amend the decree.[1278] On the other hand, it has been held by the Bombay and Patna High Courts that it is the court of the first instance, and not the appellate court, that can amend the decree, the reason given being that a dismissal under O XLI, rule 11 leaves the decree of the lower court untouched.[1279] Parliament has now, by enacting, section 153A resolved this controversy by accepting the Bombay and Patna view. See notes to section 36 above.

In case (b), the appellate court alone can amend the decree.[1280] The view taken in Gowrishankar v Umraochand[1281] that where the appeal is dismissed as barred by limitation, it is lower court that can amend the decree does not appear to be sound. But in a case where the district dourt amended a decree after it had been confirmed on appeal, the high court, in revision made the same amendment suo motu.[1282] In another case, it was held that court of first instance has power to amend a merely clerical or arithmetical mistake.[1283] On appeal, the decree under appeal merges in the decree passed on appeal. Thereafter, only the appellate court can correct or amend the decree.[1284] Suit was decreed by the appeal court, which reversed the decree of dismissal passed by the trial court. But the decree of appeal court was not in conformity with the judgment of the appellate court. It was held that amendment of the decree could be ordered by the appellate court and not by the trial court;[1285] Hussain Sab v Sitarani[1286] followed. In a money decree inaccuracy in calculation and accounting made by trial court, noticed in appeal, should be corrected by appellate court notwithstanding that no cross objection is filed by the other party.[1287]

The Calcutta High Court has allowed an amendment of a clerical error in its decree after the decree had been affirmed by the Privy Council.[1288] Under sections 151, 152 and 153, the executing court has jurisdiction and power to correct its own mistake, if it is factually found that there was a mistake in any order made by it. The court is bound to correct its own mistake when once the same is brought to its notice and it would be failing in its duty, if it does not do so and sticks to its previous order, as if it is infallible.[1289]

The court which passed the decree, has power to amend it even after an appeal is filed; it is only when the appellate court passes a decree which supersedes the decree of the trial court, that its power to amend ceases.[1290] When the decree of the trial court merges in the decree passed by the high court, it is the high court alone which has the power to rectify mistakes.[1291] This is in accordance with the principle that it is the court which commits the mistake which must remedy its error. Where the decree had, by mistake, provided for the ascertainment of "mesne profits" instead of "net profits" it was held by the Supreme Court that the high court could amend the decree even though an appeal against the decision has been admitted by the Supreme Court.[1292]

In a partition suit preliminary decree had been passed. The matter went up to the Supreme Court. When a mistake was detected in the description of the property, an application under section 152 of the Code was filed for correcting the mistake. It was argued that since the decree of the trial court merged with the decree of the appellate court, the trial court had no authority to correct the mistake in the preliminary. However, the proceedings for final decree was pending before the trial court. It was held that the trial court can exercise powers under section 152 of the Code.[1293]

A full Bench of the Kerala High Court has further clarified the issue by holding that even where the first and the second appellate court merely discussed the appeal confirming the decree of the trial court, it is the second appellate court which has jurisdiction to allow such amendment.[1294]

In an eviction suit, where the second appeal by landlord was allowed granting six month's time to tenant to vacate the premises and the review application of the tenant was dismissed for default, it was held that the tenant's application for amendment of judgment in second appeal was not maintainable.[1295]

In a partition suit where the shares allotted to respective parties while drafting the judgment were altered due to mistake committed by the office. It was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that the court does not become functus officio and to meet the ends of justice, the court which passed the judgment can amend the said decree.[1296]

When an appeal is withdrawn, the decree of the lower court is left intact and that court alone has power to amend.[1297] Where an appeal is rejected for non-payment of court fees the trial court has jurisdiction to amend the decree.[1298]

An arithmetical error in the decree of the lower court repeated in a confirming decree of the appellate court, may, it is submitted, be corrected by the appellate court.

Where an application for revision of a decree of a provincial small cause court is rejected by the high court in limine, the proper court to amend the decree is the small cause court, and not the high court.[1299]

The court to which a decree is transferred for execution cannot correct an error therein relating to the identity of the judgment-debtor.[1300]

[s 152.16] Revision

A decision under this section granting an application for amendment, is an order and not a decree. The decision may, therefore, be the subject of revision under section 115, but it cannot be the subject of an appeal.[1301] It has been so held by the High Courts of Calcutta, Allahabad and Bombay in cases under the corresponding section 206 of the Code of 1882. A different view has been taken by the High Court of Madras. According to that court, where a decree is amended, the aggrieved party has the right to appeal from the decree as amended. Hence, if no appeal is preferred within the period of limitation, he cannot afterwards apply for a revision of the order allowing the amendment.[1302] It has been held by the Kerala High Court that a revision lies against an order for amendment, even though an appeal lies against the amended decree.[1303]

Where a case is one of "accidental slip" within the meaning of this section but the court which passed the decree refuses to amend it on the ground that the case does not fall under this section, the refusal amounts to a failure to exercise a jurisdiction vested in the court, within the meaning of section 115, and the high court has power to interfere in revision.[1304] Similarly, where the lower court amends a decree in a case in which, according to its own view, the amendment should be refused stating as a reason for the amendment that it was bound under this section to bring the decree into conformity with the judgment, the high court is entitled to interfere in revision under section 115(c) of the Code.[1305]

These decisions must, now, be read in the light of the amended section 115 (see commentary under section 115).

[s 152.17] Amendment: When to be Refused

A mere perusal of section 152 makes it clear that section 152 can be invoked for the limited purposes of correcting clerical errors or arithmetical mistakes in the judgment. The same cannot be invoked for claiming a substantive relief which was not granted under the decree, or as a pretext to get the order which has attained finality, reviewed.[1306]

Section 152 provides for correction of clerical or arithmetical mistakes in judgments, decrees or orders or errors arising therein from any accidental slip or omission. The exercise of this power contemplates the correction of mistakes by the court of its ministerial actions and does not contemplate of passing effective judicial orders after the judgment, decree or order. The settled position of law is that after the passing of the judgment, decree or order, the same becomes final subject to any further avenues of remedies provided in respect of the same and the very court or the tribunal cannot, on mere change of view, vary the terms of the judgments, decrees and orders earlier passed except by means of review, if statutorily provided specifically therefor and subject to the conditions or limitations provided therein. The powers under section 152 are neither to be equated with the power of review nor can be said to be akin to review or even said to clothe the court concerned, under the guise of invoking after the result of the judgment earlier rendered, in its entirety or any portion or part of it. The corrections contemplated are of correcting only accidental omissions or mistakes and not all omissions and mistakes which might have been committed by the court while passing the judgment, decree or order. The omission sought to be corrected which goes to the merits of the case is beyond the scope of section 152 as if it is looking into it for the first time, for which the proper remedy for the aggrieved party if at all is to file appeal or revision before the higher forum or review application before the very forum, subject to the limitations in respect of such review. It implies that the section cannot be pressed into service to correct an omission, which is intentional, however erroneous that may be. It has been noticed that the courts below have been liberally construing and applying the provisions of sections 151 and 152 of the CPC even after passing of effective orders in the lis pending before them.[1307]

Where the application for correction of decree was rejected till the stage of appeal, it was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that the rejection of the application of petitioner for correction of decree by the executing court was proper.[1308]

For correcting clerical or typographical error in decree, the condition precedent is that the error must have occurred on the part of the court. If the error occurs on the part of a party, resort to section 152 is not permissible. Thus, where rectification in a compromise decree was sought, the remedy is not under section 152 but through a declaration by a civil court.[1309]

Where the order, as drawn up, represents the real decision of the court, the court has no jurisdiction to rehear or alter it.[1310] "Even when an order has been obtained by fraud... the court has no jurisdiction to rehear it. If such a jurisdiction existed, it would be most mischievous".[1311] The Supreme Court has, however, disagreed on the point.[1312] Where there is no mistake or slip in the decree or order, it cannot be amended under this section, the proper remedy of the party being either to apply for review or to appeal.[1313] Where a decree is drafted not providing any interest prior to institution of suit. It is not a ground for amendment of decree.[1314]

[s 152.18] Consent Decree

Where a decree founded on a compromise does not embody the true terms of the compromise, the only remedy is by an independent suit to set aside the decree either on the ground of mistake, or fraud, or some other ground ejusdem generis with it.[1315] But if the mistake is merely clerical or arithmetical, it can be amended under this section.[1316] See note to section 96: "Procedure for setting aside consent-decrees".

[s 152.19] Amendment of a Decree Which is a Nullity

Where a decree passed is without jurisdiction and is null and void, the defect cannot be cured by an amendment.[1317]

Non-incorporation of the relief of mesne profits in judgment and decree is not an accidental omission. Yet an order granting such relief cannot be termed as nullity as the same was not wholly without jurisdiction. To avoid such an order, it is necessary to get it set aside. Thus, in a case where the appellants having accepted the validity of the order adding the relief of mense profits in judgment and decree, waived their right to challenge it, the same cannot be challenged in the appeal against the order fixing the amount of mense profits.[1318]

[s 152.20] Defect in Court Record as to Identity of Immovable Property

When the suit as to immovable property has been decreed and the property is not definitely identified, the defect in the court record caused by overlooking of provisions contained in O VII, rule 3 and O XX, rule 3 of the CPC is capable of being cured. After all a successful plaintiff should not be deprived of the fruits of decree. Resort can be had to section 152 or section 47 of the CPC depending on the facts and circumstances of each case, which ever of the two provisions would be more appropriate, just and convenient to invoke. Being an inadvertent error, not affecting the merits of the case, it may be corrected under section 152 by the court which passed the decree by supplying the omission. Alternatively, the exact description of decretal property may be ascertained by the executing court as a question relating to execution, discharge or satisfaction of decree within the meaning of section 47. A decree of a competent court should not, as far as practicable, be allowed to be defeated on account of an accidental slip or omission.[1319]

It has been held by the Supreme Court that where the statements in the body of the plaint sufficiently described the suit property, correction of schedule of the suit property in the decree accordingly by the executing Court is proper and no interference is called for.[1320]

Speaking for the Bench in the above case, Sinha J observed as follows:

> Code of Civil Procedure recognises the inherent power of the Court. It is not only confined to the amendment of the judgment or decree as envisaged under Section 152 of the Code but also inherent power in general. The Courts also have duty to see that the records are true and present the correct state of affair. There cannot, however, be any doubt whatsoever that the Court cannot exercise the said jurisdiction so as to review its judgment. It cannot also exercise its jurisdiction when no mistake or slip occurred in the decree or order. This provision, in our opinion, should however, not be construed in a pedantic manner. A decree may, therefore, be corrected by the court both in exercise of its power under section 152 as also under Section 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Such a power of the Court is well recognised.[1321]

In another case, the Supreme Court held that in case of a genuine and bona fide mistake regarding khasra number of the suit property in decree, direction can be given by the court for correction of the mistake in order to cut short litigation.[1322] A suit for partition was decreed and after passing of decree amendment of the decree was sought seeking change in the survey number of suit property. The said amendment was objected to by purchasers pendente lite. The Supreme Court held that none of the party claimed that the survey number as originally stated was a joint family property which could be subject matter of partition suit and therefore it is not a case of substitution of the property. As such the order allowing amendment of decree cannot be interfered with.[1323]

Where the decree in an eviction suit overlooked to mention the description of the suit premises by reference to its boundaries, although the same was mentioned in the body of the judgment, it was held by the Jharkhand High Court that the same can be rectified by the Executing Court under section 152 of the Code.[1324] Explaining the principle, DGR Patnaik J observed in the above case as follows:

> It may be noted that under the provisions of order 20 Rule 6 CPC, decree has to be prepared in consonance with the judgment and it has to contain all the necessary particulars, as required in the Rule. Rule 9 of Order 20 CPC, lays down that where the decree is for recovery of immovable property, it shall contain the description of such property sufficient to identify the same and where such property can be identified by boundaries or by its number in the Record of Settlement or Survey the decree shall specify such boundary or number. In the present case, as it appears, the decree has overlooked to mention the description of the suit premises by reference to its boundaries and other particulars, though mentioned in the body of the judgment. This being apparently an accidental omission, it was certainly within the competence and jurisdiction of the Executing Court, under the provisions of Section 152 CPC, to rectify such error in the decree by adding the description of the suit premises by reference to its boundary, as mentioned in the body of the judgment.[1325]

When even the defendants were aware all along about the correct survey number of the property in respect of which decree was prayed for by the original plaintiff, even the defendants were aware about the description of the property in respect of which decree was being prayed for and passed, it appears that there is accidental error and/or slip in describing the survey number in the suit, the said error ought to have been permitted to be corrected by the learned trial judge by exercising powers under section 152 read with sections 151 and 153 of the said CPC. Merely because the petitioners have purported to apply only under section 152 of the CPC, relief cannot be denied to the petitioners.[1326]

[s 152.21] Amendment Without Notice

An order amending the decree without notice to the party affected is a nullity, an execution proceeding taken pursuant thereto must be treated as void.[1327]

[s 152.22] Successive Applications for Amendment: Res Judicata

In the order passed by the executing court, the view taken was that the executing court had no jurisdiction to review the finding recorded in the judgment and decree and it also held that the executing court was duty-bound to pass final decree in accordance with the preliminary decree drawn in that case which was to the effect that each of the plaintiff-petitioner, defendant-respondent and defendant-petitioner were entitled to one-third share. Therefore, it was held that the executing court had no jurisdiction to modify the decree. It is, thus, clear that the principle of res judicata would not have any application in the afore-mentioned situation.[1328]

Where in an eviction suit the trial court had no jurisdiction to entertain an application under section 152 of the Code, because the decree having been merged with the decree of the first appellate court and the high court, the rejection of the application for correction of decree would not operate as res judicata for filing a fresh application before the high court.[1329]

Where the plaintiff in a suit had not claimed the relief of mesne profits in the plaint, but sought to add the said relief in the plaint by way of amendment which was not allowed, it cannot be said that the relief was refused by the court. It was held by the Patna High Court that the petition for amendment of the judgment can be said to be barred under Explanation (v) of section 11 of the Code.[1330]

See notes to section 11, "Application for amendment of decree", above.

[s 152.23] Omission in Granting Interest

The omission in not granting the pendente lite interest could not be held to be accidental omission or mistake and therefore, neither the trial court nor the appellate court has power to award pendente lite interest under section 152 of the CPC.[1331] No court can, under the cover of sections 151 and 152 of the CPC, modify, alter or add to the terms of its original judgment, decree or order. If the trial court had specifically held the respondent liable to pay future interest only, despite the prayer of the appellant for grant of interest with effect from the date of alleged breach, which impliedly meant that the court had rejected the claim of the appellant in so far as pendente lite interest was concerned, the omission, in not granting the pendente lite interest, could not be held to be accidental omission or mistake, as done by the trial court, and hence the high court was justified in setting aside that order.[1332]

However, the position would be different where the judgment of a court provides for pendente lite interest and decree and omits to mention such interest. Such a mistake could be corrected under section 152. The correct position of law is that a decree cannot add or subtract any relief except what has been provided in the judgment.[1333]

[s 152.24] Proceedings Under the Land Acquisition Act

The identification of the land is not a clerical or arithmetical mistake within the meaning of section 13A of Land Acquisition Act, 1894, and section 152 of the CPC.[1334] The courts would not be justified in permitting payment of deficit court fees after a gap of six years and granting the enhanced compensation under the Land Acquisition Act by amending the judgment and decree.[1335] The civil court has the power under sections 151–53 to indicate the Khasra number omitted by collector in his statement and directing that the collector to file a revised statement under section 19 of the Land Acquisition Act giving details of the entire land.[1336]

In a case under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 a reference was made under the Act for enhancement of the compensation. In the claim for compensation of the acquired land and trees, the claimant for the first time claimed enhancement of the number of trees on the ground that there was typographical mistake. The claim for enhancement of the number of trees was rejected but in revision the high court allowed the same. It was held by the Supreme Court that the order of the high court in revision was not legal as appeals by both parties in respect of compensation were pending before the high court. Moreover, the case of the claimant was based on the alleged variance between the judgment of court and the decree, which variation was not apparent on perusal of the judgment and the decree.[1337]

An award and decree having become final under the Land Acquisition Act cannot be amended or altered seeking enhancement of the statutory benefits under the amended provisions brought in by the Amendment in the Act by filing petitions under sections 151 and 152 of the CPC.[1338]

[s 152.25] Appeal

No appeal lies from an order directing an amendment either under the Code[1339] or under the Charter.[1340] In a case, however, where the whole method of calculation adopted by the first court was challenged in the plaintiff's application, which purported to be an application under section 152, and the first court allowed the amendment, it was held that the order allowing the amendment must be regarded as one made under O XLVII, and the order was, therefore, appealable.[1341]

It has been held by the High Courts of Madras and Lahore that though no appeal lies from an order of amendment, an appeal would lie from the amended decree.[1342]

Where the order fixing the quantum of mesne profit was challenged in second appeal, but no perversity was noticed in the order, it was held by the Patna High Court that the court is not entitled to interfere with the concurrent findings of the court below. Adverse findings recorded against the plaintiff while deciding the substantial questions of law and while interpreting the scope of section 152 of the Code, do not affect the merit of the case. It was held that on that basis the findings of the court below on the point of quantum of mesne profits cannot be challenged.[1343]

Where correct khasra number of land and extent of the property belonging to the claimant was not mentioned in the land reference under Land Acquisition Act by mistake of the counsel and the mistake was perpetuated while passing the award, it was held by the Punjab and Haryana High Court that the mistake can be corrected by way of filing an application under sections 151, 152 and 153 of the Code.[1344]

[S 153] General power to amend.—The Court may at any time, and on such terms as to costs or otherwise as it may think fit, amend any defect or error in any proceeding in a suit; and all necessary amendments shall be made for the purpose of determining the real question or issue raised by depending on such proceeding.

[s 153.1] Corresponding Provision

This section was taken from O XXVIII, rule 12 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of England. The only difference is that the words "in a suit" after the words "proceeding" do not occur in the England rule.

[s 153.2] Scope of the Section

Order VI, rule 17 is confined to amendments of "pleadings"; and section 152 to correcting errors in "judgments, decrees or orders". The present section confers a general power on the court to amend defects and errors in "any proceeding in a suit" and to make "all necessary amendments" for the purpose of determining the real question at issue between the parties to the suit. The section was referred to in a case where an incorrect description of a property in a mortgage deed was repeated in the plaint, judgment and decree and the court allowed an amendment of the decree and connected proceedings.[1345] This power is vested in the original as well as the appellate court.[1346] Where an appellant desires to implead the legal representative of a respondent who was dead at the time of filing the appeal, the appellate court can permit him to amend the appeal. But, as regards limitation, the appeal (as against the parties) will be deemed to have been filed on the date of the application. Appellate Court will decide:

(a) whether the appeal is within time; and

(b) whether the delay, if any, should be condoned.[1347]

In Australian Steam Navigation Co v Smith & Sons,[1348] Their Lordships of the Privy Council said:

> Their Lordships are strong advocates for amendment whenever it can be done without injustice to the other side, and even where they have been put to certain expense and delay, yet if they can be compensated for that in any way it seems to their Lordships that an amendment ought to be allowed for the purpose of raising the real question between the parties.

An omission of the Vakil's name in the Vakalatnama can be supplemented under this section,[1349] as also an incorrect description of the plaintiff in a plaint.[1350] An ambiguity in a direction given in the decree as to the procedure to be adopted by the parties, can be clarified under this section.[1351] When a petition to bring the legal representatives of a deceased party on record had remained undisposed of and the decree had been drafted without adverting to it, it can be amended so as to substitute them in the record.[1352] If an appeal is presented against a person, who is dead at the date of the presentation, under section 153 of the CPC, permit the appellant to amend the cause title by filing appropriate petition.[1353] Where a suit had been instituted in the name of a foreign firm, the court can permit an amendment of the cause title by substituting the names of the partners for that of the firm.[1354] An amendment of the pleadings can be allowed under this section, even though a preliminary decree has been passed.[1355] An application was filed by the claimant under sections 151 and 153 of the CPC indicating the Khasra Nos omitted by the collector in his statement, and praying that the collector be directed to file a revised statement under section 19 of Land Acquisition Act, 1884. The Additional District Judge allowed the application, whose order was also upheld by the Supreme Court.[1356]

But the power of correction is circumscribed by the condition that it can be used only for determining the real question in controversy between the parties. There is no power, therefore, to allow a plaint to be so amended as to include a cause of action which had not accrued at the date of the institution of the suit.[1357] For the same reason, an application to amend the title of the memo of first appeal to strike out therefrom the name of the deceased plaintiff, was held to be not maintainable since it was made at the stage when the second appeal was closed for judgment.[1358] An application under sections 149, 152, 153 read with section 151 of the CPC was moved for seeking permission to make good the deficiency in the court fees, after a lapse of six years and granting the enhanced compensation by amending the judgement and decree, the application was rejected by the high court and the same was confirmed by the Hon"ble Supreme Court on the ground that to permit payment of deficit court fees for recovering enhanced compensation after a lapse of almost six years, under its inherent jurisdiction would encourage the practice of not paying the court fees in the hope that, as and when the valuation is determined in appeal, the jurisdiction of the court can be invoked under section 151 of the Code and the benefit of enhanced compensation can be reaped by making good the deficit court fees.[1359] An application for amendment of objections filed under section 33 of Arbitration Act, 1940, to incorporate certain grounds to challenge the validity of award is not maintainable.[1360] The question before the Supreme Court was what is the legal remedy when a party to a judgement or order of court later discover that it was obtained by fraud. It was held that the remedy to move for recalling of an order on the basis of a newly discovered fact under sections 151, 152 and 153 of CPC, like, where it amounts to fraud of high decree, cannot be foreclosed in a situation. No court or tribunal can be regarded as powerless to recall its own order, if it is convinced that the order was wangled through fraud or misrepresentation of such a dimension as it would effect the very basis of the claim.[1361]

The Gauhati High Court has held that amendment of pleadings which are barred in view of the proviso to O VI, rule 17 of the Code, can be allowed under section 153 for bana fide reasons provided the same is necessary for determining the real issues involved and the party seeking amendment is not trying to stall the proceedings. Thus, where in a suit for declaration

[s 153.3] Any Proceeding in a Suit

The following are some of the cases under the corresponding English rule and the present rule:

[s 153.3.1] Answers to Interrogatories

Where it was admitted by the defendant, a solicitor, in answer to interrogatories that his partner had paid into the banking account of the firm money received by the latter for investment, the defendant was allowed to amend the answer, it being shown that the admission had been made by mistake.[1363] In another case, where the defendant charged the plaintiff (his manager) with misconduct, and the plaintiff exhibited interrogatories of which the substance was to ask the defendant to specify the acts of misconduct on which he relied, it was said by Thesiger LJ that if the defendant answered the interrogatories, and it was subsequently discovered by him that there were other acts of misconduct on which he could rely, there was nothing to prevent his being allowed to amend his answers to the interrogatories.[1364] See as to interrogatories O XI, rule 111, below.

[s 153.3.2] Particulars

An application to amend particulars, if made a reasonable time before the trial, will generally be allowed on terms.[1365] But leave to amend particulars, when it is applied for at the trial, will as a rule be refused.[1366]

[s 153.3.3] Notice of Motion

A notice of motion in an action for the rescission of an agreement for the sale of land was allowed to be amended at the hearing by asking for the appointment of a receiver.[1367]

[s 153.4] Proceedings Against a Dead Person

Where a suit is filed against a dead person, the plaint can be amended by substituting the legal representatives of the deceased defendant but the suit must be treated as instituted on the date of the application for amendment.[1368] Likewise, if an appeal is presented against a person who is dead on the date of the presentation, the court may, under this section, permit the title of the appeal to be amended.[1369] But if, on the date of the application, the period of limitation for filing the appeal, or for bringing the legal representatives on record has expired, then the delay will have to be excused before the appeal can be admitted.[1370] That is also the position when a revision petition is filed against a dead person.[1371] An appeal, which is presented in the name of an appellant who is dead at the date of the presentation, is itself incompetent. In such cases, the memorandum itself would be non-existent in law and cannot be amended.[1372]

[s 153.5] Pauper Application

The court can allow the amendment of technical defects in an application for leave to appeal in forma pauperis.[1373]

[1374][S 153A] Power to amend decree or order where appeal is summarily dismissed.—Where an Appellate Court dismisses an appeal under rule 11 of Order XLI, the power of the Court to amend, under Section 152, the decree or order appealed against may be exercised by the Court which had passed the decree or order in the first instance, notwithstanding that the dismissal of the appeal has the effect of confirming the decree or order, as the case may be, passed by the Court of first instance.]

[s 153A.1]	Genesis 1696	[s 153A.3]	Section 153-A and Section 152.... 1697
[s 153A.2]	Principle 1696	[s 153A.4]	Confirming the Decree or Order... 1697

[s 153A.1] Genesis

This section has been introduced to resolve the difference of opinion amongst different high courts on the question as to which of the courts, the court of first instance or the appellate court, can amend the decree under section 152, when the appellate court dismissed the appeal summarily under O XLI, rule 11. The view held by the Calcutta, Madras, Allahabad and Rangoon High Courts was that it is the appellate court alone that can amend the decree, while the Bombay and Patna High Courts held the view that it is the court of first instance and not the appellate court that can amend the decree, since the summary dismissal of the appeal leaves the decree of the lower court untouched. (See the commentary under section 152. Parliament, by enacting this section, has now legislatively affirmed the view taken by the Bombay and Patna High Courts.

[s 153A.2] Principle

The principle underlying section 153-A of the CPC is the doctrine of merger. As per this doctrine when an appeal is heard and disposed off after a contested hearing, the judgment of the trial court merges in the judgment of the appellate court.[1375]

Section 153A does not affect the power of the appellate court to correct an error in a decree. It merely saves the power of the trial court.[1376]

Where an appeal is dismissed on technical ground that it was not properly constituted as it did not reflect the correct name of the defendant-appellant, the doctrine of merger as contemplated under section 153-A would not be attracted as the decision of the appellate court was not on merit. Therefore, the trial court can amend its judgment under section 152 so as to reflect the correct name of the defendant-appellant.[1377]

[s 153A.3] Section 153-A and Section 152

Even if the jurisdiction of the trial court, to make such correction under section 152, is available after the decree is affirmed by the appellate court by reason of section 153 A, it is confined only to the scope and ambit within the confines of section 152.[1378]

[s 153A.4] Confirming the Decree or Order

Prior to the Amendment Act of 1976, by virtue of the operation of principle of merger, the appellate court has the power to amend the decree passed by the trial court, irrespective of its confirmation or modification or reversion. After the Amendment Act of 1976 and by virtue of introduction of section 153-A, the expression "confirmation" had attained two connotations; first, confirmation of the decree of the trial court by the appellate court in exercise of powers under O XLI, rule 11 of the CPC, i.e., by summarily dismissing the appeal even without hearing the respondent or his counsel and secondly confirmation of the decree of the trial court on merits, after hearing both the sides. In other words, after amendments, a clear distinction had been drawn between the confirmation of the decree of the trial court by the appellate court in dismissing the appeal in limine and confirmation of the decree of the trial court on merits. In the latter case, on application of principle of merger, it is only the appellate court which has the jurisdiction under section 152 to correct or amend the decree, as if it has passed the decree; and in the former case, since the decree of the trial court has been confirmed by the appellate court in exercise of jurisdiction under O XLI, rule 11 of the CPC, i.e., by way of dismissal of the appeal in limine, the jurisdiction under section 152 can be exercised by the court of first instance, which passed the original decree. This position is made clear by the explicit language employed in section 153-A of the CPC.[1379]

[1380][[S 153B] Place of trial to be deemed to be open Court.—The place in which any Civil Court is held for the purpose of trying any suit shall be deemed to be an open Court, to which the public generally may have access so far as the same can conveniently contain them:

Provided that the presiding Judge may, if he thinks fit, order at any stage of any inquiry into or trial of any particular case, that the public generally, or any particular person, shall not have access to, or be or remain in, the room or building used by the Court.]

So far there was no express provision in the Code that the sittings of the court shall be open to the public. The Code also did not contain any express provision regarding the discretion of the presiding judge to hold a trial or a proceeding or part thereof in camera. This power was so far exercised, as part of the inherent power under section 151 where interest of justice so required. Express provision on both the points is now made.

In an Orissa case, it was held that in exceptional and appropriate cases, after exercise of due care and caution, the court may direct that a part or whole of the proceedings shall be conducted in camera. In the instant case,[1381] (suit for defamation), the allegations sued upon as defamatory, were mostly obscene. A picture had been depicted that the plaintiff was a sex pervert who loved unnatural sex. In view of the nature of the pleading in the plaint, the plaintiff would deny each and every allegation in which obscenity had been attributed to him. Some other witnesses were also likely to repeat obscenity in their evidence. The allegations, the words and the sentences were so filthy and obscene that generally a normal person, much less children, adolescents, young girls, ladies and men, will hate to hear and read. They are not literature, depicting the sexual behaviour of the hero. Nor are the Indians so modern, in the sense in which modernity is understood in Western countries, that they will hear and read trash and obscene matters and forget it. It will be embarrassing for the court to record the statements and those who will be present in court will not enjoy such events. In the background of the peculiar facts of the case, and keeping the principles of the law in the background, administration of justice will not suffer, if part of the proceedings of the suit are tried in camera. The court gave directions as under:

(i) Evidence of the plaintiff, and of other witnesses (to be indicated by the court from time to time) shall be recorded in camera. The evidence of other witnesses shall be recorded in open court.

(ii) When the suit is heard in camera, general public shall not remain present.

(iii) There shall be no bar of entry for advocates, their clerks, witnesses and officers of the court.

(iv) The evidence recorded in camera, inclusive of facts stated in pleadings, applications, affidavits and documents filed in court relating to obscene matters and evidence shall not be printed and published by the defendants or any other person in any newspaper, magazine, periodical, pamphlet, book or otherwise.

(v) Any such publication (prohibited by the order) if made, shall be deemed to be contempt of court.
